When Brown did not immediately resign his office after submitting his guilty plea, St. Charles County Prosecuting Attorney Jack Banas released a statement saying that he intended to immediately initiate procedures to seek the mayor's removal from office. The city's attorney, Randy Weber with the law firm of Hazelwood & Weber LLC in St. Charles, was advised of Banas' intentions, according to the statement.

Brothel Raids Lead To Arrests Of 10 Men (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, October 24, 2006

October 24, 2006 Ten men have been charged with running brothels in Memphis using prostitutes they enticed here from other states and countries, authorities said Monday.

The Hispanic men named in the 15-count federal indictment distributed business cards in the Memphis Latino community to advertise and provided cell phone numbers for the brothels, according to officials.

Those arrested are charged with money laundering, harboring illegal aliens and enticing women to engage in prostitution.

The allegations say the crimes have been ongoing here for more than two years.

The men, including four brothers, were arrested in a multi-agency raid Oct. 13 involving some 150 law-enforcement officers.

"This was a massive undertaking," said FBI Special Agent in Charge My Harrison.

The brothels were located in a half dozen houses or apartments in four locations around Memphis, including one in an apartment at 1717 Steve Way Drive near Sharpe Elementary School in the vicinity of Kimball and Getwell.

The others were at 1104 and 1108 N. Holmes near Jackson; 3685 N. Victory Heights and 3822 E. Victory Heights off Prescott between Winchester and Raines, and 574 E. Cadraca near Summer and Perkins.

After paying $30 in advance for 15 minutes of activity with the prostitute, customers were given a poker chip or bead to give the prostitute to signify that payment had been made.

U.S. Atty. David Kustoff said the prostitutes mostly were illegal aliens from New York, Illinois, Georgia, Mexico, the Dominican Republic and Colombia.

He said the women are being processed administratively by immigration but are not named in the criminal indictment.

Kustoff declined to comment on how many women were involved or how much money the enterprise had generated.

The defendants, many of whom are related, include Raul Santillan-Leon, Raymundo Flores, Fernando Reyes-Santillan, Ramiro Sanchez-Garcia, Cristobal Flores, Diego Cortes-Barrientos, Rafael Cortes-Barrientos, Eliseo Cortes-Barrientos, Rodolfo Cortes-Barrientos and Martin Moreno.

The defendants are in federal custody and will make an initial court appearance today.

The investigation included U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Memphis police and the FBI.

(CBS 3) PHILADELPHIA The FBI is investigating a brazen heist in Northeast Philadelphia that is being called one of the biggest bank robberies in the area in years.

Authorities said at least two individuals robbed the PNC Bank located at 11830 Bustleton Avenue in the city's Somerton section early Monday morning.

The early morning 'take over' robbery occurred as the first bank employee arrived at the bank.

The two men, wearing masks and carrying guns, forced their way into the bank as the employee opened the branch.

The first teller was made to open the door for other bank employees as they arrived for work.

During the robbery, the subjects appeared to be communicating with others outside the bank.

The robbers repeatedly warned and threatened the bank employees to fully cooperate and not to activate any alarms.

The suspects were in the bank for 35 minutes, emptying the vault, teller drawers and ATM machines before locking the employees in the vault. There were no injuries.

The substantial, but undisclosed bank loss, is believed to be the largest loss in recent history stolen during a bank robbery.

Anyone with information regarding this robbery should contact the FBI at (215) 418-4000.

Huge Local Bank Robbery Reported (WCAU)

WCAU-TV, October 24, 2006

PHILADELPHIA -- Surveillance Video | Images The FBI is looking for at least two men responsible for what it calls the biggest local bank robbery in recent history.

"The substantial, but undisclosed bank loss is believed to be the largest loss in recent history stolen during a bank robbery," said Jerri Williams, a Special Agent for the bureau's Philadelphia division.

Williams said on Monday afternoon that the robbers hit the PNC Bank on Bustleton Avenue as employees arrived for work on Monday morning.

After taking the first employee at work captive, the robbers held the woman inside the bank as other employees arrived.

Once all the employees were rounded up and held captive, the robbers emptied the entire bank and were in communication with others, the FBI said.

"The robbers were able to empty out the vault, all teller drawers and two ATM machines, before locking all the employees in the bank vault and exiting from the bank," Williams said.

The robbery took about 35 minutes and the robbers left as the bank opened for business at 9 a.m.

But before they left, they locked the employees in the vault.

The two men were dressed in dark hooded sweatshirts and their faces were covered by ski masks.

The two robbers were further described as a Black male and a Hispanic or Black male with a light complexion.

Anyone with information regarding this robbery should contact the FBI at (215) 418-4000.

Bank Heist May Be One Of Philly's Biggest (WPIV)

By Erin O'Hearn And Bob Monek

WPVI-TV, October 24, 2006

"Substantial" Amount of Cash Stolen

SOMERTON - October 23, 2006 - It's being called one of the biggest bank robberies in recent history. At least two bandits pulled off the heist early Monday morning.

The robbery unfolded at the PNC Bank at 11830 Bustleton Avenue shortly after 8:00 a.m.

Authorities described the robbery as a "take over," in which the first employee to arrive at the bank was accosted by two gunmen. They forced their way into the bank.

PNC bank surveillance video shows a masked man forcing several employees into the bank vault. It is one snapshot of a half hour ordeal officials say is Philadelphia's biggest bank heist in at least five or six years.

FBI spokesperson Jerri Williams says the ease at which this robbery was executed indicates the suspects may have staked out the bank for a while, knowing who the employees were and when they arrived at work. "It was well done. They were in there for a total of 35 minutes, which is unheard of," said Williams.

The suspects were armed with silver handguns, dressed in dark-hooded sweatshirts and ski masks.

According to investigators, the bandits made the first employee open the door for other workers as they arrived. The suspects appeared to be communicating with others outside the bank.

DOJ_NMG_0085462

The robbers repeatedly warned and threatened the bank employees to fully cooperate, threatening to shoot the employees if anyone activated the alarms.

The bandits emptied the vault, every teller drawer and two ATM machines.

"We're not disclosing the amount but I can tell you it's the largest loss that has occurred," said Williams. "Pretty substantial."

But Action News does know that last year a lone robber took $250,000 from a Nova Savings bank in Center City. Sources tell us the amount taken from the PNC bank was significantly larger.

Before they fled, the robbers locked all of the employees in the vault.

Anyone with information regarding this robbery is asked to contact the FBI at (215) 418-4000.

Organized Robbers Hit Phila. Bank (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 24, 2006

Two men took employees hostage at gunpoint early yesterday in what FBI officials called the biggest bank robbery in Philadelphia in recent history.

FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said that although she could not reveal how much money was taken, it was well over the $250,000 taken in another substantial bank heist two years ago.

Officials said the robbery began shortly after 8 a.m., when two suspects, described as a black male and a Hispanic or black male in dark-hooded sweatshirts and ski masks and carrying silver handguns, rushed a female employee outside the PNC bank at 1180 Bustleton Avenue in the city's Northeast section as she was arriving for work.

Police said the teller was made to open the door for other bank employees as they arrived for work. Williams said that during the robbery the men used hand-held radios to communicate with associates outside the bank.

Williams said the robbers emptied the vault, all teller drawers and two ATM machines before locking about a dozen employees in the vault and leaving the bank.

Williams said the robbery's execution was unusual.

"I can say that the majority of robberies that occur are demand-note robberies by desperate people," Williams said. "They are usually not well planned and definitely not well executed. They took time and thought and this was not a robbery that was based on a desperate need for cash. This was a deliberate, planned robbery."

FBI officials say anyone with information regarding the robbery should contact the FBI at 215-418-4000.

2 Bandits Get Thousands In PNC Bank Heist (PHDN)

By Simone Weichselbaum

Philadelphia Daily News, October 24, 2006

Walkie-talkies, unsuspecting employees, armed and masked thugs and an open vault were the components of one of the biggest bank heists in Philadelphia's recent history yesterday.

Two bandits - wearing dark-hooded sweatshirts and ski masks and armed with silver handguns - made off with as much as $400,000 from the PNC Bank on Bustleton Avenue near Somerton in the Far Northeast, law-enforcement sources said.

The duo stole the cash from the bank's vault, cleaned out all the teller drawers and two ATM machines, agents said.

They locked the frightened employees in the vault and fled.

"It appeared to be a well-planned and executed robbery, and a horrific and terrifying experience for the bank employees," said FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams.

The employees escaped by unlocking the vault from the inside. No one was hurt during the 35-minute morning "takeover," Williams said.

The gunmen were still on the lam last night.

The drama began shortly after 8 a.m. when a woman employee inside the bank walked to the front door to unlock it, Williams said.

The robbers pushed their way inside and told the worker to continue to unlock the door for other arriving employees as she normally would, Williams said.

During the heist, the bandits spoke into walkie-talkies, possibly to others watching outside the bank, Williams said.

"That is rare," Williams said of the use of the devices in a holdup.

The pair told the employees not to activate any alarms.

Once they were finished collecting the cash, they ushered the workers into the vault.

The bandits left the bank at 8:47 a.m., Williams said.

After the employees got out of the vault, they called 911, Williams said.

Anyone with information on the incident is asked to call the FBI at 215- 418-4000.

FBI: North Texas Bank Heists Rise 'astronomical' (WFAA)

By Jim Douglas

WFAA-TV, October 24, 2006

As yet another Dallas bank was targeted in a robbery Monday, the FBI has called the number of North Texas banks heisted this year "astronomical."

The Professional Bank in the Lakewood area of Dallas was hit early Monday afternoon. Investigators think the bandit who robbed the bank on Abrams has hit three or four others as well, which might be enough for him to get his own catchy nickname soon.

However, Dallas isn't alone, Fort Worth robberies have almost doubled compared to last year.

"We've never seen a spike in bank robberies to this level," said John Skillestad, FBI supervisor.

Police recently caught three men, the T-shirt bandit, envelope bandit and the backpack bandit, which were all suspected of hitting about 50 banks between the trio of them.

"Overall, numbers are way beyond what we've ever had here in Dallas," Skillestad said.

At this time last year, Dallas County had 35 bank robberies, but the number has more than tripled to 110 this year.

Tarrant County had 30 bank robberies compared to 57 this year. Plano jumped almost 50 percent from 12 to 18.

As for the whole North Texas area, the number jumped from 94 last year to 205 this year.

Dozens of robbers remain on the loose.

"I'm thinking another 40 to 50 people," Skillestad said.

One robber foiled his own heist when he got too greedy and went for one more wad of bills.

"He looked over the counter, saw there was a stack of money in the till [and] told her to give him that stack as well," Skillestad said.

It was that stack that contained a red dye pack that exploded on the robber seconds later.

Agents believe drugs, like meth, are driving the increase. They also said they expect the trend to increase as time heads into the holidays.

But Skillestad said repeat offenders still on the loose are most likely looking to a fate behind bars soon enough.

"An average bank robber does two or three robberies before he or she gets caught," he said.

Hackers Zero In On Online Stock Accounts (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Hackers have been breaking into customer accounts at large online brokerages in the United States and making unauthorized trades worth millions of dollars as part of a fast-growing new form of online fraud under investigation by federal authorities.

E-Trade Financial Corp., the nation's fourth-largest online broker, said last week that "concerted rings" in Eastern Europe and Thailand caused their customers $18 million in losses in the third quarter alone.

Another company, TD Ameritrade, the third-largest online broker, also has suffered losses from customer account fraud, but a spokeswoman declined to quantify the amount yesterday. "It is an industry problem," spokeswoman Katrina Becker said. "It does continue to grow."

Federal regulators cited recent cases in which hackers gained access to customer accounts at several large online brokers and used the customers' funds to buy certain stocks. The hackers appeared to be trying to drive up share prices so they could sell those stocks at a profit, regulators said.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and the FBI are looking into E-Trade's cases, chief executive Mitchell H. Caplan said in an earnings conference call with reporters last week. Spokesmen for the SEC and FBI declined to discuss details of those cases.

Both E-Trade and TD Ameritrade have guaranteed that they will cover their clients' losses, even though they are not required to do so by law. But the problem is growing faster than public awareness of it, federal regulators said, noting that the fraud is fed by the rising use of the Internet for personal finance and the easy availability of snooping software that allows hackers to steal personal account information.

"Although these schemes cleverly combine aspects of securities fraud, identity theft and hacking, what they really boil down to is outright thievery," said John Reed Stark, chief of the Office of Internet Enforcement at the SEC. "In the last couple of months we have seen a marked increase in online brokerage account intrusions."

More than 10 million people have bought or sold investments online in the United States in the last few months, according to Avivah Litan, a securities analyst for the Stamford, Conn.-based Gartner Inc.

The scams typically begin with a hacker obtaining customer passwords and user names, experts said. One way is by placing keystroke-monitoring software on any public computer in a library, hotel business center or airport. With the software, all keystrokes entered on the computer can be recorded and e-mailed anywhere in the world.

Experts said all hackers have to do is wait until anyone types in the Web address of E-Trade, Ameritrade or another online broker, and then watch the next several dozen keystrokes, which are likely to include someone's password and login name.

These emerging Internet stock schemes appear to be new versions of the widely used "pump-and-dump" e-mail scams, in which spammers send out mass e-mails containing bogus news alerts intended to manipulate stock prices.

Stark said perpetrators are breaking into customer accounts and buying shares of thinly traded, microcap securities, also known as penny stocks. The hacker gains access using the customer's user name and password, then liquidates that person's existing stock holdings and uses the proceeds to buy shares in the microcap. The goal, regulators said, is to boost the price of a stock the hacker has already bought at a lower price in another account. The hacker then liquidates the stock and wires the money either to an offshore account or through a series of straw men, or dummy corporations, Stark said. The straw man may not know he is participating in fraud; he may have been told he is helping, say, an offshore business.

The entire operation can take a matter of minutes, or at most, hours.

"The unwitting victim opens the account in the morning and finds he or she owns thousands of shares in a microcap company that they have never heard of," Stark said.

Caplan said E-Trade recently made operational changes and added technology to thwart the criminals. "We've seen that level of fraud in the last three weeks or so reduced to almost zero . . . ," he said in the conference call.

Glen Mathison, a spokesman for Charles Schwab Corp., the largest online broker, said losses due to online identity theft and fraud have not reached "a material level" that would require disclosure to investors. But he added that Schwab also guarantees to reimburse clients for online losses caused by fraud.

Unlike banks, brokerage accounts are not protected by Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. and other federal banking rules that ensure consumers get their money back, so the consumer must rely on the company to cover any losses.

Ameritrade's Becker said the company advises clients to make sure they have good spyware detection software on their computers. Ameritrade's Web site also offers clients free software that helps detect or eliminate snooping programs.

In Canada, the Investment Dealers Association, the self-regulatory arm of Canada's securities industry, is looking into similar scams.

Online financial fraud has grown so serious that the Federal Financial Institutions Examination Council, a government entity that establishes standards for banks, has given U.S. financial institutions until Dec. 31 to tighten security measures for accessing online accounts.

"This thing is so widespread and it has such a significant impact on the industry at large . . . that I think you're going to end up seeing structural changes in the industry," Caplan said.

Feds Probe Hub City's Housing Program (EBHNT)

By Richard Khavkine

East Brunswick (NJ) Home News Tribune, October 24, 2006

NEW BRUNSWICK — The investigation into the city's housing rehabilitation programs has reached the federal level.

City police investigators have turned over documents detailing agreements and contracts between the city and contractors to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Newark. U.S. Department Housing and Urban Development dollars fund some of New Brunswick's housing-rehab programs.

City spokesman Bill Bray had no comment on whether city officials turned over the documents voluntarily or were compelled to do so. Bray, citing the ongoing nature of the multipronged probe, also would not say when the documents were turned over to federal investigators.

Officials at the U.S. Justice Department, which oversees the U.S. Attorney's Office, could not be reached for comment yesterday. An agent at HUD's Office of the Inspector General said she could not confirm nor deny that agency's involvement in the investigation.

In recent weeks, some city employees have been put on paid administrative leave as a result of the city's investigation and a large part of the rehab home projects have been put on hold.

No additional personnel have been placed on leave since then, Bray said.

The city has so far declined to say how many employees are on leave, identify them or specify which department they work in.

But the rehab programs are run out of the city's Department of Planning, Community and Economic Development and efforts in recent weeks to reach William H. Walker, the director of the rehab programs, and Richard P. Kaplan, the programs' construction inspector, have been unsuccessful. And a person answering the telephone at the city agency earlier this month said they would not be in the office "any time soon."

Program Coordinator Maria Angela Torres, who also was said to be out the office, and two other employees also work in the rehab office.

The rehab programs provide grants and loans of up to $20,000 for qualified residents to upgrade city homes in need of repair, on anything from roofs and gutters to furnaces and sidewalks. After a bidding process, a homeowner is asked to choose a contractor from among as many as five competing bidders. Eight area contractors comprise the rehab program's bidder's list.

The city's HOME program, funded by federal dollars with a budget last year of $242,000, financed repairs to 12 units for residents of moderate or low incomes, said Bray.

Man Awarded $1.1 Million Over BTK Report (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

WICHITA -- A jury has ordered a Wichita television station and its news director to pay a man $1.1 million for naming him two years ago as a possible suspect in the BTK serial killings.

Roger Valadez had sought as much as $2 million from Emmis Communications, then-owner of KSNW-TV, and News Director Todd Spessard for the station's coverage of Valadez's arrest on Dec. 1, 2004.

The jury found Friday that KSNW and Spessard defamed Valadez when the station used his name after his home was raided.

"We are pleased," Valadez said after the trial. "The jury found that it was wrong."

BTK -- a self-coined nickname that stands for "bind, torture, kill" -- terrorized Wichita in the 1970s, taunting authorities with anonymous letters, and then resurfaced with new messages in 2004.

The case was finally cracked in late February 2005 with the arrest of Dennis L. Rader, who eventually pleaded guilty to killing 10 people between 1974 and 1991.

Less than three months before Rader's arrest, Valadez had come to the attention of the BTK task force. Police raided his home and took a DNA sample from his mouth.

But Valadez was never charged in connection with the slayings. He was arrested on minor outstanding warrants and released the next day, and his attorney said he was quickly ruled out as a BTK suspect.

In his closing arguments Friday, KSNW lawyer Bernard Rhodes pointed to evidence that he said showed that police considered Valadez a suspect in the BTK killings at the time.

"I am sorry Roger Valadez was a suspect, but the fact is that he was," Rhodes said.

Rhodes said he would appeal the verdict, calling it the "wrong verdict based upon the wrong law."

Police Probe Dumping Of Homeless By L.A. Hospital (LAT)

By Richard Winton And Cara Mia Dimassa, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 24, 2006

The LAPD has opened its first criminal investigation into the dumping of homeless people after documenting five cases Sunday in which ambulances dropped off on skid row patients recently discharged from a South Los Angeles hospital. All of the patients told police they did not want to be taken downtown.

LAPD officials, who photographed and videotaped the five alleged dumping cases, called it a major break in their yearlong effort to reduce the number of people left on skid row by hospitals, police departments and other institutions.

Though police have documented other cases of hospitals dropping off recently discharged patients in the district, "this is the most blatant effort yet by a hospital to dump their patients on skid row against their will," LAPD Capt. Andrew Smith said.

Officials at Los Angeles Metropolitan Medical Center strongly denied that they had improperly handled the patients.

Dumping has emerged as a major political issue in Los Angeles, with Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and other critics saying that the practice exacerbates the ills of a district that already has the largest concentration of homeless people in the West.

Police said they were investigating whether the patients were falsely imprisoned during their transfer and also whether the hospital violated any laws regarding the treatment of patients. The state Legislature recently passed a law aimed at cutting down on dumping across city boundaries, but it won't take effect until January.

Sunday's investigation began about noon, when a Los Angeles Police Department sergeant saw a patient being left in front of the Volunteers of America homeless services center on San Julian Street. He immediately called an LAPD videographer, who over the next few hours recorded four more ambulances arriving at the facility and leaving patients who had been discharged from Los Angeles Metropolitan.

Police also recorded interviews with the patients as well as with James Frailey, a 30-year-old attendant with ProCare, a private ambulance company.

Frailey told police that the hospital had hired his company "on a regular basis" to move discharged patients from the medical center to skid row and that other private ambulance companies also taken patients to the area. He said the hospital appeared to have made "no prior arrangements" for the patient he transported Sunday, according to police records.

One patient the LAPD interviewed on videotape, 62-year-old Marcus Joe Licon, told officers that he "never wanted to go" to skid row and asked that he be dropped off at his son's house. According to LAPD records, Licon said he was at the hospital because of problems with his knee and was released after they gave him "some painkillers and some medication."

John V. Fenton, president and chief executive of Los Angeles Metropolitan Medical Center, denied that his hospital had dumped patients.

Rather, he said, three of the five patients had arrived at the hospital from Volunteers of America or the nearly Lamp Community center. They gave San Julian Street addresses on their admission information, he said.

The other two, he said, had "requested to go to either another skid row facility center or Volunteers of America."

Calling ahead, Fenton said, would not have made a difference because such facilities don't take reservations.

"Why would we go there? With all of the issues, why would we send someone there who did not ask to go there? It is illogical," he said. "We don't just send people back to the streets. It's not what we are about."

DOJ_NMG_0085467

But officials at Lamp and Volunteers of America said Monday that they had no record of any of the five patients having been at their facilities either before or after they were dropped off on skid row Sunday.

Moreover, the LAPD said, all five patients had stated in their interviews that they did not want to be left on skid row.

When told of the hospital's explanation, Volunteers of America's Los Angeles group director of homeless services, Jim Howat, said he was baffled.

"Somebody's wires got crossed. It doesn't really make sense to me," he said. "I don't know of anybody [at the center] that has worked with Metropolitan hospital.... We don't have case managers on duty [on Sundays]. It is not a time when we are well-equipped to accept anybody."

Though this is the LAPD's first criminal investigation of dumping, the Los Angeles city attorney's office said it was reviewing other dumping cases against some Los Angeles hospitals to determine whether civil or criminal charges could be filed.

The office also is considering asking a judge for a consent decree involving local hospitals that would establish sanctions for dumping patients.

There is no law against sending patients to skid row after they have been discharged. But the city attorney is looking at whether hospitals that engage in dumping could be penalized for violating the federal Emergency Medical Transfer and Active Labor Act, which requires medical facilities to screen and stabilize all patients and penalizes them for releasing or transferring patients who are medically unstable.

The city attorney also is examining whether hospitals that dump homeless patients can be cited for violating a state law that deals with unfair business practices. The law allows a corporation to be sued for unscrupulous behavior and has been used in the past to prosecute slumlords.

Jeff Isaacs, chief of the criminal division of the city attorney's office, said hospitals also could face more serious criminal charges if they were found to have forced people to go to skid row.

"If these people are being taken against their will, we are talking about false imprisonment and in some cases elder abuse," Isaacs said.

Shannon Jones, director of patient care at Metropolitan, said that all the patients sent to Volunteers of America on Sunday chose to go there and "were discharged in perfect health."

"We certainly were not dumping patients, nor were these patients being mistreated or placed out into the street," she said. "They didn't have any family that they had mentioned or that was involved in these particular cases."

The LAPD told a different story.

Smith said officers took Licon to his family's home, where his niece told them that she was not notified of his release and didn't understand why he had been taken to Volunteers of America.

Another patient, Johny Williams, 60, told police that he wanted to be taken to a Pasadena convalescent home.

The ambulance driver said he would instead take Williams to skid row, the Pasadena man told police in a videotaped interview. "This is where they dumped me off at."

Williams eventually was taken to Pasadena by a downtown pastor.

CIVIL LAW:

Medco Settles Federal Fraud Claims For $155 Million (PHI)

By Jane M. Von Bergen

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 24, 2006

Complaints from two whistle-blowing pharmacists from Las Vegas in 1999 led to a $155 million settlement today of federal fraud claims by the nation's largest mail-order pharmacy business.

Medco Health Solutions Inc. had been accused of destroying and canceling prescriptions, soliciting kickbacks from pharmaceutical companies to favor their drugs, and paying kickbacks to health plans to obtain business.

The settlement, announced by the U.S. Attorney's Office in Philadelphia, also covers a second investigation into how the Franklin Lakes, N.J., company submitted claims to the Medicare program on behalf of its clients.

Pharmacy-benefits-management companies act as middlemen between pharmaceutical companies and health-care plans to negotiate lower drug costs. The U.S. Justice Department has been investigating conflicts of interest in the business for years.

Medco did not admit to any wrongdoing as part of the settlement.

"After nearly seven years of inquiry, these issues end as they began - with no finding of wrongdoing by Medco or any of its people," the company said in a statement. "Our business practices today are widely regarded as setting the standard for our industry."

The settlement requires the company to provide more transparency in its dealings with drug companies and with the government.

That will ultimately benefit the consumer, said James G. Sheehan, the associate U.S. attorney who handled the case.

"When you open your prescription bottle, you should know what's inside," Sheehan said. "What's inside should be what's on the label and in the same quantity. If it is a different drug, you should know it before you open the bottle."

The settlement primarily deals with conduct between 1998 and 2004. In the 1990s, the two whistle-blowing pharmacists, who remain in practice, were working out of Medco's Las Vegas facility when they noticed irregularities in how prescriptions were filled. The irregularities were occurring because of pressure to meet contract-specified deadlines.

"I think they are relieved that it's over," said Marc S. Raspanti, the Philadelphia lawyer who represented the two former Medco pharmacists, George Bradford Hunt and Walter W. Gauger.

"They felt some of the practices, and pressures, and some of the automation was being done to the detriment of the patient," Raspanti said. They are gratified by changes that the process brought to the pharmacy-benefits-management business, he said.

The men and their lawyer will get $20.16 million of the $155 million settlement. Other whistle-blowers include a doctor from northern New Jersey, Joseph Piacentile, and another former Medco employee, Karl S. Schumann. Each will receive payments as part of the settlement.

Medco, with 58 million customers, had a profit of $602 million last year on sales of $37.9 billion.

Medco Will Pay $155 Million In U.S. Kickback Case (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, October 24, 2006

Oct. 23 (Bloomberg) -- Medco Health Solutions Inc., the biggest U.S. manager of employee prescription drug benefits, agreed to pay $155 million to settle U.S. allegations it accepted kickbacks from pharmaceutical manufacturers and submitted false claims to the government.

The settlement, announced by the Justice Department in Washington, resolves two civil cases and an investigation by the U.S. attorney's office in Philadelphia. The government also accused Medco of paying kickbacks to health plans to help it obtain business.

``Millions of federal employees and Medicare beneficiaries rely on pharmacy benefit managers for their prescription drugs," said Peter Keisler, head of the civil division at the Justice Department, in a statement. ``Hidden financial agreements with drug manufacturers and health plans can influence which drugs patients receive, the price we all pay for drugs and whether pharmacists serve patients with their undivided professional judgment."

Medco, based in Franklin Lakes, New Jersey, said in May it agreed to a tentative deal with the government.

Today's action ``puts things behind us," said Soraya Balzac, a Medco spokeswoman. As part of the agreement, there were no findings of wrongdoing against the company, she added.

Medco manages prescription drug benefits for over 60 million Americans, the Justice Department said. The government complaint alleged that Medco submitted inflated bills for mail-order prescription drug services it provided.

The company also canceled valid prescriptions it couldn't fill on time to avoid paying penalties under its contract and shorted the number of pills it provided, the government complaint said. The company was also accused of sending out drugs other than those prescribed by a physician in order to earn undisclosed rebates from drug manufacturers.

The settlement is the fourth-largest in a health care false claims act case in 2006, according to Taxpayers Against Fraud, a Washington-based group that tracks such suits. The largest, for $900 million, was with Tenet Healthcare Corp.

Medco Settles Charges For $155 Million (UPI)

United Press International, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 23 (UPI) -- Medco Health Solutions has agreed to settle kickback charges by paying $155 million plus interest, the U.S. Justice Department said Monday.

The Parsippany, N.J., company submitted false claims to the government, solicited and accepted kickbacks from pharmaceutical manufacturers to favor their drugs and paid kickbacks to health plans to obtain business, federal prosecutors said. Medco, the nation's second largest pharmacy benefit management company, manages the prescription drug benefits of over 60 million U.S. residents, including millions of Medicare beneficiaries.

Prosecutors said Medco submitted false claims for mail order prescription drug services it was required by contract to provide to millions of federal employees, retirees and their families under the Federal Employee Health Benefits Program.

"Millions of federal employees and Medicare beneficiaries rely on pharmacy benefit managers for their prescription drugs," said Peter D. Keisler, a top Justice Department official.

"Hidden financial agreements with drug manufacturers and health plans can influence which drugs patients receive, the price we all pay for drugs, and whether pharmacists serve patients with their undivided professional judgment."

Government Defends 1998 Anti-Porn Law (AP)

By Maryclaire Dale, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 24, 2006

PHILADELPHIA (AP) -- Eight years after Congress passed a law aimed at protecting children from online pornography, free speech advocates and Web site publishers argued in federal court Monday that the never-enforced measure is fatally flawed.

Salon.com, Nerve.com and other plaintiffs warned that the 1998 Child Online Protection Act could be used to criminalize such things as sexual health information, erotic literature and news photographs of naked prisoners tortured at Abu Ghraib.

The law, signed by then-President Clinton, says Web site operators must prevent youngsters from seeing material "harmful to children" by demanding proof of age from computer users. It would impose a $50,000 fine and six-month prison term on commercial Web site operators that allow minors to view such content, which is to be defined by "contemporary community standards."

In a trial that opened Monday, the plaintiffs argued that "community standards" is too vague.

"As a parent, I know that what's fine for my daughter may not be appropriate even for some of her friends," testified Joan Walsh, editor in chief of Salon.com.

The law has never been enforced.

The U.S. Supreme Court has twice upheld preliminary injunctions that prevented the government from enforcing the law until a trial to determine the act's constitutionality can be held.

The American Civil Liberties Union, which represents the plaintiffs, argues that filter programs installed in home computers are more effective ways of policing the Internet.

Eric Beane, a government attorney, acknowledged that it is tempting to defer to families on the question of what is appropriate for children, but said the filters used by parents do not work.

"The evidence will show that a shocking amount of pornography slips through to children," Beane said in opening statements.

ACLU attorney Chris Hansen said that the government is essentially arguing that "parents are too stupid to use filters."

In preparing for its defense of the law, the Justice Department sought internal files from search engine companies and Internet service providers on what sorts of things people search the Internet for.

Google Inc. fought one such subpoena, although it primarily cited trade secrets, not privacy issues. A federal judge in California sharply limited the amount of information Google had to surrender.

The nonjury trial in front of Senior U.S. District Judge Lowell A. Reed Jr. is expected to take about a month.

Civil Action Continues Against City Of Denton (NTD)

By Abel Prado

North Texas Daily, October 24, 2006

Citizens accuse fire department of racism

Citizens of Denton are officially moving forward with legal action against the Denton Fire Department with accusations of racial discrimination through the NAACP and the Justice Department.

More than 26 minorities applied for one of the 15 open positions in the Denton Fire Department in 2006 but none were hired, said Willie Hudspeth, leader of the suit against Denton Fire Department.

Suspicions of racial injustice arose around 1999 when Hudspeth, along with other community members, said the city of Denton hired only one minority, which was the librarian. Seven years later, the number of minorities working for the city is still low, but it is not because of lack of applicants, Hudspeth said.

"This bias is more pronounced in the fire department," Hudspeth said. "They are over-qualified and have all the credentials. At this point I see no reason other than race that explains why these applicants did not get hired."

Several calls to the Denton Fire Administration and Prevention precinct and City Council officials seeking comment were not returned.

Applicants who wish to obtain a position in the Denton Fire Department have to take a Civil Service Exam, which tests a person's academic ability in math and science, his or her physical strength and proficiency in reading, writing, English and other foreign languages.

"The evidence is there," Hudspeth said. "And I hate that it is. As of now we are in contact with the NAACP and the Justice Department. They are each reviewing the case and deciding on a proper course of action. We should hear back from them in the coming days after which appropriate fundraisers will ensue."

Hudspeth claims to have uncovered evidence of an Asian American who scored in the 98th percentile and was not hired. He said he knows of another minority applicant who scored in the 91st percentile and did not get hired.

Several applicants, meanwhile, scored significantly lower than those applicants but were given a post in the department.

"It is my understanding that they could have a solid case," said Danny Garris, whose Utah-based law firm specializes in class action lawsuits and legal matters. "If the charges that Mr. Hudspeth is leveling are true and there are minority applicants who are outscoring those getting hired then there could be a legitimate grievance here. You would think that this situation is a thing of the past but, sadly, it isn't."

Driver Retried In Texas Smuggling Deaths (FINDLAW/AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 24, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-A truck driver accused of being responsible for the nation's deadliest human smuggling attempt could again face the death penalty.

Tyrone Williams was convicted last year on 38 counts of transporting illegal immigrants, but the verdict was overturned on appeal. Opening statements were set for Monday in his retrial.

Prosecutors say Williams failed to help the more than 70 illegal immigrants who had been packed into his tractor-trailer in stifling heat in 2003. Nineteen died.

Jury selection in his retrial took more than two weeks because potential jurors were questioned individually about their views of illegal immigration and the death penalty.

Williams, 35, avoided the death sentence in his first trial because the jury couldn't decide whether he was directly responsible for the deaths. The judge removed the death penalty as an option. Prosecutors appealed.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ordered a new trial and that the previous judge be removed from the case because of the case's "extraordinary history" and the judge's complaints about a crowded docket.

"I'm disappointed because the first jury reached a fair verdict," defense attorney Craig Washington said. "To have to do it again is disheartening. At the end of the day, the result will be the same as the last trial."

Prosecutors are not commenting on the case outside the courtroom. But during a hearing last week, Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez reiterated the government's contention that Williams was responsible for the immigrants' deaths because he ignored their cries for help and failed to turn on the air conditioning unit on his tractor-trailer.

"This unit could have had a significant, major impact in the survivability of these individuals," Rodriguez said. "If they were caught in time, serious injury could have been prevented."

Williams is the only one of 14 people charged in the case who is facing the death penalty. Seven people have been sentenced to prison, sentencing of three others is pending, charges against two were dismissed and one man is a fugitive.

Men Who Transported Immigrants Sentenced (SAST)

By Jayna Boyle

San Angelo (TX) Standard-Times, October 24, 2006

Two men caught transporting illegal immigrants near San Angelo after a rollover in the spring that killed one of the immigrants have been sentenced in federal court in Lubbock.

Jorge Luis Castro-Garcia was sentenced to 71 months imprisonment, while Jesse Cano received 87 months, according to a Justice Department news release from the Northern District of Texas.

The sentencing was announced Friday.

Castro-Garcia, Cano and co-defendant Agustin Anorga each pleaded guilty in July to one count of transporting illegal immigrants for private financial gain and aiding and abetting. Anorga is scheduled to be sentenced Nov. 3.

The charge against each man carries a possible penalty of as long as 10 years in prison, said Kathy Colvin, public information officer for the Northern District. She said the duration of Castro-Garcia and Cano's sentences was based on presentencing reports and investigations.

According to the news release, Castro-Garcia, a citizen of Mexico lawfully residing in the United States, recruited Cano and Anorga, both U.S. citizens, - Anorga, 20, lives in Cleburne - to transport illegal immigrants for money. The three had been in contact with the 11 to 13 Mexican nationals and picked them up near Del Rio after they had illegally crossed into the United States.

The immigrants were to pay $1,500 each to be taken to Cleburne, according to the release. Cleburne, south of Fort Worth, is about 210 miles east-northeast of San Angelo.

Castro-Garcia, Cano and Anorga drove separate vehicles to pick up the immigrants on March 19. After picking them up, the three men had the immigrants walk around the immigration checkpoint on U.S. Highway 277 near Del Rio to avoid getting caught. They picked up the immigrants after passing through the checkpoint, according to the news release.

Seven people were in Anorga's red Ford Explorer when it crashed on Farm Road 864 in Schleicher County about 8:40 a.m., according to the report filed by the Texas Department of Public Safety in San Angelo. The SUV's right rear tire blew out, causing Anorga to lose control of the vehicle, which rolled over one and a half times, landing on its top and ejecting two people, according to the accident report.

E.J. Martinez Juan Manuel Chavis Reinaga, 18, of Alaquines, Mexico, died in the crash, according to the report. Other immigrants hid in nearby brush, but some were eventually found, the news release stated.

Anorga and Cano tried to aid the injured immigrants and went to a nearby ranch to get help, according to the news release.

Castro-Garcia went to where the crash occurred but left when law enforcement officers arrived. Cano and Anorga also then left, according to the release.

Cano and Castro-Garcia were later traveling on a small highway near the crash site to avoid getting caught when officers with the Schleicher County Sheriff's Department stopped them, according to the release.

Anorga continued to Cleburne in the vehicle originally driven by Cano. It is unclear when he was picked up by law enforcement officers.

The Explorer that Anorga drove was owned by another Cleburne resident.

According to data collected by the Center for Immigration Studies, in the United States, nearly half of post-2000 immigrants - 3.7 million people - are estimated to be illegal immigrants. Texas is among the states in the country to see the highest increase in immigration in the last decade.

Egyptian Nationals Sentenced For Slavery (UPI)

UPI, October 24, 2006

Two Egyptian nationals received prison sentences Monday for forcing a 10-year-old girl to act as their servant for two years at their California home.

While Amal Ahmed Ewis-abd El Motelib received a 22-month prison sentence for enslaving the young girl at their Orange County home, her now ex-husband Abdel Nasser Youssef Ibrahim was handed a 36-month sentence by the court Monday, the U.S. Justice Department said.

Back in June, the couple had pled guilty to the four counts laid against them regarding their illegal enslavement of the victim through both physical and verbal abuse.

In addition to the their prison sentences, both individuals were ordered to pay the victim more than $70,000, a figure representative of the payment the victim would have received as a legal employee.

"This young victim was robbed of something intensely precious -- her youth," Civil Rights Division Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim said.

Feds Ease Limits On Same-Sex Classrooms (AP)

AP, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Bush administration is giving public schools wider latitude to teach boys and girls separately in what is considered the biggest change to coed classrooms in more than three decades.

After a two-year wait, the Education Department was changing rules Tuesday in how it would enforce the Title IX landmark anti-discrimination law. Under the change, which takes effect Nov. 24, local school leaders will have discretion to create same-sex classes for subjects such as math, a grade level or even an entire school.

"Single-sex classes may provide benefits to some students under some circumstances," said Stephanie Monroe, the department's assistant secretary for civil rights. "These regulation changes will make it easier for schools that wish to use single-sex schools to do so where students would benefit."

Education officials initially proposed the rules in early 2004, pointing in part to U.S. research suggesting better student achievement and fewer discipline problems in single-sex classes including math and foreign languages.

After receiving 5,600 public comments, education officials said they were moving forward with the plan with some wording tweaks and assurances from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that it was legally sound.

Critics who compare the plan to "separate but equal" segregation-era classrooms haven't been so sure.

The National Organization for Women says it creates the risk of breeding second-class citizens. The American Association of University Women has said it would "throw out the most basic legal standards prohibiting sex discrimination in education."

A school board in southeastern Louisiana dropped plans last month to segregate two middle schools by sex after meeting with a federal judge and attorneys for the American Civil Liberties Union, which opposed the plan.

Since current rules began in 1975, single-sex classes have been allowed only in limited cases, such as sex education courses or gym classes involving contact sports.

Under the new rules, schools could separate genders for a variety of subjects if they believed it offered educational benefits, such as promoting greater student comfort or higher attendance. In all cases, enrollment in a single-sex class would be voluntary.

If a school creates a single-sex class, it would not be required to offer the other gender its own similar class, but it would have to offer a coed version of it.

The rules also make it easier to create single-sex schools, as long as the district can demonstrate that it also provides coed schools with "substantially equal" benefits to the excluded sex.

The changes affect elementary and secondary education, but not colleges. The current ban on single-sex vocational education in both classes and schools at the K-12 level will remain in effect.

The new regulations also require that school districts evaluated their single-sex classes at least every two years to ensure compliance with the Title IX law.

"The department's office for civil rights is responsible for investigating any complaints in discrimination. We take that charge very seriously and will continue to fully investigate any allegation," Monroe said.

Education officials said some districts were interested in single-sex schools but said they don't expect a rush to make wholesale changes. In most cases, local school leaders will probably wait until at least the next semester to ponder moves, they said.

Single-sex classrooms have become more common in recent years. In 1998, only four public schools had them, compared to at least 228 this year, according to the National Association for Single Sex Public Education.

Fight Over Voting Rights Act Expected To Reach High Court (GANNETT)

By Ana Radelat, Gannett News Service

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger/Gannett, October 24, 2006

Challenged provision requires federal approval for election changes

WASHINGTON — A small water district in Austin, Texas, has become the new battleground over the voting rights of minorities.

Bill Ferguson, president of Northwest Austin Municipal Utility District No. 1, said he was approached by a lawyer last year who persuaded him to sue the federal government, challenging a provision of the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

That provision requires jurisdictions with a history of discrimination at the polls to obtain permission from the Justice Department before making any change - no matter how small - in voting procedures.

Civil rights groups say overturning the "preclearance" provision would strip minorities of key protections at the ballot box.

"This is an effort by people who are longstanding enemies of the Voting Rights Act," said Julie Fernandes, an attorney with the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. "They lost in Congress and are now looking to the courts."

The utility district filed its suit shortly after Congress reauthorized the Voting Rights Act last summer.

The suit is expected to reach the Supreme Court. If the utility district prevails, the country would see the biggest change in voting rights law in more than 40 years.

The preclearance provision affects all or parts of 16 states, mostly Southern, including Mississippi.

Rob McDuff is a Jackson lawyer who testified at a May congressional hearing on the Voting Rights Act. He said "in the end the law is going to be upheld" as is.

AT A GLANCE

A key provision in the Voting Rights Act that requires eight states and dozens of counties and cities in other states to seek Justice Department approval for any electoral changes is being challenged in court.

The "preclearance" provision dates to approval of the Voting Rights Act in 1965 and is aimed at preventing disenfranchisement of minority voters in jurisdictions with a history of discrimination.

Under the provision:

DOJ_NMG_0085474

Any electoral change, from changing the look of a ballot to changing the shape of a voting district, "requires proof that the proposed voting change does not deny or abridge the right to vote on account of race, color, or membership in a language minority group."

The Justice Department says more than 15,000 proposed changes are submitted under the act each year.

"We've made a lot of progress in the last few years, but we still have a long way to go to eradicate ... racial discrimination," McDuff said Sunday night. "The preclearance provision still has an important role to play in that struggle."

Supporters of the suit say the preclearance provision is outdated and poses a burden for counties and towns that have long since evolved beyond their discriminatory pasts.

It "makes us look backward," Ferguson said. "This thing should go away, certainly by now."

The Austin utility district was founded in the late 1980s to provide water, sewage and other services to about 1,300 homes and a few building and apartments. It's a diverse community, with many Hispanic, black and Asian families.

Four years ago, the district decided to move its only polling place from a garage to a nearby school.

Because Texas is one of the states affected by the preclearance provision, that wasn't so easy. The district had to pay a lawyer $1,250 to file a letter with the Justice Department and wait two months for permission.

Ferguson said he was persuaded by Austin lawyer Greg Coleman, a former law clerk to Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas, to file suit challenging the constitutionality of the preclearance requirement.

The requirement may be just an inconvenience for the utility district, he said, "but if you multiply it by the thousands of municipalities that have to do this, then you're talking about a significant burden."

Conservatives fighting to change the Voting Rights Act say the nation has changed since the law was first approved in 1965, when there were widespread attempts to keep blacks, Hispanics and other minorities from the polls.

"America has moved far past the days of Jim Crow," said Edward Blum, a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute.

Blum, a leader in challenges to the Voting Rights Act, said the preclearance provision has resulted in the creation of majority-black and Hispanic political districts that actually hurt minority political power by creating "segregated racial homelands."

He is confident federal courts will find the preclearance requirement unconstitutional. To bolster that chance, he said, he may seek to file new challenges.

But Nina Perales, an attorney with the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, said courts have consistently deemed preclearance constitutional.

Her group and the NAACP Legal Defense Fund joined the legal fray Thursday on behalf of two couples - one Hispanic and one black - who have filed countersuits to the utility board suit.

Those countersuits say victory by the utility board would jeopardize the couples' voting rights in a state with a history of "racially polarizing voting patterns."

Fernandes said there's no need to challenge the Voting Rights Act in court because jurisdictions that can prove they haven't discriminated at the polls for at least 10 years can ask to be exempted from preclearance.

"It's the places that have problems that are complaining the most," she said. Contact Ana Radelat at aradelat@gns.gannett.com.

Embattled OC Candidate Claims Meaning Lost In Translation (AP)

By Peter Prengaman, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 24, 2006

Los Angeles (AP) -- A Republican congressional candidate linked to a threatening mailing targeting Hispanics claims the intent of a letter he did not authorize was lost in translation.

Tan Nguyen, whose campaign headquarters and house have been searched in a widening voting rights probe, told reporters Sunday that the media had poorly translated the Spanish-language letter sent by a campaign manager to 14,000 Hispanic families in Orange County.

Nguyen said the word "emigrado," translated by the media as "immigrant," actually referred to a legal permanent resident, or green card holder.

So, Nguyen's argument went, the sentence warning that immigrants could be jailed or deported for voting referred to green card holders who cannot vote, and not immigrants who have become naturalized U.S. citizens. Only U.S. citizens can vote.

Nguyen declined to say who came up with the idea for the letter or who translated it into Spanish, but argued the controversy amounted to a "debate over translation."

According to Spanish-language experts, and the Royal Spanish Academy dictionary, the word "emigrado" comes from the verb emigrar, which means to emigrate. It's mostly used in the past participle form, for example, "ellos han emigrado de Mexico," or "they have emigrated from Mexico."

The way the letter uses it — "si es emigrado," or "if you are emigrated" — is an awkward construction. But regardless, someone who has emigrated from his or her native country, and is now in a foreign country, is an immigrant.

"The word 'emigrado' in this usage has to mean immigrant. It can't mean anything else," said Roberto Ignacio Diaz, chair of the Spanish and Portuguese department at the University of Southern California.

U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, the federal agency charged with issuing immigrant visas, doesn't use the term "emigrado" to refer to any particular immigration status, said agency spokeswoman Marie Sebrechts.

Nguyen, a Vietnamese immigrant who has made illegal immigration a centerpiece of his campaign, is challenging Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a Democrat representing California's 47th Congressional District.

His explanation of the letter, which on Sunday included handing out copies of what he said was the original English text, only created more questions that he declined to answer.

"It's starting to seem a little bit like a circus," said Jose Solario, Santa Ana city councilman and Democratic candidate for the 69th Assembly District seat. Solario, a U.S. citizen whose parents brought him from Mexico as a baby, was one of the thousands receiving the letter.

Among issues raised by the letter is its contention that the government is creating a "new computerized system" to verify the names of "all new registered voters" participating in this election?

Under the Help America Vote Act, states are revamping their voting systems, but for all registered voters, not just new ones.

The letter also says that "organizations against immigration will be able to request information from this new computer system."

Much voter information can generally be accessed by the public, but there is no way to verify a voter's claimed U.S. citizenship status just by looking at a registration form.

In addition, the letter singles out Mexico, along the way slamming the American voting system.

"Unlike in Mexico, here there is no incentive to vote," it reads.

Then there is the question of the letterhead, which resembles that of the California Coalition for Immigration Reform, a Southern California anti-illegal immigration group that has said it had nothing to do with the mailing.

And who is Sergio Ramirez, the person whose name comes at the end of the letter?

Though Nguyen hasn't been forthcoming with explanations, the investigation has clearly focused on him and his campaign.

"Tan Nguyen has admitted that his campaign is responsible for the letter. The only person suggesting that the letter applies only to illegal immigrants is Tan Nguyen," said Department of Justice spokesman Nathan Barankin.

Associated Press Writers Don Thompson in Sacramento and Gillian Flaccus in Santa Ana contributed to this report.

The Don't Show Me State (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

People in the good state of Missouri need photo identification to cash a check, board a plane or apply for food stamps. But the state Supreme Court has ruled that a photo ID requirement to vote is too great a burden on the elderly and the poor. Go figure.

Public polls consistently show that an overwhelming majority of Americans -- regardless of age, race, ethnicity or socioeconomic status -- favor voter ID laws. And nearly half of the nation's states have passed them. Yet a string of recent court decisions has blocked their implementation in some places, thus siding with Democrats and liberal special interest groups who would rather turn a blind eye to voter fraud.

A Georgia judge ruled a voter ID law unconstitutional in September. Earlier this month, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals blocked enforcement of a similar law in Arizona, only to be unanimously reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court on Friday. (While the Supremes didn't decide on the merits, their willingness to let the ID requirement be enforced in next month's election suggests some encouraging deference to state officials who want to protect the integrity of the ballot.) Also this month, a Seventh Circuit appeals panel heard arguments in a case concerning Indiana's voter ID requirements. And the Michigan Supreme Court will consider a voter ID challenge in November.

Missouri's dispute shows what's at stake and why the laws are under attack. The state passed its new voting requirements in May in response to problems at the polls in 2000 and 2004, and the IDs were made available at no charge. The law was to be implemented over a two-year period, and people who lacked proper identification would be permitted to cast a provisional vote next month.

Despite these good faith efforts to ensure legitimate ballot access, however, opponents charge that photo ID requirements are overly burdensome and tantamount to a poll tax. The Missouri Democratic Party, which challenged the law, said that while the ID itself is free, the underlying documents -- such as a birth certificate -- required to obtain the necessary identification cost money. And state judges were sympathetic to the argument.

In a 6-1 decision striking down the law as a violation of the state constitution, the Missouri Supreme Court said that requiring the "between 3 and 4 percent of Missourians who lack the requisite photo ID" to obtain one for voting purposes "creates a heavy burden on the fundamental right to vote." How so? "Specific Missouri voters testified that to acquire the requisite photo ID, at the very least they will have to incur the costs associated with birth certificates, which in Missouri costs $15."

In his dissenting opinion, Judge Stephen Limbaugh Jr. took issue with the fact that the majority opinion actually played down the existence of vote fraud. "Although the majority agrees that there is some evidence of voter fraud at the voter registration stage, they discount that evidence as if it had no connection with fraud at the polling place," wrote Judge Limbaugh. "But why else does voter registration fraud occur if not to vote persons fraudulently registered?"

That's a good question. And both the majority ruling and the political left duck it. They'd rather equate a $15 nominal fee for a birth certificate with a poll tax, which is as ridiculous as the paternalistic view that senior and minority voters are incapable of meeting simple self-identification requirements that they manage to meet in other contexts every day.

Showing ID is an incidental cost of voting, like having to buy a postage stamp for an absentee ballot, or feed the parking meter when you go to the polling booth. Poll taxes, by contrast, required a person to pay a fee every time he voted and were adopted for racially discriminatory purposes.

But there's a reason that Democrat partisans are more interested in raising the specter of Jim Crow than in protecting the integrity of the voting process. And here's a clue: While the Missouri Supreme Court was preparing its decision earlier this month, the Kansas City Star and St. Louis Post-Dispatch ran front-page stories about the thousands of fraudulent voter registrations submitted by Acorn, a national left-wing group financed in part by organized labor.

According to the Star, Acorn's voter registration drive generated some 35,000 applications, "but thousands of them appear to be duplicates or contain dubious data." The report went on to note that "[n]ear the top of the fishy list would be a man named Mark who apparently registered seven times over a three-day period using his mother's home address and phone number." Mom told the paper he hadn't lived there in six years.

Acorn and its affiliates have been among the most active and vocal opponents of voter ID laws in Missouri and nationwide. Now we know why.

ANTITRUST:

IBM Sues Amazon In Patent Dispute (FT)

By Richard Waters In San Francisco

Financial Times, October 24, 2006

IBM mounted a rare legal action against Amazon.com on Monday, accusing it of breaching intellectual property rights that underpin the e-commerce company's fundamental online business model.

The case marks an unusual venture into the courts for Big Blue, which has worked hard to paint itself as a fair and willing licenser of its own intellectual property, rather than an aggressive defender of its industry-leading bank of 40,000 patents.

It also carries an ironic twist for Amazon, since the e-commerce company has itself become notorious in the internet industry for its aggressive defence of so-called business method patents. Its attempt to enforce its "one-click" checkout method in a lawsuit against rival Barnesandnoble.com in 1999 has come to be used as a prime example by critics of the US patent system.

IBM said it had filed two cases in Federal court in the Eastern district of Texas accusing Amazon of breaching five of its patents. The patents cover what it claims are a number of fundamental practices in networking and e-commerce, including the use of hypertext links to make recommendations to a customer, methods of presenting and linking to online adverts, and networking architecture for delivering online content faster.

Given how fundamental the patents are, Amazon has "built much if not all of their business on top of our intellectual property", said John Kelly, IBM's senior vice-president for intellectual property.

An Amazon spokesperson said the company had not yet been served with the lawsuits, and so could not comment.

Mr Kelly said IBM had mounted only two other patent lawsuits this decade and that it had only taken action now after trying for four years to persuade Amazon to take out a licence.

IBM Hits Amazon With E-Commerce Patent Suit (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle And Suein Hwang

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

International Business Machines Corp. sued Amazon.com Inc., alleging that the giant Internet retailer is infringing on five IBM patents that a company executive calls "seminal" to electronic commerce.

IBM, Armonk, N.Y., filed two suits seeking unspecified damages in U.S. federal courts in Texas, regarded as a jurisdiction friendly to patent holders. The public tussle is unusual for IBM, which has a massive patent portfolio but rarely appears as a plaintiff in patent suits. Instead, IBM prefers negotiating licensing agreements.

• IBM Pushes for Open Review of U.S. Patents1

1/10/06

• IBM Hires New Patent Consultant2

• Patent Office Examines Amazon's "One Click" Patent3

John E. Kelly III, IBM's top intellectual-property executive, said IBM has been engaged in a back-and-forth with Seattle-based Amazon since 2002 but that negotiations broke off a few weeks ago.

The suits tap into the long-simmering debate over whether patents on methods of doing business should apply on the Internet, where ideas are easily replicated. Critics say patents smother high-tech innovation by cutting out healthy competition, while proponents say they give companies a reason to invest in new technology without fear that it will be immediately copied.

IBM says the five patents at issue -- including one titled "Ordering Items Using an Electronic Catalogue" -- cover a broad swath of Internet shopping's back-office mechanics, encompassing such things as displaying targeted advertising and recommending items for purchase. The latter is one of Amazon's notable features.

An Amazon spokeswoman said she hadn't seen the complaint and declined to comment.

The patents "do apply fundamentally to most, if not all, of e-commerce," Mr. Kelly said. He added that IBM has signed licensing agreements with "many, many other companies," though he declined to name any. IBM brings in about $1 billion each year from licensing deals.

IBM didn't specify damages in its legal filings, but a company spokesman said damages were "potentially in the hundreds of millions of dollars."

In recent years, IBM has walked a thin line on intellectual property. The company has taken a friendly approach to open-source computer programmers wary of patents, by agreeing to donate intellectual property to their efforts. It has also led a public charge aimed at raising quality and paring back the number of duplicative or overbroad patents granted. At the same time, IBM raked in nearly 3,000 patents last year, and for years it has been the nation's biggest recipient of patents.

Amazon itself was on the other end of a well-known patent lawsuit that also addressed issues of how so-called business-method patents apply to the Internet. In 1999, it received a patent for a "one-click" method of shopping online and sued Barnes & Noble.com Inc., claiming the rival infringed on it. The suit was settled in 2002.

Marc Kaufman, a lawyer at Nixon Peabody LLP who isn't involved in the case, says one point tending to IBM's favor is that some patents "have a rather early date for this type of technology." The electronic-catalog patent, for instance, was issued in 1994. That may make it harder for Amazon to claim the technology was widely in use and hence the patents aren't valid.

Mr. Kaufman says IBM has asserted at least some of the patents against other electronic-commerce players -- he cites one that claims to cover product-recommendation systems and another for displaying advertisements -- and has been successful in securing licensing arrangements. He says he can't name the other companies.

Patent attorneys said IBM's move reflects how valuable patent portfolios generally have become to major corporations. Paul R. Gupta, a partner at Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe, said, "We're starting to see an accelerating trend where major companies are suing other major companies."

Shell In $6.9bn Oilsands Move (FT)

By Ed Crooks In London

Financial Times, October 24, 2006

Royal Dutch Shell has delivered a vote of confidence in the potential of Canada's oilsands by offering to buy out the 22 per cent of its Shell Canada subsidiary that it does not already own at a price 22 per cent higher than last Friday's close.

Shell said the purpose of the C$7.7bn ($6.9bn) offer was to continue the simplification of its structure that began with last year's company unification.

Jeroen van der Veer, chief executive, said the deal was an opportunity to integrate Shell Canada fully with its parent company's strategy and operations.

Until now, he said, it had been pursuing the interests of its shareholders, which did not necessarily fit with Royal Dutch Shell's global plans.

The deal will add to Shell's investment in Canadian oilsands, which have this year been hit by concerns over rising costs and the falling price of oil.

Reserves in Alberta are second only to Saudi Arabia's and an increasingly important source of oil for the US. But heavy investment in the region has driven up costs for producers and raised fears over the viability of some projects, particularly if the price of oil falls further.

James Neale, an analyst at Citigroup in London, said: "Shell is, in essence, taking the high commodity price view. It is formulating a strategy based on the implicit view that oil will stay at around its current levels."

Shell has set a target ofproducing 10-15 per cent of its output in "unconventional oil", which includes oilsands and heavy oil, by 2015.

Shell Canada raised eyebrows this year by offering C$2.4bn for BlackRock Ventures, which is expanding production in the Peace River area. The price amounted to about C$4 a barrel of reserves, compared with the C$1.25 that Total paid last year when it acquired Deer Creek Energy.

Analysts said Shell's confidence in these higher-cost sources of oil could be justified because it was a fully integrated company with its own downstream operations to refinethe oil and market the products.

Bob Fryklund of IHS, a consultancy, said: "Down the value chain from in the ground to in the car, you don't know where most value will come: it can depend on complex fiscal regimes. Companies that don't have an integrated approach are going to be a lot more exposed."

Shell is offering C$40 a share for the minority interest in Shell Canada: a 22 per cent premium to Friday's closing price.

Shell Canada shares rose C$9.41, or 29 per cent, to C$42.22 at midday on the Toronto Stock Exchange. Royal Dutch Shell closed 7p lower at 1,810p.

Oil Sands Are A Hot Commodity (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Royal Dutch Shell PLC yesterday offered to pay $6.8 billion for the outstanding shares of Shell Canada Ltd. and gain a greater stake in Canada's oil sands.

The offer is the latest move by major international oil companies to bolster their positions in Canada's oil sands despite high development costs, environmental challenges and high operating costs.

Shell Canada, which is 78 percent owned by Royal Dutch Shell, operates an oil-sands project in the Athabasca region of northeastern Alberta province.

Shell is already producing more than 100,000 barrels a day of oil from the tar-like sands, and the company's share of production there could grow to 500,000 barrels a day within a decade or so.

John Hofmeister, president of Shell Oil Co., the U.S. subsidiary of Royal Dutch/Shell Group, said in Washington yesterday that the oil sands would be a "great boost" to the company and a "great supply source for the United States." Although many analysts have said that oil sands projects are only profitable if oil prices are more than $30 to $35 a barrel, relatively high by industry standards, Hofmeister said that "the easy oil is running out."

The reserves of Canada's oil sands are second in size only to Saudi Arabia's reserves, but extracting the oil is expensive and messy. The oil sands are sand grains surrounded by bitumen, a form of crude oil with the consistency of molasses. Companies either strip-mine the sands, then heat them to extract crude, or they heat the oil sands in the ground and suck up the crude that runs off. Total production from Canada's oil sands is about 1 million barrels a day and oil companies expect that volume to triple or quadruple over time.

Hofmeister also said that the company would be better able to plan across the U.S.-Canada border. That could become more important in the future, when the company may need to ship oil to U.S. refineries capable of turning the heavy oil sands crude into petroleum products such as gasoline or heating oil.

The acquisition also boosts future oil production for Royal Dutch Shell, which in January 2004 wrote down 40 percent of its oil and gas reserves after an audit revealed booking errors. By the end of 2005, Shell's reserves had declined an additional 3.8 percent. Although the Securities and Exchange Commission does not let companies count oil sands as "proved reserves," they are part of Shell's "probable" reserves and are already producing real barrels.

Other big oil companies are also chasing oil sands projects. ConocoPhillips Co. and EnCana Corp. said this month that they would spend more than $10 billion to increase output from the oil sands, and last year Total SA bought another Canadian oil sands producer for $1.7 billion.

Royal Dutch Shell said it would pay $35.32 a share for Shell Canada, 22 percent more than the closing price of the unit's stock at the end of last week. Shell Canada also refines and markets petroleum products and produces natural gas.

Shell Makes Offer To Buy Out Holders In Canadian Unit (WSJ)

By Chip Cummins

DOJ_NMG_0085480

LONDON -- Royal Dutch Shell PLC's $6.84 billion offer to buy out its main Canadian affiliate's minority shareholders, who may hold out for a better deal, will be a major road test for Chief Executive Jeroen van der Veer and his retooled version of the Anglo-Dutch oil company.

In its first big bid under Mr. van der Veer and new Chairman Jorma Ollila, Shell said it had approached the board of Shell Canada Ltd. with an intention to offer shareholders 40 Canadian dollars (US$35.55) a share for the approximately 22% of the Canadian oil producer that the parent company doesn't own.

The move on Shell Canada, a big player in Canada's booming oil-sands developments, is relatively small potatoes for the global oil industry and for Shell, which last year reported a profit of $25.3 billion. And Shell executives have signed far more-complex deals in volatile, oil-rich regions like Nigeria and Russia. Shell Canada's shareholders could put up a drawn-out fight for more cash, testing negotiators at Shell headquarters in The Hague, Netherlands.

In Toronto trading, Shell Canada shares zoomed higher on the Shell approach, gaining 30%, or C$9.75, to C$42.55, above Shell's offer price. That makes it more likely that Shell will have to bump up its offer if it wants to prevent a drawn-out fight with minority shareholders. Shell officials declined to comment on how they feel investors will react to the offer.

"The offer is full and fair," Mr. van der Veer said in an interview.

Shell has posted a spotty record during the years in North American deal making. In 1985, Shell rankled U.S. shareholders with what many considered a poorly executed deal for full ownership of its main American unit, Shell Oil. Shareholder litigation dragged on for years. In 2001, Shell lost a high-profile auction for U.S. natural-gas producer Barrett Resources Corp. to Williams Cos.

Mr. van der Veer was named to the top post at Shell in 2004 amid a scandal over energy-reserves accounting. He led a shake-up of the company, consolidating its two boards and creating for himself a U.S.-style CEO role. A smooth Shell Canada deal could help persuade shareholders that he has simplified Shell's corporate structure, which critics blamed for slowing down decision-making and obscuring accountability.

It would also be the first big deal under Mr. Ollila, the former Nokia Corp. chief executive brought in to monitor how well Shell executes on its turnaround promises.

Amid high oil prices, Mr. van der Veer has outspent his industry peers investing in promising -- but unconventional and costly -- sources of hydrocarbons. One of Shell's favorite regions for expansion has been Western Canada. The company is a leader among the handful of big oil companies that have increased investment in the country's reserves of heavy oil. The deposits are much harder and more expensive to exploit than conventional oil, but in today's high oil-price environment, they have made economic sense.

Shell asked yesterday that Shell Canada establish a special committee of independent directors to supervise a formal, outside valuation and to review the Shell offer and make a recommendation regarding it. Shell said it might not pursue the offer if it doesn't win the support of the Canadian board. Shell said any offer would be conditioned on obtaining more than 50% of the outstanding shares held by minority shareholders.

Last year, Shell Canada reported net income of C$2.01 billion on revenue of C$14.39 billion.

Court Sends Back Ruling In Qualcomm Patent Case (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

Finnish cellphone maker Nokia Corp. won a minor legal victory against Qualcomm Inc. when an appeals court sent back for review a U.S. district court's decision to deny Nokia's motion to stay their patent dispute.

The ruling could potentially delay the legal proceedings if U.S. District Judge Rudi Brewster decides to grant Nokia's motion to stay for further arbitration. In November, Qualcomm sued Nokia for patent infringement despite a patent agreement in place between the two companies.

Qualcomm, of San Diego, dismissed the ruling. "This is a nonsubstantive ruling regarding Nokia's claim," said spokeswoman Emily Kilpatrick. "Nokia is working very hard to delay this case and obstruct with nonsubstantive issues."

Nokia is seeking to have an arbitrator rule on several issues.

Macquarie Bank Makes Hostile Bid For Techem (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

Australia's Macquarie Bank Ltd., which recently bought U.K. utility Thames Water, unveiled a €1.1 billion ($1.4 billion) hostile bid for German utility-services company Techem AG.

Macquarie, Australia's biggest securities company, said Techem rejected the bid, and Macquarie has approached Techem's shareholders directly. A spokesman for Techem declined to comment on Macquarie's statements, but said several investors have shown interest in the company, citing previous statements by Techem Chief Executive Horst Enzelmüller.

Martin Stanley, executive director of the Macquarie subsidiary that launched the takeover bid, Macquarie European Infrastructure Fund II, said in a statement that the bank has approached Techem's shareholders directly, offering them the chance to decide on the transaction.

The Australian bank doesn't plan to change the business model of the energy-metering-services provider and doesn't aim to yield synergies from the potential takeover, Mr. Stanley said. He added that Macquarie's interest is based on Techem's good business model and long-term stable cash flow.

Macquarie said its MEIF II unit offered €44 a share for Techem. The bank and its fund already hold a 17% stake in the Eschborn-based company. Macquarie's offer comes after Techem said last week that it would reject a possible approach by financial investors in case of any offer.

Shares in Techem rose 17% to €49.31 on the DAX.

Techem monitors energy and water use for about six million houses and apartments in Germany and elsewhere in Europe. It also provides sales and rentals of water meters, heating-system maintenance and bill collection.

The takeover offer comes a week after a group led by Macquarie won the battle to buy Thames Water from Germany's biggest power company RWE AG for £4.8 billion ($9 billion), excluding debt.

Merrill Buys Boutique Investment Bank (FT)

By James Politi

Financial Times, October 24, 2006

Merrill Lynch on Monday agreed to buy Petrie Parkman, a boutique investment bank specialising in advisory work on oil and gas deals in North America with more than $100m in annual revenues.

The deal represents a big bet by Merrill on the continuation of high energy prices, which have fuelled a string of mergers and acquisitions, stock listings and debt offerings among US exploration and production companies.

Although the terms of the acquisition were not disclosed, David Trone, an analyst at Fox Pitt-Kelton, said he believed Merrill paid between $500m and $600m.

Petrie, which is based in Colorado and employs 26 senior bankers, last month filed with US regulators to seek a stock market listing, making it the latest in a string of boutique banks to pursue an initial public offering.

Its combination with Merrill could become an alternative model for small banks looking at ways to cash in on their recent growth, although one rival on Monday suggested that the cultural fit might not be ideal. “A lot of these guys are there because they don’t fit well in the bulge-bracket firms,” he said.

Tom Petrie, the 61-year old former US Army captain and First Boston oil analyst who has run Petrie since it was founded in 1989 and owns 38 per cent of the company, will become a vice-chairman at Merrill and a member of the Executive Client Coverage Group.

“We look forward to expanding our client coverage and bringing our enhanced capabilities to the marketplace,” said Victor Nesi, head of Americas investment banking at Merrill.

Merrill already has a strong energy trading and commodities business, and some of those products could be sold to Petrie’s investment banking clients.

Merrill has struggled in the US energy and power M&A rankings this year. According to Thomson Financial, it advised on 13 deals worth a total of $9.6bn. This placed it 13th in the league table, below Petrie which worked on 8 deals worth a total of $10.3bn. Last year, Merrill was in 6th place, while Petrie was in 12th place.

Last year, Petrie generated $75m in revenues, making $4m in net income.

Merrill represented itself in the deal, while Keefe Bruyette advised Petrie.

Separately, Keefe Bruyette, the financial services investment bank, set the price range at which it expects to sell shares to the public in an IPO that could value it as highly as $670m. Keefe Bruyette is offering shares at between $19 and $21 each.

'Rambus' Ruling Is A Standards Landmark (NLJ)

By Pamela A. MacLean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, October 24, 2006

With a single stroke, the Federal Trade Commission may have restored the value of the handshake and good-faith promise among high-tech competitors, yet opened the doors to potential new litigation.

The commission recently issued a landmark decision -- for the first time holding a company liable for an antitrust violation because it used its patents to subvert the process relied on by thousands of companies to set industry standards for products.

The most mundane items of daily life -- from the size of the electric plug to the specifications for computer memory chips -- are standardized through voluntary, nongovernment groups known as standard-setting organizations (SSO). The engineers who meet to establish specifications for new products are encouraged to standardize, both to avoid competitive battles to the death and to satisfy consumer demands that products work together.

Historically, lawyers have had limited roles in SSOs, producing broad agreements to share information that have been vague on future patent obligations.

Then in the 1990s, Rambus Inc. tried to corner the memory chip market by securing key DRAM memory chip patents after it learned what the SSO group would choose as the industry standards. Trust among SSO participants evaporated.

REVERSAL OF FORTUNE

Following years of litigation that went in favor of Rambus, the Federal Trade Commission issued a landmark decision last month that Rambus Inc., a semiconductor technology company, violated antitrust law by secretly securing patents on what it knew would become the industry standard for DRAM memory chips. Rambus, a Los Altos, Calif., memory chip developer, had used the patents to sue for infringement the very companies that adopted the standard. In the Matter of Rambus Inc. (FTC docket 9302).

The FTC antitrust finding against Rambus was a reversal of fortunes for the standard-setting organizations.

What remains unclear in the wake of the FTC's Rambus decision is what the standard-setting organizations will do now with their newfound power.

Two emerging trends would have some SSOs stick with vague promises that members will only seek "reasonable and nondiscriminatory" (RAND) licensing royalties to pay for patents covered in new standards, while others want to negotiate potential licensing fees upfront, before a standard is set, which is known as "ex ante" terms.

"This decision was the first by the FTC imposing antitrust liability on a single company for its conduct in subverting a standard-setting organization," said Sean Royall, former deputy director of the FTC's Bureau of Competition and lead attorney in the case against Rambus. Royall is a co-chairman of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher's antitrust practice and divides time between the Los Angeles firm's Dallas and Washington offices.

The members of the Joint Electron Device Engineering Council "unknowingly helped create and then walked into an extremely expensive trap laid by Rambus," wrote Andrew Updegrove, an attorney with Boston's Gesmer Updegrove in urging the FTC to hold Rambus liable for antitrust violations. He represented a dozen SSOs in amicus papers.

The role of SSOs is particularly critical in high-tech fields where intellectual property rights are at stake. For JEDEC, it dictated a standard of design for millions of DRAM chips worth billions of dollars in royalties for anyone with design patents.

The groups have no police power to enforce member conduct but have relied on good-faith member pledges or loose agreements to disclose potential patent claims prior to standard setting. Members may also be asked to promise to license patents on a reasonable and nondiscriminatory basis.

UNRESOLVED ISSUES

But the danger of participants in standards groups running afoul of antitrust law by discussing specific patent royalties or how the patent might be licensed creates skittishness about ex ante licensing negotiation.

This is particularly important in some products covered by multiple patents, such as cellphones, that may have photo, video, recording and other capabilities that all may require patent royalty payments.

"A lot of organizations seem reluctant to adopt clear standards regulating IP that covers the standard," said Mark Lemley, a Stanford Law School professor and authority on standard-setting issues.

"Some organizations have expressed worries that they might be liable for antitrust if they agree to royalty rates, although the FTC made clear last year that is not a big problem," Lemley said.

He said: If an organization requires members to agree to license for RAND terms, does that mean any future disputes will be over what is a reasonable price?

"That is a contract fight," Lemley said. "Or is that just an organizational rule and a patent owner still can sue for reasonable royalties? Does the patent owner decide the royalty or is it set by a court?"

"Does the patent owner get to bring tools of patent infringement to bear and seek treble damages ... and attorney fees? That is a much more powerful threat ... rather than to sue for reasonable terms," he said. These are substantial issues not yet addressed by appeals courts, Lemley said.

Royall noted that "[c]ompanies that operate in good faith have nothing to fear. I don't think SSOs need to fear that their routine activities suddenly are going to become subject to antitrust inquiries or government intervention. The Rambus case had extreme facts."

Douglas Melamed, an antitrust attorney in Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr's Washington office who has represented Rambus and other high-tech firms, said that "A lot of people were very surprised by the commission's decision and saw it as far reaching."

He said standards bodies seem to be requiring members to commit to RAND disclosure. He doesn't believe the Rambus decision affected that trend.

"The whole area of antitrust in standard setting is an area of uncertainty in the law. It is just beginning to be sorted out by the courts and that will continue for a number of years," he said.

Whether standards groups will prefer more general promises to "be reasonable" under RAND terms, rather than more specific fixed terms under ex ante negotiation that hold antitrust risks, Royall could not predict. But he pointed out that the chairman of the FTC "has suggested ex ante discussion is not likely to be per se unlawful."

PUSH FOR EX ANTE

Five big companies, Cisco Systems Inc., Sun Microsystems Inc., International Business Machines Corp., Apple Corp. and Hewlett Packard Co. have been pushing the U.S. Department of Justice to approve ex ante licensing, according to Updegrove.

Gil Ohana, director of antitrust and competition for Cisco, said that his company, along with Sun and H-P, are strong proponents of ex ante licensing so members know upfront the licensing cost of a patent.

"Our hope is that SSOs both improve the rules on patent and patent applications so it is clearer they have to be disclosed, but also on ex ante permission, to encourage or require it when intellectual property is disclosed," he said.

Current SSO rules bar disclosure of licensing terms beyond RAND, which hurts the process, he said.

Ohana said there's a growing consensus among standard-setting participants that "these rules should change to permit patentees to state the terms on which they will license their patents in detail before a standard is adopted."

He urged government antitrust enforcers to publicly reject the view that SSOs must limit disclosure of terms to RAND to protect themselves.

He pointed to the recent New Jersey antitrust suit by Broadcom Corp. against Qualcomm Inc., two wireless communications companies. Qualcomm argued that it made a RAND commitment for patents in its standard-setting group but that did not prevent it from charging what the market would bear for patents, he said.

U.S. District Judge Mary L. Cooper threw out Broadcom's federal antitrust claims but held that remaining state law unfair competition and breach of contract claims could be pursued in state court. Broadcom v. Qualcomm, No. C05-3350MLC (D.N.J.).

"What this means in my view, if a company is relying on RAND commitment to indicate a patent will be available on favorable terms, that may not be right. You need to get something more explicit," Ohana said.

The Rambus decision means there may be a duty of good faith on the part of a patent holder, even if it strictly complies with an organization's disclosure rules, he said. "There has already been an uptick in the assertion of defenses [to patent infringement claims] on this theory," he said.

Royall noted, "I would advise companies to be careful of what is expected of them in standards organizations. To the extent there are unwritten expectations, don't participate in standard-setting activity unless you are prepared to do what is required."

2 Groups Challenge Easing Of Media Rules (FINDLAW/AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 24, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Easing government rules to allow more media consolidation would push out niche radio programming such as classical, jazz and gospel music while doing little to improve local TV coverage, new studies say.

Reports released Monday by two public interest groups, the Benton Foundation and the Social Science Research Council, challenged the Federal Communications Commission's argument that media consolidation would improve local coverage and programming due to synergy effects.

The FCC is reviewing the issue following a failed 2003 attempt to loosen media ownership restrictions.

"These studies make clear that there is no support for the contention that media consolidation correlates with better, more local or more diverse media content," said Gloria Tristani, a former FCC commissioner and president of the Benton Foundation.

The FCC in June reopened the hotly disputed issue of ownership limits, including the number of radio and television stations that one owner can have and restrictions on cross-ownership between newspapers and broadcasters.

Former FCC Chairman Michael Powell pushed through loosened rules in 2003, but a federal appeals court threw them out on grounds that the FCC compiled an insufficient record to justify them.

The 2003 changes would have let one corporation own - in a single community - up to three TV stations, eight radio stations, the cable system, the only daily newspaper and the biggest Internet provider, according to Democratic commissioners who opposed the plan.

According to the studies released Monday:

-A radio company that owns more stations in a local market was less likely to offer niche formats such as easy listening, bluegrass, tejano and classical music, despite the company's greater opportunities, given its size, to do so.

-Cross-owned TV stations were more likely to offer local news, in part because larger news stations were usually the ones targeted for acquisition by newspapers. But when factoring out market size, the cross-owned ones did not provide more news than other stations in the local news business.

-Media ownership opportunities for women and minority groups remained limited. Of the 12,844 radio and television stations that filed reports with the FCC in 2005, women own 3.4 percent and minorities own 3.6 percent.

Many of the broadcast television networks and large media companies including the Tribune Co., Gannett Co. and the New York Times Co. have supported loosened rules, saying current restrictions are outmoded in a digital age in which consumers also have the Internet and cable TV to choose from.

The FCC has scheduled several hearings and allowed 120 days for public comment, which expires Monday. Current FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has supported eliminating the three-decade-old flat ban on cross-ownership.

The fate of media ownership proposals could be determined in part by the November congressional elections.

A switch to Democratic control in the House would likely hamper any attempts to let media conglomerates own more TV stations. In the Senate, Democrats such as John Kerry of Massachusetts and Barack Obama of Illinois - two possible 2008 presidential contenders - have called on the agency to consider diversity when reviewing ownership rules.

The FCC and its staff declined to predict how long the review process will take. The agency held its first public hearing in Los Angeles earlier this month.

Crossed Lines Bitter Battle By Telecom Titans In Europe Heads To U.S. Courts (WSJ)

By Leila Abboud And Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

Vivendi, Stymied in Poland By Deutsche Telekom, Files a RICO Lawsuit Wealthy Partner Shifts Sides

On a cold afternoon in March of last year, security guards stormed the Warsaw offices of Polish mobile-phone firm Polska Telefonia Cyfrowa Sp. z o.o. The guards, armed with pistols, rounded up three top executives from French media giant Vivendi SA, a part-owner of the Polish company, and pushed them into the street. When one Vivendi manager locked himself in his office, the guards broke down the door.

"It was complete chaos. It was like a siege," says Philippe Houdouin, Vivendi's top official in Poland, who witnessed the events from the sidewalk after rushing to the scene. Mr. Houdouin says that back at his own office elsewhere in Warsaw, he had to protect a stack of documents with his body when the guards sought to cart them away.

For Vivendi, it was a disastrous turn in what so far has been a losing seven-year battle to recoup a major investment in Poland. Vivendi executives haven't been able to get back into their offices at the Warsaw cellphone firm, known as PTC, since last year's raid. Their former business partners in Poland have turned into enemies. And despite some 50 court cases in several European countries, Vivendi hasn't been able to recover a trace of the $2.5 billion it has put into PTC over the years.

Vivendi now is upping the legal stakes. Yesterday it filed suit in U.S. District Court in Seattle against its two rivals for control of the Polish investment: German telephone giant Deutsche Telekom AG and a wealthy Polish investor named Zygmunt Solorz-Zak. Vivendi filed the civil suit under the U.S. RICO law, originally designed to nab gangsters, accusing the defendants of conspiring to seize control of the Polish cellphone company by stealing Vivendi's stake in it. The suit asks for $7.5 billion in damages, or three times Vivendi's investment, because RICO -- the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations law -- permits a tripling of damages.

The battle shows how hotly contested the world's telecom markets have been for Western phone giants, as their fortunes weaken at home. The fight is especially important for Vivendi as it tries to shake off the vestiges of a troubled past under a former chief executive, Jean-Marie Messier, who launched an ill-fated $100 billion acquisition spree. The acquisitions turned the French environmental and water company into the telecom and entertainment business it is now. Along the way, Vivendi owned Universal Studios before selling it to General Electric Co. in 2002.

Over the years, Vivendi has tried to sell, litigate and negotiate its way out of the mess in Poland, to no avail. If Vivendi can reclaim what it says is its rightful share of the Polish mobile-phone company or recover some of its investment, it could further its international expansion plans. But losing would deal Vivendi a major blow, ceding one of Europe's fastest-growing markets to a competitor.

"We can't let improper behavior take over a legitimate business and defy legal principles," says Chief Executive Jean-Bernard Lévy. "Two billion euros went out of the Vivendi door. They have to come back in."

A spokesman for Deutsche Telekom, speaking shortly before the suit was filed, said any allegation that the German company acted outside the law was "absurd." The spokesman, Andreas Leigers, accused Vivendi of "slanderous" actions and maintained that numerous court rulings hold that Deutsche Telekom is the rightful owner of the Polish cellphone company. Asked about the suit after it was filed late yesterday, Mr. Leigers said he hadn't seen the filing and couldn't immediately comment on it.

Mr. Solorz-Zak wasn't available to respond to Vivendi's allegations, said a spokeswoman for Elektrim SA, a Polish holding company that he controls. The spokeswoman, Ewa Bojar, said Vivendi "disregards, ignores and distorts" court rulings that have gone against it in the long-running legal battle.

Vivendi got wind of an opportunity in Poland in 1999. Elektrim, the Polish conglomerate now controlled by Mr. Solorz-Zak, held 37% of PTC. It needed cash to buy out some minority shareholders and increase its stake. Vivendi offered to invest €1.8 billion in a company that it and Elektrim would jointly own. The joint venture would control 51% of PTC shares.

Vivendi had high hopes for the Polish market. It "was still very underdeveloped," says Mr. Houdouin. Poland was to be one of the pillars of Vivendi's push abroad.

Deutsche Telekom already owned 22.5% of PTC. The German company was making an aggressive bet on Poland, and it soon bought out minority shareholders to double its stake to just under 50%. Vivendi's entrance represented a threat, and Deutsche Telekom tried to stop the French firm.

Deutsche Telekom argued that under a longstanding shareholder pact, Elektrim couldn't bring in a new partner without the unanimous approval of PTC's supervisory board. It also maintained that Elektrim's misstep triggered a right that Deutsche Telekom had to acquire Elektrim's stake in PTC at book value. That would give Deutsche Telekom control of the Polish company.

The parties took the dispute to an arbitrator in Vienna. Meanwhile, PTC was run by a CEO and two other executives chosen by Vivendi and Elektrim, as well as by two executives named by the Germans. On PTC's board were four members each from the Deutsche Telekom and the Elektrim-Vivendi sides plus an independent.

Mr. Houdouin recalls the period fondly: "PTC was doing very well. We focused on ... marketing innovation and growth. My job was to make the company as profitable and valuable as possible." But by 2003, he says, "we could see that things were changing."

Elektrim had been taken over by Mr. Solorz-Zak. One of Poland's richest men, Mr. Solorz-Zak had begun as an importer. After the communist era ended in Poland in 1989, he started what became Poland's biggest private television channel, Polsat, giving him wide influence.

PTC's Polish, French and German managers began to bicker. Vivendi blames Mr. Solorz-Zak for the tension, saying that after he joined PTC's supervisory board, tussles over strategy, refinancing and the distribution of dividends followed. "Our life in PTC became hell. Every decision was hostile," Mr. Houdouin says.

In early 2004, Mr. Solorz-Zak fired the law firm that represented Vivendi and Elektrim in the Vienna arbitration against Deutsche Telekom. He hired his own lawyers instead. A month later, he sent a terse letter informing Vivendi that he considered the joint-venture pact that Vivendi and Elektrim had signed in 1999 to be void.

Vivendi was perplexed. At first, "we just thought he wanted more money," says Bruno Curis, a lawyer for Vivendi, noting that Elektrim was under pressure from its bondholders. But Vivendi took the letter as a clear sign its Poland investment was in trouble and decided to cut the cord. It began negotiations toward a settlement with Deutsche Telekom.

In mid-2004, according to Vivendi, terms were drafted in which Deutsche Telekom would buy out Elektrim and Vivendi's stakes in PTC for €1.3 billion. Vivendi would end up booking a loss of around €1 billion on its investment. Vivendi says it was willing to swallow this bitter pill to put behind it one of the missteps of the Messier era. According to Vivendi, Deutsche Telekom Chief Financial Officer Karl-Gerhard Eick in late August 2004 told his Vivendi counterpart, Jacques Espinasse, that they had a deal and "you can put champagne in the fridge."

But in early September, Mr. Eick sent Mr. Espinasse a one-line letter saying, "We are unable to conclude your proposed transaction at this time." Vivendi's Mr. Curis says, "We were distraught. We were confused. We just didn't understand what had happened. It was extremely frustrating for those of us who had spent months on the negotiations."

Deutsche Telekom's spokesman said that no deal had ever been reached. He denied that Mr. Eick had made the comment about champagne.

The French company says that a few weeks later it got a clue about what was going on. A Vivendi executive, Michel Picot, was invited to meet a former Elektrim executive for breakfast at the Hotel George V in Paris. According to Vivendi, the Elektrim man said his company had received a tip that the arbitrators in Vienna would rule invalid the 1999 share transfer that created the Elektrim-Vivendi joint venture. He said Elektrim planned to use the ruling to get out of the joint-venture obligations it had to Vivendi, according to an affidavit by Mr. Picot.

Deutsche Telekom's spokesman said any implication that the German company benefited from insider knowledge of an arbitration tribunal's deliberations is "absurd." In any case, in November 2004, the Vienna arbitration panel did indeed rule that Elektrim hadn't been in a position to transfer shares to the joint venture in 1999.

But the arbitrators also said they didn't have any jurisdiction over the joint venture. Deutsche Telekom and Vivendi both claimed victory. Vivendi says it was so unclear what the arbitration decision actually meant that it hired 10 different law firms to analyze it. It also filed an appeal to the Commercial Court in Austria.

The arbitration ruling needed to be ratified by a Warsaw court. At a hearing in the Warsaw courtroom in early 2005, Vivendi says it had its worst suspicions confirmed: Lawyers for its former partner Elektrim sided with Deutsche Telekom to argue that Vivendi had no right to PTC shares. "We knew that day that Elektrim had betrayed us," Mr. Curis says.

Elektrim didn't respond to requests to characterize its relationship with Deutsche Telekom.

Representatives of Deutsche Telekom and Elektrim then rewrote PTC's shareholder registry, wiping out Vivendi's stake on paper. It was a few days later that PTC's security guards physically removed the French company's executives from the premises.

Since then, court cases have proliferated and appeals have multiplied in several European countries, with the warring sides claiming victories on different fronts. Earlier this year, Vivendi thought it was close to resolving the matter. It says Elektrim and Deutsche Telekom had accepted a proposal that Vivendi and Deutsche Telekom buy out Elektrim and run PTC as a 50/50 joint venture.

On March 29, Vivendi says, lawyers for the three companies sat in a Warsaw office putting the finishing touches on the documents as Vivendi's Mr. Lévy prepared to fly to Poland for a celebratory news conference. Then word arrived of a Polish court ruling in favor of Deutsche Telekom. The German negotiators quickly packed up and left the building without signing the final document.

The Deutsche Telekom spokesman, Mr. Leigers, declined to get into specifics but said that a deal had never been reached. He accused Vivendi of regularly misrepresenting events in the longstanding dispute over PTC.

The battle intensified this fall. Deutsche Telekom said in September it had exercised its right to buy Elektrim's stake -- boosting its PTC holding to 97% -- and had installed a chief executive at the Polish company.

Vivendi dismissed the move as illegal and followed up by offering Deutsche Telekom €2.5 billion for its undisputed 49% stake in PTC.

So exactly who owns what part of PTC remains a mystery: Despite its public statement that it has 97%, Deutsche Telekom recognizes only a 49% stake on its own books.

The German company says it made an initial payment of €600 million for Elektrim's stake in October. It won't say to whom it paid the money, citing the continuing litigation. Elektrim, which is in bankruptcy proceedings in Poland after defaulting on bond payments, is staying mum.

Mr. Houdouin's business card still says the Vivendi executive heads the management board of PTC. But he is watching the Warsaw company from afar as his former German colleagues at PTC run it. Interviewed at a Paris hotel, Mr. Houdouin says, "I have to believe that things will turn around."

Legal experts said it could be difficult to convince a judge that a RICO case involving European companies should be heard on U.S. soil. "Judges have a natural resistance to having a case brought to them that has been tried elsewhere and has been bogged down," said John Coffee, a professor at Columbia Law School.

Lanny Davis, a former White House special counsel whom Vivendi has hired to pursue the RICO case, maintained that U.S. courts have jurisdiction because Deutsche Telekom has both a stock listing in the U.S. and significant U.S. business: the wireless unit T-Mobile USA, based in Bellevue, Wash. Should the case be allowed to proceed, Vivendi would gain subpoena and "discovery" powers that would give it access to internal documents of Deutsche Telekom and Mr. Solorz-Zak.

2 Men Arrested On A Ledge At NOAA Building (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

A pair of environmentalists, protesting what they said are attempts to suppress evidence of global warming, were arrested yesterday after spending several hours perched on a ledge at a National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration building in Silver Spring.

After 8 a.m., the two men used an extension ladder to climb to a roughly 25-foot-high ledge at the building, in the 1300 block of East West Highway, an associate said. They carried a banner reading, "Bush: Let NOAA Tell the Truth" and brought food and drink with them. Other protesters stayed on the sidewalk below.

Authorities tried, without success, to persuade the protesters to leave the ledge, said Lucille Baur, a Montgomery County police spokeswoman. Shortly after noon, officers borrowed a cherry picker from a construction site and brought the men down without a struggle, she said.

The two protesters were charged with disorderly conduct, reckless endangerment and trespassing, Baur said. They were identified as Paul E. Burman, 24, of Arlington and John Theodore Glick, 57, of Bloomfield, N.J.

The two men are members of a group called the U.S. Climate Emergency Council, said Mike Tidwell, the group's director. The group contends that NOAA officials are playing down scientists' findings about the dangers of global warming, including its connection to extreme weather events such as hurricanes and heat waves.

"They are failing at their job," Tidwell said. "They are suppressing scientific information because it is inconvenient data for the Bush administration's fossil-fuel constituency."

A More Efficient US? Energy Agency Prods Only A Bit. (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, October 24, 2006

Under pressure to find new ways to save energy, the US Department of Energy is speeding adoption of new efficiency standards for devices ranging from pool heaters to microwave ovens. President Bush is apparently on board, too, pushing the need for energy conservation in a speech earlier this month.

That's good news for energy advocates and states that have sued DOE for lagging years behind schedule on new appliance standards, which could curb the nation's rising appetite for electricity.

But in the three standards it has proposed itself, the department has set a far lower bar than efficiency advocates had wanted. Two of the standards are so low that even some industry officials are complaining. Earlier this month, DOE surprised nearly everyone by nixing on technical grounds a proposal for home boilers backed by industry and consumer groups.

"It's never happened before that they've rejected a negotiated standard," says Charles Samuels, a Boston lawyer who often represents the Association of Home Appliance Manufacturers.

Such moves are causing many observers - from efficiency advocates to members of Congress - to question how deeply DOE is committed to energy efficiency, despite Mr. Bush's rhetoric.

"We need to continue what we're doing at the federal level, which is ... to find new ways to power our economy, new ways to conserve, new ways to protect the environment through new technologies," he told a renewable energy conference in St. Louis two weeks ago.

Deep-sixing the home-boiler standard has caused the most surprise. Home boilers are used in hot-water and steam heating systems. The efficiency standard that industry and consumer groups had negotiated would have saved users of those systems a total of some $2.6 billion in energy costs through 2030. But in an Oct. 6 response, DOE said: "The Department has determined that the recommended standards are beyond the scope of its legal authority." Instead, it proposed a lower standard expected to save consumers an estimated $1.2 billion through 2030.

Efficiency advocates were upset. So was industry. "We were surprised and disappointed by the decision," says Joseph Mattingly, vice president and general counsel for the Gas Appliance Manufacturers Association. "I've looked into the legislative history. They [DOE officials] have their interpretation of the law. But I haven't found anything to support it."

Admittedly, setting standards is complex, because it involves balancing many factors.

For example: On the same day the DOE rejected the boiler standard, for example, it also rebuffed a tough proposed standard for home furnaces. The American Council for an Energy Efficient Economy was pushing for standards it claims would save about $8 billion of furnace energy over 20 years. Instead, the DOE proposed a standard that 99 percent of furnaces sold in the US already meet.

The reason? The DOE said the more aggressive proposal crossed a legal line. The plan called for regional standards - a tough one for northern states, an easier one in southern states - while the law calls for a single nationwide standard, it argued.

"We have to follow our statutory requirements when evaluating where the current standards are," says David Rodgers, acting deputy assistant secretary for technology development in the DOE's energy efficiency office. "We propose the maximum technology that is feasible and economically justified."

The ACEEE is crying foul. "This is just letting an overly narrow view of the law get in the way of achieving the purpose of the act," says Steve Nadel, the group's executive director.

Some analysts say the department's choices may be the best possible given the pressure from industry and sniping from energy advocates.

"What plaintiffs in those [standards lawsuits] against DOE are still unwilling to accept is that it is really their own actions, along with those of industry, that are piling up legislation and rulemaking agreements," says Mr. Samuels, the Boston lawyer. With dozens of complex rulemakings, the DOE reached gridlock last year, he adds. "The resources were never close to handling the load."

Other analysts, however, note that it took the Bush administration six years to propose its first efficiency standard - for transformers, in August. Even there, the DOE sidestepped several tough standards that were much more energy and cost-effective than the one it proposed.

Executives of nine large electric utilities upbraided the department for not taking a tougher stand. "Given the energy challenges which face the nation, now is not the time to back away from energy savings shown by the DOE to be cost effective," they wrote Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman in a Sept. 26 letter. "We strongly urge you to strengthen the proposed ... transformer standard."

Utility executives were joined by New Mexico's two senators, Pete Domenici (R) and Jeff Bingaman (D), who sit on a committee that oversees the DOE. They chided the department in an Oct. 6 letter for passing over a stronger standard they say would have saved 50 percent more energy.

"At a time when improvements in energy efficiency are critical to our energy security, we believe it does not make sense to ignore these cost-effective energy savings," they wrote.

Frustrated by the DOE's pace, Congress itself rammed through efficiency standards on clothes washers, ceiling fans, and more than a dozen other appliances as part of the Energy Policy Act of 2005, observers say.

An Energy Ruling That's Simply Hot Air (WP)

By Cindy Skrzycki

The Energy Department has decided to keep the home fires burning at about the same level as they are now, even in the face of lobbying by both energy conservation groups and some manufacturers.

A proposed "energy conservation standard" that the department unveiled Oct. 6 moved the energy-efficiency needle almost imperceptibly for home gas furnaces -- to 80 percent from 78 percent, the standard set in 1989. The agency rejected an option to raise the standard to 90 percent, which would have saved more energy and trimmed heating bills for consumers in colder climates.

The long-awaited announcement frustrated energy groups that lobbied for a significant increase in efficiency, as well as parts of the industry that wanted to see more robust standards for some heating units.

Department officials said a higher standard wouldn't have been cost-effective for those in states with mild winters to have only the option of buying a furnace that is 90 percent efficient, which means it turns 90 percent of the fuel into heat.

The department also turned down some innovative ideas from energy groups and manufacturers, saying it didn't have the authority to act. The agency rejected the idea of a regional standard, which would make the highest efficiency rating applicable only to the coldest states. Instead, it said states could apply for exemptions to the rule if they wanted a tougher standard.

The regulators also gave thumbs down to a plan advanced by the boiler industry and energy groups to increase efficiency in gas models. They proposed eliminating pilot lights and installing a reset mechanism that automatically adjusts to the outside air temperature.

Setting the standard at 80 percent represents virtually no change, since almost all new regular gas furnaces are at least that efficient.

Furnace makers such as Trane, a division of American Standard Cos. ; Carrier Corp., a division of United Technologies Corp. ; and Lennox International Inc. also sell products that are more than 90 percent efficient. Sales of those models have been brisk in Northeastern states. And three states -- Vermont, Massachusetts and Rhode Island -- have passed laws setting the requirement for gas furnaces at 90 percent, a standard that has to be approved by federal regulators.

Massachusetts residents would pay about $540 more for a furnace rated 90 percent than for a basic unit, yet they could save $125 a year on energy use, according to estimates by the Appliance Standards Awareness Project , a business and consumer-advocacy group in Boston.

The Energy Department "seems to be looking for the narrowest possible way to comply with the law, and cost-effective energy savings were clearly of secondary importance," said Steven Nadel , executive director of the American Council for an Energy-Efficient Economy , a nonprofit research group based in the District.

There is intense interest in the proposal because 3.5 million gas furnaces and 300,000 residential boilers were sold last year.

Department officials said that in rejecting a higher standard, they took into account manufacturers' concerns that there were potential condensation and venting problems when efficiency ratings are set between 80 and 90 percent.

"The department's proposal sets a national standard but still gives states as much flexibility as we can under the statute," said David Rodgers , acting deputy assistant secretary for technology development in the department's Office of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy .

Rodgers said the law requires the agency to consider standards that are economically justifiable and technologically feasible and that save a significant amount of energy.

Under the Energy Policy and Conservation Act, the Energy Department is charged with reviewing the efficiency of commercial and residential appliances and equipment, including refrigerators, washers and dryers, air conditioning and furnaces.

The agency has fallen years behind in issuing the efficiency standards and is under pressure from Congress to get on a schedule and stick with it. In September 2005, the Natural Resources Defense Council , a national environmental group, joined with 15 states and two consumer organizations in going to court in New York. They asked that the department face a legally binding deadline for issuing 22 energy-efficiency standards -- including this one.

In a report to Congress last January, the agency said it is committed to addressing the backlog and has set "firm and achievable" schedules.

In the case of furnaces and boilers, work on a new standard began in 1993 but didn't receive priority status at the Energy Department until 2001. The first published notice of a rulemaking came in July 2004, and the department expects to complete the rule sometime next year. Much to the chagrin of energy advocates, it said the effective date won't be until Jan. 1, 2015.

"It's absurd to set such a weak standard and not implement until 2015," said Andrew deLaski , executive director of the Appliance Standards Awareness Project.

Joseph Mattingly , general counsel for the Gas Appliance Manufacturers Association in Arlington, said the industry urged setting the standard at 80 percent because that level avoids safety concerns.

"In a perfect world, the units would be installed according to manufacturers' instructions, so we have to have something that is forgiving of less-than-perfect installation," Mattingly said. He said consumers who don't live in cold-weather states were not likely to need a high-efficiency furnace.

Energy advocates tried to address cost and safety issues by supporting a regional standard: 90 percent for cold Northern states and 80 percent for warmer states.

The industry opposed that and likes the idea of states setting their own standards even less. It told the Energy Department that encouraging states to override the federal standard is "an abuse of discretion."

A big disappointment for both sides was the department's rejection of an agreement among 28 manufacturers of oil and gas boilers and four energy-efficiency organizations.

"DOE at every juncture finds a reason to follow a less energy-efficient path," deLaski said. "Even when business says, 'Give us more efficiency,' they say no."

Mattingly said the industry will ask the department to make a "limited policy exemption" to accept the agreement. Energy groups said adopting it would save twice as much energy for gas boilers than the standard the department proposed.

Risky Renewable Business (WT)

By Charles Vinick

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

Five years ago, when developers applied for a federal permit to build the world's largest offshore wind-energy project off the Cape Cod coast, a widely held presumption was that the project ought to go forward because wind power is inherently good and that Nantucket Sound was as good a place as any to begin the off-shore renewable energy movement.

But the Cape Wind project hasn't moved forward and remains mired in controversy as evidence piles up that its developers chose perhaps the worst location. So, instead of leading the renewable energy movement into the future, Cape Wind may be imperiling that very movement by ignoring legitimate and serious flaws in its project.

Consider the record now confronting this project:

n In a study released Sept. 28, the Department of Defense announced that wind plants can interfere with military radar systems if built in the radar's line of sight. The early warning radar (PAVE PAWS) at Cape Cod Air Force Station is one of only two such systems in the continental U.S. and is near the site selected by Cape Wind for their proposed complex of 130 turbines, each now 440 feet in height. Early warning radars are necessary to detect and track objects at extreme ranges, with high confidence and accuracy, and are critical to national security.

n Earlier this year, Congress mandated that the Coast Guard assess navigation hazards posed by the Cape Wind project in Nantucket Sound because the project's location, which is in a very high vessel traffic area within a triangle bordered by ferry routes and the main shipping lane, clearly puts passenger travel and general maritime traffic at risk.

n The developer finally disclosed in a recent report to the federal Minerals Management Service (MMS), now responsible for the federal permit review process, that if its storage tanks holding 40,000 gallons of transformer oil are breached and spill their contents into Nantucket Sound, the oil has a better than 90 percent chance of reaching and soiling Sound-facing beaches (not to mention the devastating impact on wildlife).

n More than 400,000 flights a year through Nantucket Sound airspace would have to pass just above a field of 130 turbines, each 440 feet tall, just 60 feet short of the 500-foot floor that small aircraft fly above. Cape Approach air traffic controllers long ago dubbed this project "an accident waiting to happen." The Defense Department study acknowledges the need for the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) to undertake additional testing of radar interference with air traffic control radar systems.

And still Cape Wind shrugs its shoulders, implying that there are no serious issues.

When Rep. William Delahunt, Massachusetts Democrat, called for the FAA to study radar interference and the project's potential risk to aviation, Cape Wind dismissed the request as "desperate" and "suspect."

The very same government that promotes the development of renewable energy must also make assessments along the way about the appropriateness of individual projects and whether or not the public's best interests are being served or whether the projects pose unacceptable risks. That is neither desperate nor suspect, but a responsible reaction when lives are potentially at risk.

Saying no to Cape Wind is not saying no to offshore wind energy; it is simply an acknowledgement that legitimate concerns over public safety, wildlife endangerment and economic impacts -- to name a few of the leading concerns -- outweigh any benefits that might come from siting Cape Wind in Nantucket Sound.

And there was nothing desperate or suspect when Cape and Island communities insisted on a legitimate assessment of oil spill risk even though the developer dragged its heels on producing such an assessment. It is no wonder that they wouldn't want communities to know that 40,000 gallons of a potentially toxic substance sits just off their beaches, but we have a right to know and they have a duty to tell us.

Cape Wind long ago tried to frame this as a battle between wealthy landowners and a benevolent developer trying to lead the country to energy independence. But this has always been about whether that developer should be allowed to enrich himself from publicly owned land and publicly funded subsidies and tax credits in the middle of a state-protected marine sanctuary while putting our safety and our very culture at risk.

It appears that Cape Wind has finally reached the tipping point, and that the answer is no. We need to view the $1.3 billion in state and federal subsidies that Cape Wind would reap from this project as our money, our investment in renewable energy, and take that off the table so we can look to more viable projects in which to invest public funds and resources.

Lead Poisoning Eyed As Threat To California Condor (USAT)

By John Ritter

USA Today, October 24, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — One of the great feel-good environmental stories of the past 30 years is the recovery of the majestic California condor, North America's largest bird, a scavenger-turned-billboard for the campaign to save endangered species.

On the brink of extinction, saved by a captive-breeding program, the condor population has grown from just 22 birds in 1982 to 289 today; 135 are in the wild and more are released every year.

Even so, condors have failed to gain a secure foothold in the hills and deserts of California and Arizona because of lead poisoning, the most often diagnosed cause of death, environmentalists say.

Environmental groups say the most likely source is condors' eating of game that was shot by hunters using lead bullets. Frustrated that most hunters have not switched to substitutes, the Natural Resources Defense Council (NRDC) and other groups notified California officials in July that they will sue under the Endangered Species Act to force a ban.

At a meeting of state fish and game staff this month to discuss potential hunting-rule changes to recommend, the groups again asked for a ban on lead ammunition. A decision is likely early next year. Lead shot used in shotguns to hunt waterfowl has been prohibited since the 1980s.

Andrew Wexler of the NRDC's endangered species project says, “The commissioners have a historic opportunity. It's a mystery why they've resisted a ban because the scientific evidence is so overwhelming.”

That evidence isn't conclusive, says Steve Williams, president of the Wildlife Management Institute, whose goal is to restore North American wildlife. “There are other potential pathways for lead,” says Williams, a former director of the Fish and Wildlife Service in the Bush administration. “I wouldn't speculate on what those other sources may be.” He's “happy to learn that hunters are taking action on their own” but says more study is needed.

Many hunters who have tried alternatives, mainly copper bullets that don't poison wildlife, find them as good or better than traditional ammunition, though more expensive. A high-performance copper bullet costs $2 to $2.50, about $1 more than lead.

At a “free shoot” last weekend at a range near Pinnacles National Monument in Central California — prime condor habitat — hunters and ranchers were invited to try copper bullets. In questionnaires filled out afterward, more than 90% approved.

Some groups, such as the National Shooting Sports Foundation, oppose a ban, though they support efforts to reduce lead exposure in condors and other animals that feed on carrion, eagles among them. These groups say voluntary hunting practices would achieve the same goal, including removing carcasses from the field and burying “gut piles,” an animal's inedible portions.

"Clearly hunters have shown in studies that they're very willing to adopt one of those management steps," says Rick Patterson, director of the shooting foundation, which sets standards for firearms and ammunition manufacturing. He says studies have shown that some hunters resist the added cost of copper bullets.

The coalition that threatened the lawsuit says a July study that analyzed blood of condors in the wild and compared it with blood of captive birds proves that lead from bullets is poisoning and killing condors.

The study in the journal Environmental Science & Technology was the first to identify a lead isotope in bullets bought at retail outlets in condor country and then match it to lead found in condor blood. Twenty of 26 condors sampled had high lead levels, and many exceeded levels toxic to humans.

"It's very analogous to situations we still encounter with kids who eat chips of lead-based paint," says Donald Smith, a professor of environmental toxicology at the University of California, Santa Cruz, who worked on the study. "The chip might be small but have very high levels of lead in it, and it doesn't take much to cause lead poisoning."

Supporters of a lead ban say hunters and their families also are at risk. Studies in Greenland and Canada have found elevated lead levels in people who eat seabirds and other animals shot with lead ammunition. On contact, a lead bullet fragments into tiny pieces and powder that disperses well beyond the wound.

"Subsistence hunters especially who hunt for most of their protein, if they have kids in the household, to me that's a significant potential risk," Smith says.

Condors, flying as high as 15,000 feet with 9-foot wingspans, spot a meal and go straight to the bullet wound, because that's the easiest place to feed. They'll eat almost any dead mammal, from a squirrel to a cow.

California's fish and game commission last year rejected an emergency ban on lead bullets, and bills in the Legislature to outlaw them in hunting died twice. Groups such as Ventana Wildlife Society urge an approach like Arizona's. The state offered free non-lead bullets to hunters last year in areas frequented by condors. Nearly two-thirds accepted them, and condor lead-exposure rates fell 40% from 2004, according to Arizona's game and fish department.

Ventana wants California lawmakers to approve $200,000 a year for five years to pay for coupons that hunters could redeem for free or reduced-price non-lead bullets. "That's a million bucks. Big deal," says Ventana's president, Kelly Sorenson. "Compared to the total cost we're spending on the condor recovery program, it's a small price to pay."

That program, involving state and federal agencies, zoos, foundations and universities, has cost at least $40 million, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service says.

USA's Trees Under Relentless Attack From Bugs, Blight (USAT)

By Patrick O'driscoll

DENVER — Some of the USA's most treasured tree species, from ash and aspen to white pine and Hawaii's native wiliwili, are under attack by insects and diseases in a growing assault coast to coast.

Some of the killers are foreign pests brought here in cargo or by travelers. Others are homegrown insects at epidemic levels because of drought and unusual warmth. This year has been the warmest on record.

The Agriculture Department's Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service finished adopting new rules this summer barring cargo from abroad unless crates and pallets are treated with chemicals or heat to kill any bugs in the wood.

"We're at one of those points in time where it's all happening at once," says Wayne Shepperd of the U.S. Forest Service.

The mountain pine beetle, a native, has ravaged millions of acres of Western forests. Trees were weakened by drought or subjected to worse infestations because warmer temperatures allowed the bugs to multiply faster. The emerald ash borer from Asia is killing species that have no natural defenses.

Ash borers can spread in diseased trees cut up for firewood. The Agriculture Department airs radio ads in eight states and has billboards that warn: "Pack marshmallows, not firewood."

California's Big Sur region and Sonoma and Humboldt counties have "tons of new mortality this year" from sudden oak death, another disease, says Katie Palmieri of the California Oak Mortality Task Force. "Entire hillsides are just gone."

A nursery shipment is blamed for spreading the hemlock woolly adelgid into Great Smoky Mountains National Park in Tennessee and North Carolina. The park hopes to save older hemlocks by using insecticides and beetles that eat the aphid-like bugs.

Scientists don't yet know what is killing aspens across much of the West. "This die-back just occurs, boom, and we're not seeing new sprouting" of trees, Shepperd says. He says drought is a possible cause, but "we see (aspen) dying in wet areas, too, so I'm not convinced it's drought alone."

A study this year in BioScience said exotic bugs and diseases "pose the most serious current threat to the forests of eastern North America."

At This Gathering, The Only Alternative Is To Be Alternative (NYT)

By Patricia Leigh Brown

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

SAN RAFAEL, Calif., Oct. 21 — Along with Santa Ana winds and ripe persimmons, fall here brings with it a migratory phenomenon known as The Bioneers, a three-day pep rally for environmentalists, lefty political activists and young people with "Renewable Energy is Homeland Security" bumper stickers that transforms the Marin Civic Center here into something of a megachurch for the Prius set.

For some 3,200 true believers, and about 10,000 others who were beamed in by satellite from simultaneous conferences in Logan, Utah; Honolulu and other far-flung places, the Bioneers is part tribal gathering and part support group that encourages adherents to connect with their inner Al Gore. (The name is a play on biodiversity and pioneers).

Students, organic farmers, architects, advocates for Pacific dolphins, and a growing number of entrepreneurs looking to invest in green technology come to hear the latest thinking on global warming (code word: Katrina) and keeping the food supply safe (buzzword: spinach). Alternative energy, Bioremediation and environmental justice, once-fringy issues, have over the course of the conference's 17-year history become part of the national dialog.

"It's biology as a metaphor for social change," said Paul Hawken, the author founder of Smith & Hawken. Mr. Hawken double-dipped, speaking at a satellite conference in Marion, Mass., and then flying back to Marin. "It's a parallel universe," he said.

It's a universe unto its own, all right. Paul E. Stamets, a mycologist and the founder of Fungi Perfecti, a mail-order mushroom business, lectured on "myco-remediation," or using fungi to restore toxic waste sites. Mr. Stamets also announced a new patent for a household pesticide that uses the mold state of the Cordyceps mushroom to kill 100,000 to 200,000 species of insects — a new eco- spin on the old Roach Motel.

Mr. Stamets shared the stage with Jay Harman, an Australian-born naturalist who is now the chief executive of Pax Scientific, an engineering company rooted in "biomimicry," a fledgling science that takes its inspiration from nature's designs and processes.

Mr. Harman showed a small device capable of circulating five million gallons of water, using only a light bulb's worth of electricity. "It's all about flow," he said, adding that the technology can be applied it to aircraft, fans, pumps and water circulators for reservoirs.

Activists talking about the environmental exploitation of native lands for oil and gas development — or what Clayton Thomas-Muller, a Canadian organizer for the Indigenous Environmental Network called "energy genocide" — communed with vendors from the Elixir Café who were doling out $2 hits of "Lavender Bliss, a viscous purple liquid billed as a decongestant for "blocked energy."

The conference is the brainchild of Kenny Ausubel, a 57-year old writer and filmmaker who was co-founder of the organic seed company Seeds of Change, and Nina Simons, the former president of the company and a former marketing director for Odwalla. Since 1990, they have operated from an old schoolhouse in Lamy, N.M., outside Santa Fe. They credit their experience with Seeds of Change, since sold, with convincing them that a fledgling political movement could be forged from issues like sustainable agriculture and green technology — fields, Mr. Ausubel said, "that in 1990 were like talking about U.F.O.'s."

Since then, the culture has in some ways caught up. For instance, Mr. Ausubel has been an adviser to the actor Leonardo DiCaprio, whose forthcoming feature-length documentary on global warming, "The 11th Hour," was filmed extensively at last year's Bioneers conference.

"The issues they were raising a decade ago, from local food to rooftop power, have moved into the mainstream," said Bill McKibben, a writer who spoke at last year's conference. "The Bioneers has been consistently ahead of the curve. It began as a gathering place for a fairly small number of like-minded people but is now a hatchery for the next wave of important ideas that five years hence people will be talking about in Rotary Clubs."

The ground troops of the environmental movement, Mr. Harman said, "are not business-savvy — they want to make a difference but don't know how to do it." So they came to learn sophisticated tactics from people like Tzeporah Berman, the program director of ForestEthics, a nonprofit organization founded in 1994 to protect endangered forests. It successfully pressured Office Depot and Staples to phase out supply paper made from endangered old growth forests and persuaded Ikea not to use wood from the temperate rain forest now known as Great Bear, in British Columbia.

John Maus, a 67 year old contractor from Littleton, Colo., who builds Starbucks stored — which he defended as "meeting places" — came to the conference for the latest intelligence on green building. "The industry is slow to change and uses huge amounts of natural resources," Mr. Maus said. "We need to develop a conscience."

Despite its mantra of biodiversity, the conclave itself can sometimes feel a bit like a monoculture, a love-fest between graying activists and youthful idealists with blond dreadlocks and veggie-fueled cars, most of them Caucasian. "It's a conference of privilege," said Brennan Manoakeesick, 28, an Oji-cree from Winnipeg who is working with low-income neighborhoods. "We're here to provide a context, to give face to the faceless."

William Casey, an eye surgeon and olive grower from St. Helena in the Napa Valley, stood out in a button-down shirt. He came with his wife, Rachel, to keep tabs on the latest trends in integrative pest management. Inspired by last year's Bioneers, they put up songbird houses and added carnivorous plants in their olive groves to control the olive fruit fly. South African guinea fowl now roam the premises destroying larvae.

"We get tremendous energy from it," Mr. Casey said of the gathering. "It's like the Big Bang."

Danbury News Times, October 23, 2006

A Brooklyn man who federal prosecutors said provided a Danbury drug ring with powder and crack cocaine has been sentenced to 15 years in prison by a federal judge.

Jose Adames, 33, was the principal supplier to the ring, headed by Danbury resident Alex Luna, before the operation was smashed by local police and federal investigators last year. He pleaded guilty to conspiring to distribute up to 150 kilograms of cocaine in May in U.S. District Court in Bridgeport.

Adames was sentenced Friday by Judge Stefan Underhill.

U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said Adames and other individuals "made frequent trips from New York City to Danbury" to deliver kilogram-sized quantities of the drugs to Luna and other members of Luna's organization. In making the deliveries, Adames and his associates used vehicles with secret compartments designed to conceal the narcotics from authorities.

Local ring members also would go to meeting places in the Bronx, Brooklyn and Manhattan to pick up cocaine from Adames, authorities said.

Members of the Danbury police Special Investigations Division, working with federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents and Bridgeport police, broke up the operation in February 2005, and arrested 24 people.

Luna and several other defendants haven't yet been sentenced, O'Connor said.

Longview Man Sentenced To 30 Years In Methamphetamine Case (NJ)

DOJ_NMG_0085496

A 25-year-old Longview man, who was among seven people arrested in a 2003 drug investigation, was sentenced Monday to 30 years in federal prison.

Christopher Jack Collum was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Leonard Davis, Tyler, according to U.S. Attorney Matthew D. Orwig.

According to information presented in court, an investigation began in January 2003 into the distribution of "ice" methamphetamine in East Texas. The investigation resulted in the arrest of seven people. A 14-count indictment was returned by a federal grand jury in January 2005, charging Collum and six co-defendants with federal drug violations.

Collum pleaded guilty to conspiring to possess with intent to distribute methamphetamine.

This case was investigated by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the Gregg County Sheriff's Department and the Gregg County CODE Unit.

Louisville Courier-Journal, October 23, 2006

A 30-year-old man was sentenced to more than seven years in prison Monday in U.S. District Court for his part in an ecstasy-distribution ring in Louisville.

Thao Hoang Lai had previously pleaded guilty to conspiring to possess with the intent to distribute and distributing the drug ecstasy in 2003 and 2004, according to the U.S. Attorney's office.

Lai, a U.S. citizen who has lived in Louisville and Philadelphia, also admitted in a guilty plea that he possessed the drug with the intent to distribute it on Jan. 12, 2005.

He was apprehended by the DEA that day after driving to Louisville to deliver 5,000 tablets of ecstasy — tablets that were found in his hotel room, according to court testimony.

About 51,000 ecstasy pills with a street value of more than $1 million were involved in all of the charges, attorneys said.

Two others have been sentenced to prison in the drug conspiracy with Lai — Vinh Ngoc Ha received to more than 12½ years and Hoang Van Nguyen nearly six years.

Eight people were arrested in January and February of 2004 in an ecstasy investigation by the DEA. Six more were arrested in the months afterward.

"We knew there was a lot of ecstasy out there, but this surprised us," Tony H. King, head of the DEA in Louisville, said at the time the 14 indictments were handed down. "Louisville was a major distribution point for this drug in Kentucky and surrounding areas."

The Kansas City Business Journal, October 24, 2006

A Florida man was sentenced in federal court in Kansas City on Monday for his role in a multimillion-dollar conspiracy to sell counterfeit, illegally imported and misbranded Lipitor and other drugs.

U.S. District Judge Ortrie Smith sentenced Julio Cesar Cruz, 43, a Cuban citizen who was living in Miami, to 13 years and six months in federal prison without parole, Bradley Schlozman, U.S. attorney for the Western District of Missouri, said in a release.

"Cruz was a key player in an international, multimillion-dollar conspiracy," Schlozman said. "Cruz made millions of dollars during the criminal scheme, but he will not be allowed to enjoy any of those profits."

Cruz pleaded guilty on Jan. 21, 2005, to selling counterfeit drugs and to participating in a conspiracy to buy and sell counterfeit, misbranded and illegally imported drugs from February 2002 until at least April 2003.

The court sentenced Cruz to eight years and six months for the criminal conspiracy and revoked the term of supervised release that Cruz was serving for an unrelated federal offense for cocaine trafficking at the time he committed this offense, Schlozman said.

The five-year sentence for violating his supervised release must be served consecutively with the sentence in the criminal conspiracy.

As part of his plea agreement, Cruz has forfeited $2 million to the government, which represents proceeds from the conspiracy.

The court also ordered Cruz to pay $1.8 million in restitution to Pfizer Inc. He is liable for that restitution along with several other defendants in separate but related cases, Schlozman said. The restitution will be paid by a $2.2 million civil forfeiture that H.D. Smith Wholesale Drug Co. agreed to pay to the federal government on May 10.

Cruz is one of several defendants who were involved in the conspiracy and have been sentenced in separate, but related, cases:

Domingo Gonzalez, 43, of Hialeah, Fla., was sentenced on June 30 to nine years and six months in federal prison without parole. Gonzalez's principal role was to supervise and direct how the South American and counterfeit prescription drugs were smuggled into the United States. He also played a key role in controlling warehouses where the South American and counterfeit prescription drugs were stored in Miami, and getting the drugs packaged for shipment out of Miami to various locations in the United States for repackaging.

Iggy Santisteban, 52, of Miami, was sentenced to three years and one month in federal prison without parole. Santisteban was convicted by a federal jury on Feb. 17 for his role in the conspiracy. Between October and November 2002, Santisteban printed counterfeit drug labels for Lipitor and other drugs. The labels were placed on bottles containing counterfeit, illegally imported and diverted tablets, which were distributed throughout the United States. Santisteban sub-contracted with other Miami-area printers for some of the labels. His printing company, Iggy Prints, went bankrupt in March 2003.

Robert Goodman, 42, of Miami, was sentenced on Sept. 14, to two years in federal prison without parole. Goodman pleaded guilty on March 31, 2005, to his role in the conspiracy, which involved transporting the counterfeit prescription drugs from the airport to a bonded warehouse. Rather than transporting the cargo directly from the airport to the bonded warehouse, as required by law, Goodman delivered the containers to another warehouse where they were opened and the counterfeit drugs removed and replaced with Epsom salts. The containers were then resealed and delivered to the bonded warehouse.

Senior Litigation Counsel Gene Porter prosecuted the cases, which were investigated by the Office of Criminal Investigations of the U.S. Food and Drug Administration.

Modesto Bee, October 23, 2006

The City Council is expected to vote Tuesday night on permanently banning medical marijuana dispensaries, three weeks after the federal Drug Enforcement Administration shut down Modesto's only pot clinic.

That same day, the Stanislaus County Board of Supervisors is scheduled to vote on installing a program to issue medical marijuana cards through the state Department of Health Services.

It could be a long day for medical marijuana supporters, with officials at both meetings lining up against pot dispensaries.

"I'm opposed to the medical marijuana card in the first place," Supervisor Ray Simon said. "I am concerned about its abuse and the great potential for abuse."

State law permits sick people to use medical marijuana; federal law does not. Cities and counties have been trying to balance the two since California approved its Compassionate Use Act 10 years ago.

The Modesto council 10 months ago tried to close the McHenry Avenue clinic by banning for-profit cannabis dispensaries, but the California Healthcare Collective was a nonprofit and remained open.

The council had to overrule the city's Planning Commission to implement its first law. This time, the commission supports banning dispensaries.

Chairwoman Alita Roberts said she and other planning commissioners changed their minds after seeing police reports that described healthy people getting the drug from the clinic.

Police contend some people easily obtained fake doctor's recommendations to buy marijuana at the collective, and others purchased cannabis on the street from the patients.

"I wish there were a way that it could be made available to people who are really, really sick, but somehow it just didn't seem to work the way the city of Modesto had it," Roberts said.

The Police Department and the DEA say the clinic was a front to sell marijuana to people who didn't need it.

Directors pleaded innocent

People who worked or shopped at the Modesto collective said directors took pains to check doctor's recommendations and keep out people who didn't have cards for use of the drug.

Its directors, Ricardo Montes and Luke Scarmazzo, on Oct. 13 pleaded innocent to federal drug distribution charges. Their lawyer has maintained that they opened a legal business in compliance with state law.

Medical marijuana supporters say the city could avoid some of the problems it encountered by regulating the clinics more closely.

"Well-controlled regulations are much more preferable to a ban," said Aaron Smith, a statewide coordinator for Safe Access Now. "You're basically throwing patients on the streets, saying 'You can use medical marijuana but you have to go to some street corner to a drug dealer.'"

Smith said one tool to regulate the drug in the county could be the medical marijuana cards that supervisor Simon opposes.

"This gives the legitimate patients an option to make sure that, whoever they show this card to, that it is backed up and verified by the county," he said.

The state requires counties to issue cards, but three counties are suing the attorney general's office to overturn the law. The counties — Merced, San Diego and Riverside — argue the state is forcing them to break a federal law. A court hearing is scheduled Nov. 16.

Simon said he wants to see what happens with that lawsuit before installing the card program.

Mary Ann Lee, managing director of the county Health Services Agency, said her department wants direction from supervisors about whether to proceed.

If the supervisors tell the county to implement the cards, Lee's department would be responsible for verifying doctor's recommendations for medical marijuana use and then forwarding information to the state health agency, which would issue the cards.

Cops opposed to cards

Smith said the cards would make it easier for police to determine who has justifiable need for medical marijuana, but Stanislaus County's top cops oppose the cards.

Modesto Police Chief Roy Wasden wrote a letter to supervisors in August lobbying against the cards. The Stanislaus County Sheriff's Department also wants supervisors to hold off on the program, Assistant Sheriff Bill Heyne said.

"We're not opposed to people using a drug that benefits them because of their physical ailment; that's not the issue," Heyne said. "What this is leading to is abuse by anyone and everyone."

The Stanislaus County Board of Supervisors meets at 9 a.m. Tuesday in the basement chamber at Tenth Street Place, Modesto. The Modesto City Council meets at 5:30 p.m. Tuesday in the basement chamber of Tenth Street Place.

Lawyer: Merriman Drug Test Stems From Supplement (AP)

By Bernie Wilson, Associated Press

SAN DIEGO – Shawne Merriman's attorney said the Chargers' star linebacker failed a drug test because of a tainted supplement and will continue to play while appealing his four-game suspension.

Attorney David Cornwell said he believed Merriman tested positive for the steroid nandrolone, which is prohibited under the NFL's substance abuse policy. Cornwell said the substance was in a supplement Merriman has been taking.

“He did not go into the back alley somewhere and put a needle in his butt for steroids,” Cornwell said at a news conference Monday, nearly two hours after Merriman practiced with the Chargers following Sunday's 30-27 loss at Kansas City.

Merriman said he spoke with his teammates and coaches earlier in the day, and "apologized to them for this being a distraction, especially the critical time we're going through as a team."

"Hopefully nobody makes any kind of judgment or anything that basically makes me guilty for anything because nothing has been done wrong on my part," Merriman said. "And I will try to get it straightened out as soon as possible. As of right now I'm not missing any time."

The 22-year-old Merriman was last year's NFL Defensive Rookie of the Year and started in the Pro Bowl after leading the Chargers with 10 sacks. Merriman is second on the team with 5½ sacks.

"I have no reason to do anything wrong, especially when I'm already in the spotlight and doing things and trying to present to people the right and wrong way to go about things," Merriman said. "This is obviously a mistake that has to be dealt with correctly."

Cornwell said nandrolone "is the primary culprit in tainted supplements."

"I know that people get tired of hearing it, but it is a fact and it is not going to go away until the Congress of the United States deals with it," Cornwell said. "Supplements are not regulated and it is a dirty fact of this industry that many of them are tainted with prohibited substances and men like Shawne get hooked up and get penalized for taking something that they didn't know was present in the supplement.

"That's why this is such an evil process," the attorney said. "He has been playing, unwittingly, Russian roulette with his career because he's been taking the same supplements, and it has been subjected to testing, and hasn't yielded a positive test. So he thought the supplements that he was taking were as safe."

Besides Merriman's suspension, the Chargers have had five separate off-field issues dating back to April.

Outside linebacker Steve Foley was shot three times outside his suburban home on Sept. 3 by an off-duty police officer who suspected him of drunk driving. Foley will miss the entire season and was charged with two counts of DUI.

Safety Terrence Kiel was arrested on five felony drug counts in September and has pleaded not guilty.

Cornerback Markus Curry, who had been demoted to the practice squad, was released on Oct. 9, just hours after he was arrested on suspicion of committing domestic violence.

Foley and linebacker Shaun Phillips were each arrested for scuffling with San Diego police officers a week apart in April. Neither was charged.

Trial Put Off For Mosque Raid Figure (PPG)

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 24, 2006

A convicted rapist whose arrest on illegal weapons charges caused a stir at a North Side mosque in June was set to go on trial yesterday in Utah, but the case has been postponed.

A federal judge in Salt Lake City has pushed back the trial date for Larry M. Williams, 33, of Lincoln-Lemington, to Feb. 19.

He was charged federally with illegal possession of a pistol and ammunition following a traffic stop in Utah on June 27.

His case caused a controversy on the North Side three days later when the FBI and the Pittsburgh police arrested him at the Light of the Age Mosque at Hemlock and Boyle streets. Authorities have not conceded that the building is a true mosque, and some have described it as a flophouse.

But those living there or visiting at the time of the arrest said it is a house of worship and decried the police action during Friday prayer services as an "invasion."

Mr. Williams, reportedly a member of the mosque, was taken into custody on the street, and agents and police said they searched only one room of the house. Federal authorities said the arrest had nothing to do with any activities at the mosque, but rather occurred because Mr. Williams was a dangerous fugitive.

Court papers filed in Utah indicate agents and police were executing an arrest warrant for Mr. Williams based on his weapons charge and the fact that he did not register as a sex offender after his rape conviction in the state of Washington. A Pennsylvania State Police Megan's Law form shows his address as 1373 Montezuma St.

During the June 27 traffic stop, the Utah Highway Patrol said Mr. Williams had a .45-caliber pistol, 15 rounds of ammo and a magazine for an assault weapon. The trooper seized the gun and the bullets, but let Mr. Williams keep the clip and allowed him to leave, not realizing he could be arrested on federal weapons charges.

Federal agents then tracked him down to the house on the North Side three days later.

Mr. Williams is being prosecuted in Utah under Project Safe Neighborhoods, a U.S. Justice Department initiative to combat illegal guns and gun violence.

Because Mr. Williams has felony convictions for rape and robbery, he isn't allowed to have a gun and could go to federal prison for at least five years.

His lawyer has filed a motion to throw out the case by challenging the reason for the initial traffic stop. The trooper said he pulled over Mr. Williams because his car had tinted windows, a violation of Utah law.

IMMIGRATION:

Number Of Illegal Immigrants On Prisoner Flights Jumps (MCT)

By Michael Doyle

McClatchy Newspapers, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON - Con Air is becoming big business, thanks to illegal immigrants and criminal aliens.

And this is one flight you definitely want to miss.

Federal officials flew 95,876 incarcerated illegal immigrants and criminal aliens around the country in 2005, a 28 percent increase since 2000. Those foreign nationals now account for nearly half of all the passengers flown on the highly guarded federal flights, a new audit found, and tougher border security efforts will boost numbers even higher.

Unfortunately, the auditors warn, the flights could outpace federal planning. Officials haven't been looking far enough into the future, leaving the program vulnerable to nasty surprises.

"(Officials) could be caught off-guard by changes in demand and customers," the Justice Department Office of Inspector General auditors caution in the new report.

Popularized as "Con Air" in a Hollywood movie of the same name, the prisoner flights are coordinated by the U.S. Marshals Service through a Kansas City, Mo., office, and carried a total of 181,948 prisoners in 2005.

The passengers shuttle among about 40 domestic and international cities, and they come in many different stripes.

Some are being extradited, or transported to their new federal prison homes. Many illegal immigrants or criminal aliens are heading to deportation centers, and then to their home countries.

Since 1995, the number of undocumented immigrants and criminal aliens flown under guard has grown 826 percent. Most are now being returned to Honduras, Guatemala, El Salvador and the Dominican Republic.

"Now we're at 115,000 (prisoners transported) and counting this year," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told reporters at a briefing in August. "It will be a record year for us with the total number of movements."

The Marshals Service officials who run the flight program said they can simply lease more planes and hire more guards as needed. The Office of Inspector General is skeptical.

"Leasing additional planes on an emergency basis is not only reactive," the auditors cautioned, "but is also more expensive compared to longer-term aircraft leases."

Buying a new Boeing 737 would cost $540 million over 30 years. Leasing the same aircraft would cost $840 million over the same period. But because of year-to-year budgeting, the lease appears cheaper in the short term.

Marshals Service spokeswoman Nikki Credic said Monday that officials found the new 118-page audit "helpful" and indicated that they will follow up on the key recommendations, including improving long-term planning.

"Major changes need to be implemented to enhance the program," Credic said.

The Marshals Service owns three airplanes and leases six more for the flights. Even this doesn't handle all the traffic. Immigration authorities in 2005 had to charter airplanes or buy individual tickets to handle an additional 62,017 illegal immigrant and criminal alien passengers - at a cost of $63 million.

Costs pile up in other ways. Immigration and Customs Enforcement must pay for round-trip deportation flights to foreign countries even though the return flight is usually empty.

Domestic flights likewise can take off with too many empty seats. Every weekday afternoon, for instance, a plane leaves Mesa, Ariz., to pick up undocumented immigrants and criminal aliens in California and other Western states. Two out of three seats are empty on these flights, and auditors suggest flying less often but with fuller planes.

Immigration officials explained they didn't have enough lead time to use the same scheduling system as other federal agencies.

The auditors kept secret how many guards are supposed to be on each plane run by what's formally called the Justice Prisoner and Alien Transportation System. They cautioned, though, that the ratio of prisoners to guards was too high in 13 percent of the flights studied. Hangar guards are also frequently shorthanded, the auditors found.

Ceremony To Accompany Border Fence Bill Signing (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Charles Hurt

Congress yesterday sent the bill to build 700 miles of fencing on the U.S.-Mexico border to President Bush, who will sign it in a ceremony Thursday morning in the White House Roosevelt Room.

The decision to have a public ceremony is a reversal for the Bush administration, which had appeared reluctant to tie itself so publicly to the enforcement-only measure. Although Mr. Bush had committed to signing the bill, aides had said consistently over the past few weeks there would not be a signing ceremony.

But Republicans in Congress had demanded a public signing, with leaders saying the bill is a major accomplishment that will help their re-election prospects.

"The American people demand a secure border, and this Republican Congress has responded to the American people's demand for a secure border by increasing the physical barriers and infrastructure along the border and by providing state of the art monitoring technology," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, said in a joint statement trumpeting the bill's official transmission yesterday morning.

They had held onto the bill in order to guarantee Mr. Bush's signature closer to the election, when it would have the biggest impact. Aides said they were also holding out for a signing ceremony, to use the presidential pulpit for maximum attention.

By yesterday evening, several congressional offices said they received invitations to a signing ceremony on Thursday at the White House, and House Republicans said the bill signing is vindication for their enforcement-only approach.

"For all those people who spoke disparagingly of the hearings that were held over the summer on border security, this bill represents a victory -- both a grass-roots victory and a public relations victory -- for the Congress," said one House Republican leadership aide.

The double-layer, reinforced fence has been a point of contention between the White House and Republicans in Congress. Mr. Bush had pushed for a broad immigration bill that offered a guest-worker plan and citizenship rights for most illegal aliens, in addition to increased enforcement.

The Department of Homeland Security has questioned the value of that much fencing, and the administration argues that only about 370 miles of fencing is needed on the 2,000-mile-long border. Officials say the rest can be covered through ground radar, sensors and increased manpower.

"You talk to the members of Congress about the 700 miles, and there's not a single member who can give you a plausible explanation of how they arrived at 700 miles," a senior administration official told The Washington Times last week. "We'll build every mile of fence that is useful and necessary to build, and if they tell us to build 700, we'll find a way to build 700 miles of fence, but let's not kid ourselves."

The White House official said last week there wouldn't be a big public signing ceremony. In Arizona earlier this month, Mr. Bush signed the 2007 homeland security spending bill, which includes a down payment for some fencing as well as increases in the number of U.S. Border Patrol agents and detention beds to hold illegal aliens awaiting deportation.

Congressional Republicans, including Mr. Frist and Mr. Hastert, say the bill is a key dividing point between Republicans and Democrats -- one voters should remember at the polls next month.

"Democrat leader [Nancy] Pelosi voted against the Secure Fence Act because she has never been to the border to understand that it is a national security emergency. The Democrat leadership must think that border security is about adding more security guards at Borders Book Stores," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Mr. Hastert.

Actor's ad

His body visibly racked by tremors, actor Michael J. Fox speaks out for Missouri Democratic Senate candidate Claire McCaskill in a television ad that promotes her support for embryonic stem-cell research.

"As you might know, I care deeply about stem-cell research," says the 45-year-old actor, who has struggled with Parkinson's disease for more than a decade. "In Missouri, you can elect Claire McCaskill, who shares my hope for cures."

Mrs. McCaskill has made support for the research a key part of her campaign to unseat Sen. Jim Talent. The new ad debuted prominently Saturday night during Game 1 of the World Series between the St. Louis Cardinals and the Detroit Tigers and will continue airing statewide this week, a campaign spokeswoman said.

Debate over embryonic stem-cell research looms large in the state, where voters are considering a ballot measure that would amend the state constitution to protect all federally allowed forms of the research. Critics say the measure would allow human cloning.

"Unfortunately, Senator Jim Talent opposes expanding stem-cell research," Mr. Fox says in the 30-second spot. "Senator Talent even wanted to criminalize the science that gives us a chance for hope."

Mr. Talent's campaign called the ad a false attack, the Associated Press reports.

"Senator Talent supports medical research including stem-cell research that doesn't involve cloning or destroying a human embryo," said Talent spokesman Rich Chrismer.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, accused her Republican challenger of getting into "swampy territory" after he was quoted yesterday as saying that Mrs. Clinton was unattractive when she was younger and that she had a lot of work done on herself.

Mr. Spencer, former mayor of the New York City suburb of Yonkers, was also quoted as saying that Mrs. Clinton underwent millions of dollars of "work" and "looks good now."

During a campaign stop at a senior citizens center in Watervliet, just outside Albany, Mrs. Clinton said: "It's unfortunate that when you don't have anything positive to say about the issues that we can get off in some pretty swampy territory."

After the newspaper came out, Mr. Spencer said the comments were "a fabrication."

"I would never call Hillary Clinton ugly. That's outrageous. I didn't do it," he said.

The reporter, Ben Smith, spoke with Mr. Spencer during a flight Friday from New York City to Rochester. He told the Associated Press that Mr. Spencer made the comments as Mr. Spencer, his wife and Mr. Smith sat together. He said he did not tape-record the comments but took notes on a BlackBerry.

'Lawyering up'

"Everyone is speculating about which party will control Congress after next month's voting. But we may not know for a while. We could see either party pursue the kind of lawsuits that Al Gore unleashed in Florida in 2000 and contest any number of tight races that are within the 'margin of litigation,' " John Fund writes at www.opinionjournal.com.

"Recounts and even seating challenges in Congress could stretch on for weeks -- another endless election. 'We're waiting for the day that pols can cut out the middleman and settle all elections in court,' jokes the political newsletter Hotline.

" 'In 2000 in Florida, we broke a psychic barrier,' says Doug Chapin, director of the nonpartisan Election Reform Information Project. 'Election night is not necessarily the finish line anymore. Both sides are lawyering up.' Indeed, in 1998 the number of court cases challenging elections totaled 104, by 2004 that number had climbed to 361."

Border protectors

A group opposed to illegal immigration has inducted 125 House members and 20 senators into the U.S. Border Control Hall of Fame for the 109th Congress.

"The members of the 109th Congressional Hall of Fame have listened to the overwhelming majority of their constituents who want an end of open borders, amnesty and welfare benefits for illegal aliens," said Edward I. Nelson, chairman of the citizens group U.S. Border Control.

Among those cited by the group were Sen. Rick Santorum, Pennsylvania Republican, and Sen. Conrad Burns, Montana Republican, both of whom are trailing in races for re-election.

The House scorecard is based on 12 votes on immigration issues, including deploying troops on the border, ending the visa lottery and fining employers who hire illegals. The Senate scorecard is also based on 12 votes, including opposition to amnesty, preservation of Social Security for American citizens and making English the official language.

Race narrows

Florida's gubernatorial race between Republican Charlie Crist and Democrat Rep. Jim Davis has narrowed, with the two candidates running just about even, according to a poll released yesterday as early voting began in the state.

Mr. Crist, the state attorney general, had enjoyed double-digit leads in previous polls. The new Quinnipiac University Poll found him favored by 46 percent of likely voters to 44 percent for Mr. Davis, with 8 percent undecided. That is within the error margin of 3.4 percentage points. Eleven percent of respondents indicated they could still change their minds.

Earlier this month, Mr. Crist was favored 53 percent to 43 percent in a similar sampling by the Connecticut-based polling institute. Gov. Jeb Bush is prohibited by law from seeking a third consecutive term.

Mr. Davis didn't start his television advertising until early October and has made inroads among independent voters and women since then, the Associated Press reports.

Fright fest

Novelist Stephen King is the master of all things weird and spooky. So what better for the author of "Carrie" and "The Shining" to do than promote MoveOn.org?

"If I know anything, I know scary. And giving this president and this out-of-control Congress two more years ... is downright terrifying. Thankfully, this national nightmare is one we can end with -- literally -- a wake-up call," the horror writer says in an e-mail sent yesterday by the liberal Internet group's political action committee.

"My friends at MoveOn.org Political Action are organizing pre-Halloween phone parties this weekend, Oct. 28 and 29. We'll be calling progressive voters in key districts who may not turn out unless they get a friendly reminder or two. ...

"The polls are telling us that this November is our best shot in over a decade to turn things around, and we've got to make the most of it."

Fighting For Legal Status; Drama In Orange County (WSJ)

By Aaron Rutkoff

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

Border Lines is a regular look at the best writing on the immigration debate from around the Web. (Some links may require registration or subscription.) * * *

NON-CITIZEN SOLDIERS: Many commentators and politicians have proposed the idea of a pathway for the undocumented to achieve legal status in the U.S. In a joint Washington Post op-ed, conservative hawk Max Boot and centrist

Democrat Michael O'Hanlon suggest a four-year term of military service1 as one way that foreigners -- even illegal immigrants in the U.S. -- could earn American citizenship.

Their proposal, although grounded in the debate over immigration, takes as its primary justification the manpower crunch now plaguing the U.S. military. A service-for-citizenship system "could solve the No. 1 problem facing the Army and Marine Corps: the fact that these services need to grow to meet current commitments yet cannot easily do so (absent a draft) given the current recruiting environment," they write. As a bonus, foreign soldiers could be recruited from key regions in which our all-volunteer force lacks language and cultural skills. To the objection that recruits without green cards would be nothing more than mercenaries, the authors point out that "we already rely on tens of thousands of real mercenaries: the security contractors the U.S. government employs from Colombia to Iraq to make up for lack of troops."

Although Messrs. Boot and O'Hanlon present their proposal as a common sense solution for strengthening the military, the hawkish bloggers at National Review Online staged a daylong debate on the topic that featured a good deal of skepticism. A "divided" Stanley Kurtz ultimately calls2 it "the first serious idea for a solution I've seen in years," but his conservative colleagues were quick to disagree. "I think it's a horrible idea," replied John Derbyshire3, an immigrant himself. "If the USA can no longer muster enough citizens to staff our armies, then we are doomed, doomed, and should just go down giggling and give someone else a shot at being Top Dog."

Mark Kirkorian, a strong opponent of illegal immigration, also sounded a circumspect note:4 "If there's a problem in persuading enough Americans to fill the ranks, then the problem may be that our foreign policy is not in line with our national character." In a follow-up post, he also warned5 that opening the military to foreign recruits may "turn soldiering into yet another 'job Americans won't do.'" * * *

O.C. SCARE MAIL: A Republican congressional candidate from Orange County, Calif., is under fire from the state attorney general6, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger7 and even his county's Republican organization8 (all Los Angeles Times links) over his campaign's involvement in an apparent voter-suppression mailing. The Spanish-language letter, sent to 14,000 registered Democrats with Latino surnames, warned "that if your residence in this country is illegal or you are an immigrant, voting in a federal election is a crime that could result in jail time." (Naturalized immigrants can vote, although it is a crime for illegal immigrants to cast ballots in elections.)

At the center of the controversy is Tan Nguyen, a Vietnamese immigrant and hard-line opponent of illegal immigration trying to unseat Democratic incumbent Rep. Loretta Sanchez. As the scandal broke last week and investigators traced the letter back to Mr. Nguyen's office, he fired a staffer implicated in the illegal mailing and denied any prior knowledge -- even as the chairman of Orange County's Republican Party told the press of Mr. Nguyen's direct involvement and urged him to withdraw from the race.

After days of mounting criticism and a raid by state agents on his offices, Mr. Nguyen reversed course on Sunday9, announcing at a sidewalk press conference that he now wished to rehire the still unidentified staff member he had fired and telling reporters that he believes the mailing was fair. "I am innocent, and there is no way in hell that I am going to withdraw," he said.

Amy Taxin, an Orange County Register reporter, quotes Nguyen campaign spokesman Bill Braniff admitting the campaign's role in composing the letter10. "I acknowledge that somebody connected with the campaign did draft it," he said. The problem, Mr. Braniff insisted, was faulty Spanish-to-English translation: "The Spanish mailer used the word emigrado, which is defined as someone living outside his or her country," Ms. Taxin reports. "Braniff claimed that the word has been incorrectly translated as 'immigrant' by the public." * * *

(STILL) SITTING ON THE FENCE: For nearly a month, bloggers, pundits and political observers have been puzzled over the fate of the Secure Fence Act, a bill passed by Congress on Sept. 29 mandating the construction of a 700-mile double-layered border fence. To date, it seems, the bill has not so much as been delivered to the White House for a presidential signature. (See previous Border Lines coverage here11 and here12.) Now, as Washington Times reporter Stephen Dinan reports, the White House is "pleading"13 with members of Congress to turn over the bill. "Send us the damn bill," one unnamed senior administration official told Mr. Dinan. "We'd like to autograph it."

To Congressional Republicans, however, the Secure Fence Act is potent political weapon that needs to be reserved until closer to the midterm elections on Nov. 7. "It's a timing issue," an aide to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) explained to Mr. Dinan. "We want it signed closer to the election when folks are paying attention."

It may be that a disagreement over ceremony, not timing, stands at the center of this Capitol Hill conflict. President Bush, Mr. Dinan reports, "has said he will sign it, though in private, without a signing ceremony." The unnamed official quoted in the piece also rejected the idea of signing ceremony. In part, Mr. Dinan suggests, this reluctance stems from Mr. Bush's lingering resentment that members of his own party defeated comprehensive reform legislation -- including a guest-worker program -- that the president had championed. * * *

NOT VICTIMLESS: Those who argue that illegal immigration is a victimless crime, writes Jonathan Gurwitz in a San Antonio Express-News commentary, should first visit the house where 51 migrants were found packed into three rooms -- all sharing a single filthy bathroom14. "Does anyone believe this is the only human warehouse in San Antonio?" he asks. "In South Texas?"

Mr. Gurwitz notes that both supporters and detractors of illegal immigrants may have an interest in ignoring the frequent crimes done against migrants. To opponents, he writes, illegal immigrants who break the law by crossing the border are hardly entitled to seek its protection. And those supporting decriminalization tend to overlook the abuse meted out by human smugglers, who are almost always fellow immigrants, he says.

"The effort to whitewash the criminality of illegal immigration, to look the other way as people trespass the border, enables predators to victimize in obscurity," Mr. Gurwitz says. "Advocates who transform illegal immigration into a victimless crime enhance the prospects that illegal immigrants will be the victims of crime."

The common-ground solution, he suggests, is both more control over the border -- including fences -- as well as a more open legal system to absorb people seeking better life. Implemented together, it may just put the smugglers out of business. * * *

COMPLEXION COMPENSATION: Skin tone can outweigh education in its impact on an immigrant's earnings in the U.S., according to a new study. Joni Hersch, a Vanderbilt University economist, crunched the numbers15 from a federally-funded 2003 survey of over 2,000 legal immigrants, which included a face-to-face interview in which respondents' skin color was measured on an 11-point scale. Her analysis controlled for race, nation of origin and a slew of other factors that can influence income, such as work history, language skills, a visa type.

Washington Post's Richard Morin16, who summarized Ms. Hersch findings in his column, writes that "[i]mmigrants with the lightest complexions earned, on average, about 8 to 15 percent more than those with the darkest skin tone." For a particularly dark-skinned immigrant, this disadvantage can counteract the income-generating power of education.

Mr. Morin emailed Ms. Hersch for her take on these results. "I don't think that any explanation other than discrimination is possible -- and I am not one to draw such inferences lightly," she replied. But racism is not the only bias at work: Ms. Hersch's anaylsis also found that taller immigrants consistently earn more than their shorter counterparts. * * *

UNREST AHEAD? An editorial in Investor's Business Daily17 looks ahead to the consequences of the U.S. fence on Mexico's stability and finds cause for concern. Official ambivalence over the measure -- which has prompted both diplomatic protests18 and support from the governor of Mexico's Central Bank19 -- makes sense given the nation's dire straights on immigration: Mexico needs help retaining its human capital, but faces likely unrest if the U.S. fence is implemented.

"If a wall were built, and the U.S. is no longer a social-pressure valve for Mexican labor, those workers just might revolt," IBD's editors warn. The problem is thrown into even starker relief by a 2005 study conducted by Mexico's Central Bank. According to its findings, Mexican states that receive more remittances from expatriate workers in the U.S. also show less overall economic development. "The bank even went so far as to suggest poverty was caused by the dependency, not the other way around."

Worse still, IBD's editorial says, Mexico's highest-remittance states border regions of the country already mired in violent unrest.

Vice President's Role In Senate Is Occasionally Critical (RC)

By Donald Wolfensberger

Roll Call, October 24, 2006

Texas Democrat John Nance Garner once opined that the vice presidency is "not worth a bucket of warm spit." He was in a position to know, having gone from being Speaker of the House to being vice president under President Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Though a small-government populist, "Cactus Jack," as he was known, faithfully carried the president's New Deal water up Capitol Hill during FDR's first term. He became disenchanted with Roosevelt's policies and advisers in the second term and announced his own availability for the presidency in 1939, regardless of whether FDR ran again. Roosevelt broke the two-term precedent and handily won the nomination and re-election in 1940 with Henry Wallace as his VP. Garner quietly retired to his native Uvalde, Texas, regretting that he ever had left the Speaker's chair.

Garner's colorful metaphor came to mind recently when a foreign diplomat in Washington, D.C., asked two of my colleagues why the vice president of the United States also serves as President of the Senate. They were just as stumped as I was when they later put the question to me. I half-jokingly speculated that the framers had to give the vice president something to do while he waited around for the president to die.

In turning to James Madison's notes from the 1787 Constitutional Convention, I found Delegate Roger Sherman of Connecticut confirming my suspicion. A member of the Committee of Eleven that originated the new office, Sherman defended it as follows: "If the vice-President were not to be President of the Senate, he would be without employment." Sherman added that if the Senate elected its own President to preside over the chamber, that Senator's state would be deprived of a vote except when it came to breaking ties (since it was customary for presiding officers to remain neutral in all other instances).

The draft that preceded that of the Committee of Eleven had no vice president and instead provided that the Senate elect one of its own to preside over the body and to fill in as president of the nation when a vacancy occurred. So, the alternative of having a vice president exercise both roles solved two problems. It ensured that no Senator would be deprived of his right to vote at all times, nor have to be absent from the chamber while acting as president of the country.

Alexander Hamilton, in "Federalist No. 68," pointed out that there was nothing new about the concept of a fallback executive. The 1777 Constitution of New York state created a lieutenant governor to preside over the state Senate and take over as governor in the event of a vacancy. And no one objected to that at the time. Even in pre-revolutionary America, lieutenant governors presided over several colonial legislatures.

The role of vice president as the Senate's president could come into sharper focus again in two weeks, when Democrats are expected to gain seats or even control of the chamber. The Constitution provides that the vice president "shall have no vote, unless [the Senators] be equally divided." The smaller the majority's edge, the more likely the vice president will be called upon to break ties. Garner cast only three tie-breaking votes during his eight years as vice president, when Democrats never held fewer than 59 of 96 Senate seats.

On the other hand, our first vice president, John Adams, still holds the record with 29 tie-breakers during George Washington's presidency. Adams also actively participated in Senate debates, lecturing Senators like a school marm. (One Senator wrote in his diary, "For forty minutes he harangued us from the chair.") Eventually he was threatened with a motion to silence him. He subsequently confined himself to procedural utterances only when circumstances required it. Adams' tie-breaking votes included preventing the capital from remaining in New York two more years, blocking war with Britain and ensuring that the president have sole authority to fire his Cabinet appointees (without Senate concurrence).

No vice president since the beginning of the 20th century has cast more than eight tie-breaking votes. However, Vice President Cheney already has cast seven tie-breakers in his nearly six years in office. It was Cheney's very presence as President of the Senate that gave control of the 50-50 chamber to the Republicans for organizational purposes during those critical first months of the Bush presidency, from Jan. 21 until June 6, 2001 (when control flipped to the Democrats with Sen. Jim Jeffords' resignation from the Republican Conference to become an Independent).

During that initial period of Republican control, Cheney cast two tie-breakers on amendments relating to prescription drugs and the marriage penalty tax. Even when Republicans regained control of the Senate in 2003 by a 51-49 margin, Cheney had to cast three tie-breaking votes in that year alone — all on important budget and tax matters. In the current Congress, with Republicans holding a more comfortable 55-45 margin, Cheney has cast just one tie-breaking vote, albeit an important one on the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 2005.

Lest I leave the misimpression that the vice president's only official role is to preside over the Senate and break ties, there is one other duty under the Constitution worth mentioning. The vice president also is charged with counting the electoral votes for president and vice president and announcing the winners. That will be one of Cheney's last official acts in office in January 2009. It is doubtful, though, that Cheney will be viewed by historians as a mere bucket-toting, tie-breaking, electoral vote-counting VP. As we have seen, the office can be as big as the president wants it to be.

Teacher Bonuses Go To Well-paid Teachers In Struggling Districts (AP)

By Andrew Welsh-huggins

AP, October 24, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio - The Bush administration is rewarding teachers with performance bonuses at four of Ohio's biggest, poorest and most academically challenged districts where teacher pay is already well above the state average.

Coming just two weeks before a challenging election for Republicans, the grants are the first federal effort to reward the classroom performance of teachers who raise student test scores.

Ohio's funding - $5.5 million this year and a total of $20 million over five years - was announced Monday, the first of 16 grants totaling $42 million. South Carolina also is to receive statewide grants. The other states to receive money weren't announced.

The government hopes the money will help counter what Education Secretary Margaret Spellings called a "dirty little secret" in American education, that the most experienced teachers often teach in the least challenging classrooms.

The money is a reward for teachers "when you put yourself on the line every day and teach in some of the nation's most challenging schools and get great results," Spellings said Monday.

The department will release the remaining grants in the coming weeks, falling right before the Nov. 7 elections in which a reeling Republican Party is eager for good news. Spellings said the election had no bearing on the timing.

Democrats are savoring the thought of regaining control of the House, especially in light of the ongoing congressional page scandal. In Ohio, Democrats are poised to retake the governor's office after 16 years, while two-term Republican Sen. Mike DeWine is in a tight race with Democratic challenger Sherrod Brown.

Brown called the announcement "cynical politics at its worst."

Schools in Cleveland, Cincinnati, Columbus and Toledo will share the Ohio grants.

Teacher pay in Cleveland, Cincinnati and Columbus is well above the state average of $50,772, including $60,688 in Cleveland, a chronically struggling district of just under 60,000 students in the nation's poorest city.

The average teacher salary in Toledo, which also has the best academic standing of the four districts, is $49,859, according to the most recent data from the state Department of Education.

The money will help districts reward experienced teachers who help train younger colleagues as well as provide incentive for schools to boost their test scores, said Ohio state schools superintendent Susan Tave Zelman.

"This is more than pay for performance," Zelman said Monday. "This is about making the teaching profession more valued and honored."

Cincinnati and Toledo already have incentive programs for teachers, and any new money must look at a broad range of improvements and not just test scores, said Tom Mooney, president of the Ohio Federation of Teachers.

"When you already have trouble attracting teachers to the most challenging schools, what you don't want to do is tell them their families' livelihood depends on tests that were invented yesterday and they're already talking about changing them tomorrow," he said.

The National Education Association on Monday said grants were unnecessary and duplicated existing programs. The union called on the government to put money into underfunded programs created through Bush's No Child Left Behind initiative.

The president of the Columbus teachers' union said she supported the grants because they would help expand existing programs negotiated by the union that reward both individual teachers and entire school staffs for helping students improve.

"Nobody is punished if they don't make the gains," said Rhonda Johnson, president of the Columbus Education Association. "You're not losing any pay, you're only gaining pay when you show you've made gains."

The nationwide grants will range from about $1 million to $30 million. Another $43 million will be awarded next spring.

Bush To Trumpet Strength Of The Economy (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, October 24, 2006

President Bush on Monday trumpeted the strength of the economy, an important issue in about two dozen congressional races that will determine whether Republicans retain control of the House.

Faced with difficult midterm elections and a deteriorating situation in Iraq, Bush is stressing the positive.

"The strength of this economy depends upon the strength of the small business sector," Bush said at a round-table where he talked about his administration's role in reducing taxes and limiting regulation and lawsuits that he says impede the entrepreneurial spirit in America.

"The role of the government, it seems to me, is to make sure that dreamers are rewarded for their hard work and their ingenuity and success. And the best way to do that is to reduce taxes on people," Bush said.

White House advisers, who think the president should get more credit for recent positive economic news, insist that Bush is not trying to change the subject away from the unpopular war. The president will continue to talk about Iraq and the war on terrorism as the Nov. 7 election nears, they said.

Eighty-eight percent of likely voters say the economy is an important issue — on a par with the percentage of people who view the situation in Iraq and terrorism as crucial matters, according to an Associated Press-Ipsos poll earlier this month. The poll found that 37 percent of likely voters say they approve of Bush's handling of Iraq overall. More voters — 42 percent — approve of his handling of the economy.

Overall, the economy grew at a 2.6 percent pace from April through June, compared with a 5.6 percent pace over the first three months of the year, which was the strongest spurt in 2 1/2 years. Still, voters remain uneasy even though gasoline prices have started dropping, the stock market is hitting record highs, and interest rates on credit cards and adjustable mortgages are leveling off.

Rising hopes for strong third-quarter earnings lifted the Dow Jones industrial average past 12,000 for the first time on Wednesday. The Conference Board's index of U.S. leading economic indicators rose last month, and the government reported last week that consumer prices fell in September by the largest amount in 10 months.

Democrats contend the middle class isn't enjoying the benefits of recent U.S. economic gains. They say sluggish median earnings show paychecks have failed to keep pace with inflation, and they note rising health care and energy costs.

White House political director Sara Taylor said that the economy is a key issue in about two dozen House races, including campaigns in Pennsylvania, Minnesota, Ohio and Washington state. Democrats need a 15-seat pickup to regain the House and a gain of six seats to reclaim the Senate.

"It's going to have an important impact on certain races around the country," Taylor said. "I think it's an important issue that's not getting a ton of attention."

Bush participated in a round-table with three small- to medium-sized businesses that have taken advantage of community banking services to expand in the Washington area. The event was held at Urban Trust Bank. The bank, set up to provide mortgages, student loans and investment opportunities mainly to minorities, was founded by Robert Louis Johnson, who started BET — formerly Black Entertainment Television.

On Tuesday, the president will speak about the economy again at a campaign appearance in Sarasota, Fla., for businessman Vern Buchanan, who is in a tight House race against Democrat Christine Jennings, a former bank executive. The prospect of losing Florida's conservative 13th District to Democrats brought high-profile Republicans — Gov. Jeb Bush, Sen. Mel Martinez and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney — to the area last week.

Bush Tries To Switch Focus To Economy (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

President George W. Bush on Monday sought to change the subject from the deteriorating situation in Iraq by focusing on the strength of the US economy just two weeks before America goes to the polls in midterm congressional elections.

Citing strong US job growth and improving wages, Mr Bush dismissed polls that suggested the Republican party was on course to lose control of the House of Representatives on November 7 and possibly also the Senate. The president will on Tuesday give a speech in Florida on the economy.

“The economy is strong and we have a plan for victory in Iraq,” Mr Bush told CNBC, the US business TV channel. “The other folks [Democratic party] will raise the taxes and they don’t have a plan for victory in Iraq. My advice is: let’s watch what happens in the poll that actually matters on November 7.”

Mr Bush’s comments, which coincided with the Dow Jones stock index closing at a record high of 12,116 on Monday, follow several weeks in which the Republicans have been on the defensive because of the situation in Iraq and a series of corruption scandals.

But Republican strategists are confident that there is enough time remaining in the mid-term campaign to refocus voter attention on the strength of the economy. Mr Bush on Monday downplayed concerns that the economy was not performing well for the middle classes. He said that wages had grown by an average of 2.2 per cent in the past year and that this had boosted disposable income.

However, he did not directly address the continuing stagnation in median wages, which are a more accurate measure of the economic “squeeze” the Democrats claim the middle classes are experiencing. Instead, he emphasised that the US economy had added 6.6m new jobs since August 2003.

The president’s focus on the economy is likely to add to the quiet confidence among senior Republican strategists that the ruling party can turn the situation around in the 30 or 40 Congressional districts that are considered competitive – of a total of 435. The Democrats need to add 15 to their tally to gain control of the house.

In spite of being behind in the polls, Republicans retain two advantages: the party has more spending power and it can draw on a sophisticated national data base that enables it to squeeze as many votes as possible out of its support base in the heartlands. The Democrats concede they are outmatched on both counts.

Bush Aims To Boost News About Economy (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

President Bush is on a two-day push to draw attention to the economy, with the White House arguing that the administration's accomplishments and the booming stock market have not received enough attention in the run-up to the Nov. 7 midterm elections.

Yesterday, Mr. Bush toured the Urban Trust Bank in Washington to underscore the increase in jobs and wages in the past few years, and to warn against miring the economy with new regulations and taxes.

"It's been hard to get people to report on" the nation's economic progress, said White House spokesman Tony Snow.

"You take a look at consumer confidence levels, they're skyrocketing. People are feeling good about the economy. And if you take a look at the news coverage of it, it's been overwhelmingly negative at a time when you do have just an extraordinary situation," he said.

Democrats said the administration is turning to the economy because the war in Iraq is not rallying voters anymore.

The office of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said the economy still isn't a bright spot for Republicans because it falls short of the levels under Presidents Reagan and Clinton. A statement pointed in particular to slower growth in personal income after inflation and taxes.

Meanwhile, the administration defended its Iraq policy, said no major course change is on the horizon and disputed speculation that it is setting deadlines and timetables for the Iraqi government to take more control.

In a morning blitz of television appearances, White House counselor Dan Bartlett said the administration has been working with the Iraqi government to set milestones and benchmarks.

Republicans across the nation, taking cues from Democratic critics, have begun questioning the administration's plans for Iraq and demanding a change.

Mr. Bush spoke Saturday with top military and civilian leaders about adjusting tactics in Iraq, but the White House said the strategy will not change.

Mr. Snow acknowledged yesterday that efforts announced during the summer to increase security in Baghdad have failed.

"It's pretty clear that the first iteration didn't achieve the results that were desired, so that they're continuing to work through ways to improve and adjust so that you do have the security that you want," the spokesman said.

He said Mr. Bush has stopped using the phrase "stay the course" to describe his Iraq policy, because "it left the wrong impression about what was going on."

Habit-forming: Dow Hits Record Again (USAT/AP)

By Joe Bel Bruno

NEW YORK — Wall Street extended its October rally Monday as the Dow Jones industrials crossed 12,100 for the first time and reached a new record high close.

Investors grew more confident about upcoming earnings reports, and a decline in the price of oil bolstered hopes for higher consumer spending.

Dow component Wal-Mart Stores, which pleased investors by announcing plans to cut capital spending to improve profits, helped the blue chips to their new high. Wal-Mart shares were up $1.91 to $51.28 (story, 3B).

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 114.54 points, or 1.0%, to 12,116.91. It also hit an intraday high of 12,125.16.

The Standard & Poor's 500 index rose 8.42 points, or 0.6%, to 1377.02. The Nasdaq composite rose 13.26 points, or 0.6%, to 2355.56.

Strength from IBM, Hasbro and Xerox also fed the advance. Halfway through the third-quarter earnings season, companies' generally upbeat reports have given investors a renewed sense of security about the future.

“The blue chips have outperformed most markets, and this was an extension of that trend,” says Steven Goldman, chief market strategist at Weeden & Co.

The advance came despite concerns about the Federal Reserve's two-day meeting on interest rates, which starts today. Policymakers are expected to leave interest rates unchanged, though they could sound hawkish in their accompanying economic assessment because of recent signs of rising inflation.

Treasury bonds fell on speculation the Fed will keep its benchmark rate at 5.25%. The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note rose to 4.83% from 4.79% on Friday.

A barrel of light, sweet crude oil fell 52 cents to $58.81.

Highlights:

IBM was the Dow's second-biggest advancer. The tech company filed two patent-infringement lawsuits against online retailer Amazon.com over technologies used to run Internet services (story, 6B). Big Blue rose $1.08 to $91.56, while Amazon added 31 cents to $32.88.

•Hasbro rose $2.03, or 8.7%, to $25.33, The toymaker reported an 8.2% increase in its third-quarter profit amid strong sales of brands such as Playskool.

Price Of Crude Drives Wall St. Rally (LAT)

By Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, October 24, 2006

The Wall Street stocks staged a strong rally today after investors welcomed another drop in crude oil prices and news that Wal-Mart Stores would rein in spending on store expansions in order to boost earnings.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 114.54 points, or nearly 1%, to end the day at a record close: 12,116.91

Other major indexes, including the Nasdaq and the S&P 500, were also higher.

The Dow, which has reached all-time highs as it continues to build on a rally that began in August, got a boost today because crude oil futures and other energy prices ticked lower. The U.S. benchmark crude fell 52 cents to $58.81 a barrel in futures trading on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Crude oil prices have plunged about 25% since midsummer, giving the economy a boost by helping slow price inflation and leaving consumers with more money to spend at stores and restaurants. That has led Wall Street investors to grow more bullish on the nation's economic prospects.

"The picture being painted is pretty easy to suggest that the pressure on the economy from higher oil prices is easing," Richard E. Cripps, chief market strategist at Stifel Nicolaus, told the Associated Press.

Today's market rally was also tied to a surge in Wal-Mart shares, which is one of the 30 companies included in the Dow Jones index. Wal-Mart stock rose $1.91 — or nearly 4% — to close at $51.28 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Wal-Mart said capital spending on new stores and other items would rise by up to 4% in fiscal 2008, compared to as much as 20% in fiscal 2007.

"We are still very committed to growth, but our real estate projects are now being subjected to a more rigorous prioritization process," said Wal-Mart Vice Chairman John Menzer in a statement. "This store selection process will enable the company to drive higher returns by focusing on locations that make the most efficient use of capital."

NEW YORK, Oct. 23 -- Wall Street extended its rally as investors grew more confident about coming earnings reports and as a decline in oil prices bolstered hopes for higher consumer spending. The Dow Jones industrial average crossed 12,100 for the first time and set another record-high close.

The Dow rose 114.54, or 0.95 percent, to 12,116.91. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 8.42, or 0.62 percent, to 1377.02, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 13.26, or 0.57 percent, to 2355.56.

Dow component Wal-Mart Stores, which announced plans to cut capital spending to improve profit, helped the blue chips to their new high as the average's biggest advancer. The Dow's record came just three trading days after its first close past 12,000.

Strength from International Business Machines, Hasbro and Xerox also fed the advance. Just halfway through the third-quarter earnings season, companies' generally upbeat reports have given investors a renewed sense of security.

Monday's gains came despite some concerns about the Federal Reserve's two-day meeting on interest rates, which starts Tuesday. Policymakers are expected to leave interest rates unchanged.

Bulls Continue To Drive Dow To New Record (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average picked up steam after pausing Friday and surged to yet-another record amid a slew of strong profit reports and plans for slowed expansion by Wal-Mart Stores.

The Dow industrials jumped 114.54 points, or 1%, to 12116.91, the tenth record close in 15 trading sessions and up 13.1% on the year. Shares in Wal-Mart, a Dow component, rallied 3.9% after the retailer announced it will cut capital spending on new stores next year, which investors and analysts hope will translate into bigger profits.

Energy prices slipped, and bellwethers AT&T, 3M and Xerox all reported strong quarterly earnings, further boosting investors' mood.

Since the Federal Reserve held its key interest-rate target steady in August, bullish investors have been hoping the market would turn its attention more intently on corporate earnings, rather than constant speculation about the central bank's next move. Built into their rosy outlook was the assumption that the economy, though growth is slowing, is still strong enough to generate good corporate results for the third-quarter earnings season now under way.

Most Wall Street pros expect Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his fellow policy makers to leave rates unchanged again following this week's meeting, holding at 5.25%. As has been the case following previous Fed meetings, though, Wall Street pros will closely dissect the Fed's written statement due out tomorrow for any signs of increased skittishness about inflation.

Worried that such concerns will keep the Fed from cutting rates anytime soon, bond investors sent prices lower and yields higher yesterday, in a session that contrasted with the stock market's euphoria. "The bond market is more focused on the near-term risks in the economy," said strategist Jack Caffrey of J.P. Morgan Private Bank.

Stock investors watch interest rates closely because a decline in rates lowers borrowing costs and makes more money available to spend and invest.

Other stock measures rallied along with the Dow. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 0.6%, or 8.42 points, to 1377.02, up 10.3% on the year. The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.6%, or 13.26 points, to 2355.56, up 6.8% on the year.

To guard against slower growth in the U.S. economy, many bullish stock investors currently favor big-name companies they believe are better equipped to do well if business conditions worsen unexpectedly. To these investors, an economy saddled with falling housing prices and other bugaboos isn't necessarily such a bad thing, as long as the pullback is gradual and doesn't cut into employment, consumer spending or corporate bottom lines.

With third-quarter earnings reports trickling in, that scenario seems to be playing out for now, said Duncan Richardson, chief equity investment officer at Eaton Vance Corp. "Ultimately, earnings are what moves the market," he said. "So far, they've been looking pretty good for this quarter."

Gold prices tumbled, hurt by a strengthening U.S. dollar. Because gold is still viewed as an alternative form of currency in some countries, it often moves in the opposite direction of the greenback when investors lose faith in paper money as a reliable store of value.

Gold contracts for October delivery fell $13.30, or 2.2%, to $579.70 a troy ounce, up 12.1% on the year on the Comex division of the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Crude-oil futures fell 52 cents a barrel, or 0.9%, to $58.81, off 3.7% this year.

Outside the U.S., stocks rose in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, eked out a gain of 0.1%, or 0.11 point, to 226.12.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.4 billion shares, as 1,919 stocks advanced and 1,368 fell.

Bond prices fell. The 10-year Treasury note fell 10/32 point, or $3.125 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.828%. The 30-year bond fell 20/32 to yield 4.952%.

The dollar strengthened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 119.33 yen, compared with 118.69 yen Friday. The euro fell to $1.255, compared with 1.2619.

This Time, It's Not The Economy (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

In many ways, the economy has not looked so good in a long time.

The price of gas at the pump has tumbled since midsummer. Unemployment has fallen to its lowest level in more than five years. On Wall Street, the Dow Jones industrial average has finally returned to its glory days of the late 1990's, setting records almost daily.

President Bush, in hopes of winning credit for his party's stewardship of the economy, is spending two days this week campaigning on the theme that the economy is purring. "No question that a strong economy is going to help our candidates," Mr. Bush said in a CNBC interview yesterday, "primarily because they have got something to run on, they can say our economy's good because I voted for tax relief."

But Republican candidates do not seem to be getting any traction from the glowing economic statistics with midterm elections just two weeks away.

The economy is virtually nowhere to be found among the campaign ads of embattled Republican incumbents fighting to hold onto their House or Senate seats. Nor is it showing up as a strong weapon in the arsenal of Republican governors defending their jobs from Democrats.

"I don't know of another election cycle in which the economy was so good, yet the election prospects for the incumbent party looked so bad," said Frank Luntz, a Republican strategist. "If something goes wrong, Republicans are to blame. If something goes right, Republicans don't get credit."

The only place that the economy has emerged as a major campaign theme has been in the aging industrial heartland around the Great Lakes, where the bleak economic prospects are being deployed against incumbents, Republicans and Democrats alike. But where the economic winds seem to be blowing their way, voters appear unwilling to hear that Republican policies made it so.

Disenchantment over the war in Iraq has morphed into disillusionment over the direction of the country, breeding distrust in the administration's policies, surveys suggest. Moreover, concerned by weak wage growth, costly health care and eroding benefits, many middle-class voters do not see the economy improving for them.

"Voters overwhelmingly don't approve of the president on the economy," said Amy Walter, a senior editor at the Cook Political Report, a nonpartisan firm that handicaps political races. "It comes down to the issue of credibility. And so many voters feel so pessimistic about the direction of the country."

Richard Curtin, who runs the University of Michigan's consumer surveys, has found that even as consumer confidence has improved since gasoline prices took a tumble in August, the White House has gotten no credit for the gain.

"The one indicator that didn't improve," Mr. Curtin said, "was confidence in the government's economic policies."

For many voters, the overall issue has faded in importance as the economy has managed to grow steadily in recent years. In late 2003, The New York Times/CBS News poll found, 4 in 10 voters said either the economy or jobs was the most pressing problem facing the nation. This month, only 13 percent shared that concern.

But Republicans' inability to harness an improving economy in their political favor appears mostly to be a function of the weight of other big national issues stacked against them. Prime among them are voters' growing concerns about the costs of the war in Iraq, fed by a stream of American casualties displayed every night on television.

The seeming morass in Iraq has hurt Republicans in more ways than one, analysts say, contributing to the notion that the country is heading in the wrong direction and fueling distrust in the administration of President Bush that has leaked out to other fronts — including his management of the economy.

The lack of confidence in the administration undercuts the support by voters who want to vote for Republicans on local issues.

Terris Kennedy, 59, a former military nurse who is the chief nursing officer at Shore Memorial Hospital in Nassawadox, Va., says she may well vote Democratic in the Virginia Senate race even though she plans to support the Republican incumbent, Thelma Drake, in the state's Second Congressional District, centered in Virginia Beach.

Ms. Kennedy likes Ms. Drake because she seems interested in the challenge of how to deliver health services to diverse low-income populations.

But she said her concern over the war in Iraq and her skepticism about whether it was a good idea to stay the course there might lead her to vote for a Democrat, James Webb, over the Republican incumbent George Allen in the Senate race. "Senator Allen is very close to the President," Ms. Kennedy said.

Tim Murtaugh, Ms. Drake's campaign manager, said Iraq and immigration were the two biggest issues on the minds of voters in this military-heavy district, home to the Atlantic fleet of the Navy and Langley Air Force Base. Still, he said that the district had nearly full employment and that he believed that voters were aware that the local economy was strong.

Ms. Drake's campaign ads have suggested that her rival, Phil Kellam, will vote to raise taxes. But Ms. Kennedy disagrees with that.

"I don't see Democrats as tax-and-spend liberals," she said. She has more doubts about the government's economic track record. "Even though the deficit has come down we still have a horrible deficit," Ms. Kennedy said.

It has been some time since the public last trusted Republicans more than Democrats on economic issues.

Of voters polled in the latest New York Times/CBS News national survey this month, 60 percent rated the economy as either good or very good, up from 56 percent in September.

But voters favor Democrats over Republicans as stewards of the economy by 51 to 36 percent. The 15-point margin, which remained the same as in September, is the widest since the survey first included the question in 1984.

Republicans have a tough act to follow. President Bush pointed out yesterday that employers have added 6.6 million jobs since August 2003, finally gaining ground after a long decline in employment over most of his first term. But the figure falls well short of the nine million jobs created during the same period of the Clinton administration.

Still, the National Republican Congressional Committee believes that the improving economy provides a good issue for many Republicans to run on, and has spent money on TV commercials praising the administration's economic track record in several Midwest districts and upstate New York.

"The strategy is to run on the role of tax relief in the improvement of the economy," said Jonathan Collegio, a spokesman for the committee. "We can target the Democrats who have voiced support for repealing or letting expire the tax cuts of 2001 and 2003."

A few candidates have taken this tack, but most have done so sparingly. Some Republican challengers are using the economy as a campaign issue in places where it is doing poorly.

Dick DeVos, the Republican challenger to Jennifer Granholm in Michigan's gubernatorial race, reminded voters in campaign commercials that the state still had "the worst unemployment in the nation."

Perhaps the biggest challenge Republicans face to take credit for an improving economy is that for many voters, their economic prospects do not feel as great as overall statistics might imply. Rather than celebrate the stock market's gains and the overall growth of the economy, many voters are worried about the wages of ordinary workers, which have just started to improve after several years of falling short or barely keeping up with inflation.

The tens of millions of people lacking health insurance and the steady shrinkage in traditional pensions have also added to the sense of personal insecurity.

Consider Florida's 22nd Congressional District, stretching along the Atlantic coast in Broward and Palm Beach Counties, north of Miami. Employment in the district has grown at three times the national average over the last three years, according to an analysis by Moody's Economy.com. Unemployment there is well under the national level.

But the Republican incumbent, E. Clay Shaw Jr., running neck and neck with Ron Klein, a Democrat, has steered away from celebrating the area's sunny economic prospects. Instead, he has pointed to his record on the environment, talked about how he disagreed with President Bush's attempt to privatize Social Security, and accused Mr. Klein of being in the pocket of sugar companies.

That might be the appropriate strategy. David Hensley, who lives in Mr. Shaw's district, says he will probably vote for him, as he has before. But Mr. Hensley, 62, is not doing so out of any sense of economic prosperity.

"The economy is in the toilet no matter who is in control," Mr. Hensley said.

And concerns over how fair the prosperous economy has been to most Americans appear to be hurting Republican prospects even among those who see themselves as doing relatively well.

Ann O'Callahan, a 64-year old Irish immigrant in suburban Philadelphia, defines herself as a social conservative. She voted Republican in 2000, but switched to the Democrats in 2004. This year she plans to vote Democratic again, mainly because of the economy. "I am very disturbed by the economic policies of the Bush administration," she said.

Ms. O'Callahan's district, Pennsylvania's Seventh, is an island of relative affluence. The median income in the area, according to the Census Bureau, topped $63,000 last year, more than a third higher than the national median. According to Economy.com's analysis, based on county data, unemployment this year in the district should average 3.8 percent, well below the national average.

But, Ms. O'Callahan said, jobs were not enough. "I work with job placement so I see up close how a lot more work is demanded of people, how benefits are disappearing, how hourly rates have been stagnant throughout the Bush administration," she said. She said that jobs were plentiful, "but paying $8 an hour with no benefits."

Republican leaders might still try to use an improving economy for a final campaign push. Mr. Luntz, the Republican strategist, said economic issues should help the party in Florida, Georgia and the Carolinas.

Mr. Collegio of the National Republican Campaign Committee said the campaign group planned a flurry of advertisements warning that, as they see it, Democrats will hurt the economy by raising taxes.

Still, even that tried-and-true Republican theme may not work so well this year.

"In these races you just pray for a Republican claiming that tax cuts are the reason for the good economy," said Stanley Greenberg, a Democratic pollster. "Candidates don't do it because the public doesn't believe it. And a candidate who claimed it would seem out of touch."

Rising Stock Prices, Falling Gas Costs Seen Helping Republicans At Polls (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — The economy will likely help Republicans more than Democrats in the elections in two weeks, but that opinion is not unanimous, according to economists polled by USA TODAY.

DOJ_NMG_0085516

In a survey conducted Oct. 13-18, nearly half the 45 economists who responded to a question on the election said Republicans will benefit the most from the economy in the Nov. 7 midterm elections.

"The economic performance in the last several years is some of the best in economic history," says Mike Englund, chief economist for economic consulting firm Action Economics, who expects the economy will help Republicans.

Economists who expected Republicans to benefit from the economy named lower tax rates, falling gasoline prices and rising stock prices as factors that will help Republicans.

Some of those surveyed, including those at Bank of America and the National Association of Realtors, say a low unemployment rate will aid the GOP. The unemployment rate has been 4.6% in three of the last five months, the lowest in five years.

But Wells Fargo senior economist Scott Anderson says Democrats will gain an advantage because many people are seeing little increase in pay after factoring in inflation. During the first eight months of 2006, average weekly earnings of non-supervisory workers after adjusting for inflation rose less than 1% and in some months actually fell.

Inflation-adjusted earnings jumped in September, but were somewhat skewed by a plunge in energy costs, which led to a sharp drop in inflation that is unlikely to be repeated.

"There is still a lot of frustration in the middle class," Anderson says. "We're seeing pretty solid job growth. But as long as wages lag, you are going to see a lot of pessimism on the economy."

Richard Yamarone, director of economic research at Argus Research, says neither party will gain an advantage from the economy. "The Republicans should benefit greatly because of the shape of the economy; however, that message doesn't seem to have gotten out," he says. "There are other issues that are overriding the economic issues."

Big Worries For Big Oil (WSJ)

By Chip Cummins

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

With crude prices falling and oil-field costs on the rise, major oil companies have a big problem: sustaining their phenomenal profit growth.

Exxon Mobil Corp., Royal Dutch Shell PLC and BP PLC have all relied on big oil-price jumps to fuel a streak of handsome earnings gains and, in many cases, record quarterly profits in recent years. The three companies reported combined earnings of about $25 billion in the second quarter; in the third quarter of last year, they earned about $25.4 billion.

Many of the world's biggest publicly traded oil companies report earnings this week and are expected to post strong results, thanks to high crude prices.

U.S.-benchmark oil hit a record of nearly $80 a barrel this summer. (In inflation-adjusted terms, oil was at its most expensive in 1980.) Since July, though, crude prices have fallen about 25%, sapping the momentum from short-term profit-growth potential at a time of rising costs and higher taxes. And if oil prices continue to drop, that could drive new thinking among oil executives over whether to pursue big tie-ups.

BP, which reports earnings Tuesday, estimates West Texas crude, a benchmark oil type in the U.S., averaged about $70 a barrel for the quarter. That is still higher than the average price a year ago of about $63. But current prices are now hovering around $58. (See related article1.) U.S. natural-gas prices and gross profit margins from making refined products such as gasoline are also sharply lower than a year ago.

Even before the steep drop-off in prices, earnings had been blunted by side effects of the commodities boom. Oil-field costs have skyrocketed for many projects because of higher demand for everything from steel to software among energy companies eager to cash in on the boom. Competition for new prospects has heated up, ratcheting up auction prices for fresh exploration acreage.

If oil prices stabilize or drop further, cost inflation could also subside. But costs generally take time to catch up with swings in commodity prices. That poses a growing challenge to profitability in the short term.

Neil McMahon, a London-based oil analyst at Sanford C. Bernstein, says recent trends of lower commodity prices and higher costs mean quarterly results this time around aren't likely to offer much positive surprises for investors. In a note to clients Friday, he said he expects to see further evidence of cost pressure when companies report this week.

A handful of big companies suffered significant production shortfalls in the July-to-September quarter because of unplanned disruptions. BP partially shut down its big Alaskan oil field because of pipeline corrosion there, crimping its output and that of its biggest partners in the field, Exxon and ConocoPhillips. Shell continues to suffer partial shutdowns in Nigeria, amid violent insurgency attacks in that major oil-exporting nation.

Oppenheimer & Co. analysts expect the major oil companies to post third-quarter earnings about 10% above results from a year ago but about 10% lower than this year's second quarter because of production shortfalls, cost and tax increases and moderating oil prices.

Many companies are expected to post higher profit margins from chemical operations and from marketing, which includes sales at gasoline stations, partly compensating for lackluster commodity prices.

If prices continue falling, two other big questions for investors may emerge: Will the world's largest oil companies curb their generous share-buyback programs? And will they start looking for acquisitions, now that share prices have fallen along with commodity markets, making some targets look cheaper?

So far this year, BP has showered investors with $12.3 billion in buybacks and dividends. In July, Exxon said it would increase spending on buybacks to $7 billion in the third quarter, up from $6 billion in the second quarter.

But shareholder payouts can be sensitive to commodity-price swings. For instance, BP has said it expects to deliver about $65 billion to shareholders through 2008 if crude sticks at $60 a barrel and if U.S. natural-gas prices and refining margins stay lofty. Those expected proceeds would fall more than 20% if commodity-price assumptions were revised down to the $40-a-barrel level.

Jeroen van der Veer, Shell's chief executive, has said repeatedly that he didn't see value in making big purchases amid recent high oil prices. Monday, he announced Shell had made an approach to the board of Shell's main Canadian affiliate, with an offer to buy out minority shareholders for about C$7.7 billion, or about $6.8 billion.

In an interview, Mr. van der Veer said the timing of the approach was more about creating long-term value, not about getting a bargain at Tuesday's lower oil prices. He said the current oil price "is probably one component of a total mix" of factors determining the decision to pursue the deal, and said Shell hadn't changed its acquisition strategy.

Fanning speculation of a fresh round of oil-patch deals, Premier Oil PLC, a small British independent oil company, said Monday it had received a buyout proposal from an unnamed party. Premier, with a market capitalization of about £1 billion, or $1.9 billion, said negotiations were at "an extremely early stage."

Wave Of Change Expected On Election Day (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

The wave is coming.

At least that is what political scientists are predicting about the midterm elections on Nov. 7. The academics could be wrong, of course; they often are.

But one of the peculiar facts about American politics is that every once in a while citizens in disparate parts of the country decide in the same year to reject an unusually large number of candidates for Congress from one party and to replace them with candidates from the other party.

That kind of outpouring is known as a wave, and it last occurred 12 years ago when Republicans gained a whopping 53 seats in the House and took control of that chamber for the first time in 40 years. Polls are now showing signs that the tide of public opinion is flowing in the opposite direction and that voters could vote Republicans out of office in droves this year, returning Democrats to power in the House and possibly in the Senate as well.

"This is going to be a wave year," said Larry J. Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia. "The only question is whether it will be medium-size wave or a high wave for the Democrats."

Indiana State University's Carl Klarner and Stan Buchanan used fancy computer models in June to predict that Democrats would pick up 22 seats in the House, enough to give them 224 seats, six more than they would need for majority control. Alan I. Abramowitz of Emory University in Atlanta used his own model last month to forecast that Democrats would gain 29 House seats. The professors did not predict that Democrats would take charge of the Senate -- a six-seat gain is needed to win a majority there -- though they do envision Democratic gains in that body of two to three seats.

Nonetheless, the realization of these numbers would constitute a wave.

This year's anti-Republican swell -- if it arrives in the dimensions professors imagine -- would be a wavelet by historical standards, said Linda L. Fowler, a political scientist at Dartmouth College. Voting waves were tsunami-size in the 19th and 20th centuries. Seven times before World War II and once afterward (in 1948), 70 or more seats flipped in the House.

But no one is expecting a change of that magnitude this year.

The main reason is that most congressional districts have been carefully reconfigured in recent decades to elect candidates from one party regardless of the national mood. "Democrats have relatively few seats available to them that are now being held by the other party," said Gary C. Jacobson of the University of California at San Diego.

Incumbents also have towering advantages in both financial resources and access to communications with constituents that make them difficult to unseat. In addition, negative campaign commercials and citizens' persistent apathy toward government have tended to keep voter turnout low, which primarily helps incumbents, especially GOP incumbents, election experts agree.

But a big turnover of seats is still possible. In fact, a wave has struck Congress once or twice a decade for the past 50 years.

These have mostly come in midterm elections -- when presidential candidates were not on the ballot -- including 1958, 1966, 1974, 1986 (in the Senate) and 1994. Occasionally a wave will come in a presidential election year, as it did in 1980.

What all of these movements have in common is that they happened when most voters were unhappy with the president. "A general sense of dissatisfaction with the president and his party is often a cause of a wave, as it was in 1994 under Bill Clinton," Abramowitz said. "The lower the president's job approval rating, the more seats his party tends to lose in the House."

The party that controls the White House routinely loses at least some House seats during midterm elections. But presidents who are broadly disliked compound that effect, sometimes enough to produce waves that dash members of his party. That is why even Republicans are acknowledging the strong possibility of a wave this year; President Bush's job approval rating has dipped below 40 percent lately, a dangerously low number.

Recent waves have also coincided with highly publicized scandals (in 1974, it was Watergate) and unpopular wars (in 1966, it was Vietnam). This year Bush and his party are facing both -- the fallout from the Jack Abramoff and Mark Foley scandals as well as widespread disapproval of the war in Iraq. "With a combination of scandal and war, the makings of a wave are all there," said John J. Pitney Jr. of Claremont McKenna College in California.

Thomas F. Schaller of the University of Maryland Baltimore County said Republicans have been holding off an inevitable congressional correction for at least two election cycles because of the extraordinary circumstances surrounding the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. A welling up of patriotism kept the GOP strong. But enough time has passed since then for that to have subsided. Now, Schaller said, "the wave is ready to break."

Wave elections frequently end up being larger and they knock off more incumbents than was initially anticipated. "Typical of a wave is that there are some lawmakers who seem safe on Election Day, but they turn out to be losers on election night," Pitney said.

Then again, predictions of waves come and go, like tides themselves, and they do not always come to true. "You can tell that a wave happened afterwards," said James A. Thurber, a political scientist at American University. "That's when people amend their stories about them."

How High The Wave? Don't Just Think 1994; Think 1974, 1958, 1982 (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

DOJ_NMG_0085519

With only a couple of weeks until Election Day, we know there will be a Democratic wave on Nov. 7. And we can be fairly certain that by historical standards it will be high — possibly very high. But we still don't know how many Republicans once considered safe will be swept out of office.

The national political environment currently is worse than it was in 1994, when the Democrats lost 52 House seats, eight Senate seats and 10 governorships, and when Republicans won GOP control of the House for the first time in decades.

You heard me right: It's worse this year than it was in 1994, when voters were dissatisfied with the first two years of the Bill Clinton presidency.

President Bush's approval ratings are worse than Clinton's were — Bush's are in the upper 30s, while Clinton's were in the mid-to-upper 40s — and the 16 percent approval rating for Congress in the latest NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll ranks far below where Congress stood prior to the 1994 midterms (24 percent).

Similarly, the generic ballot in the NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll was much closer back in '94, when Republicans held a 5-point edge right before the elections. Now, there's a 15-point Democratic advantage.

Moreover, the problems hounding Republican Congressional candidates — which range from a second midterm election (as compared to a less dangerous first midterm in the Clinton administration) to House scandals to an unpopular war — are far more challenging than anything Democratic Congressional candidates faced in 1994.

If you are looking for a midterm election year that is comparable to 2006, you need to move beyond 1994 to include other recent "wave" midterms, particularly 1974, 1958 and 1982. In 1974 and 1958, the president's party, in each case the Republicans, lost 48 seats. In 1982, Republicans lost 26.

Each of these three elections holds a lesson for anyone trying to understand what is likely to happen in House races on Nov. 7.

The 1994 midterm was about Clinton — particularly the Clinton health care plan, gays in the military and his perceived liberalism.

In 1982, the election was about Ronald Reagan and "his recession."

In 1974, the election was about Richard Nixon and Watergate, and then-President Gerald Ford's September pardon of the disgraced former president. To some extent, it also was about a party that too frequently seemed to defend and shield Nixon.

And the 1958 election was about a farm recession and dissatisfaction with the Eisenhower administration in a part of the country that made up a big chunk of the GOP's base.

I don't count 1966 as a midterm wave, although Democrats lost 47 seats in the House while holding the White House. Rather, that midterm was a rebound election, coming two years after the GOP's disastrous 1964 presidential election.

Given that, the past four true midterm wave elections saw the victorious party winning 52, 48, 48 and 26 seats, suggesting a reasonable range for success for Democrats this year.

Given that the political environment right now is worse for Republicans than at any time since 1974 — and that Republicans hold 232 House seats, which is far, far above their level in any of the four previous cycles — their vulnerability is great.

Of course, it matters where a party starts, since an overextended party (that is, one holding lots of seats that ought to belong to the opposition) inevitably has more seats at risk, while one that holds relatively few districts has fewer to lose.

The GOP's 48-seat loss in 1974 was stunning because the party started the election holding fewer than 200 seats. In 1982, Republicans lost 26 seats starting at roughly the same point.

While the GOP isn't overextended now, its 15-seat majority suggests it is now near the upper limit of its "normal" range. It holds a few Democratic seats, and Democrats hold a few Republican seats, but most districts are represented by the "correct" party. Still, with Republicans holding 232 seats in the House, the party has plenty of districts to lose.

So where does this leave us?

With the national environment being as it is — and given the last round of redistricting, which limits possible Democratic gains — Republicans probably are at risk to lose as few as 45 seats and as many as 60 seats, based on historical results. Given how the national mood compares to previous wave years and to the GOP's 15-seat House majority, Democratic gains almost certainly would fall to the upper end of that range.

The paucity of competitive districts limits Republican risk, but how much? Unfortunately, I don't have an answer. But if redistricting cuts that kind of wave by half, Democrats would gain between 22 and 30 seats next month. And if the new districts slice Democratic gains by a smaller but still significant one-third, Democrats would pick up from 30 to 45 seats.

Dangerously big waves can be very strong and very unpredictable. They can bring widespread destruction and chaos. Republicans now must hope that this year's midterm wave isn't as bad as national poll numbers suggest it could be, because those national numbers suggest a truly historic tidal wave.

War, Economy Sway Race (USAT)

USA Today, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — Two weeks before Election Day, voters are more focused on national issues than in any previous congressional election, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll finds, and they express unprecedented pessimism on the war in Iraq and downbeat attitudes about the economy.

Just 19% of those surveyed say the United States is winning in Iraq, an all-time low. And 38% say their own member of Congress doesn't deserve re-election, an all-time high.

POLL RESULTS: Congress | Bush | Iraq

As Republicans face a wave of voter discontent unmatched since they won control of Congress in 1994, Democrats are pouring money into congressional contests that until recently looked out of reach. They are running TV ads in 42 districts they are trying to wrest from the GOP, three of them new targets starting today.

Republicans have bought TV time to defend 33 seats and — with the addition today of a Savannah, Ga., district — are targeting five districts held by Democrats.

As the party in control of the government, Republicans need to convince voters that President Bush and Congress are doing a good job, that the war in Iraq was the right thing to do and that the economy is on the upswing — the issues that are driving voter attitudes.

The poll, taken Friday through Sunday, shows no progress made on those fronts.

"It's been more bad news piled on top of already bad news" for Republicans, says Charles Franklin, a political scientist at the University of Wisconsin, Madison.

"Can they turn it around? In principle they can, but time is running short."

Some Republicans concede that Democrats are likely to capture at least one chamber.

"Most people think that we would have a hard time holding the House if we voted today," says Charles Black, a senior GOP strategist and consultant to the Republican National Committee (RNC). "That said, two weeks is a long time."

On one measure, Republicans did see significant improvement. Two weeks ago, likely voters favored the unnamed Democratic congressional candidate in their district over the Republican by 23 percentage points, 59%-36%. The survey was taken immediately after Florida Rep. Mark Foley resigned in the congressional page scandal.

Now, the Democratic advantage on the generic congressional ballot has narrowed to 13 points, 54%-41%.

Still, that is more than the 12-point advantage Republicans held at this point in 1994, weeks before they swept to control of the House and Senate during President Clinton's first term, and higher than the margin held by either party in elections since then.

For months, Rep. Tom Reynolds, head of the National Republican Congressional Committee and who himself is in a tough race, has insisted that GOP candidates would survive a difficult political landscape because House elections traditionally turn on local issues, not national ones.

However, in the new poll, 43% of likely voters say national issues will make the biggest difference in their vote; 24% say local or state issues. That's the first overwhelming edge for national issues since the question was first asked in a Times Mirror poll in 1994.

A cascade of Republican misfortunes, including a string of ethics scandals and escalating violence in Iraq, has set the stage for a Democratic resurgence. Only an event as dramatic as the capture of Osama bin Laden or a terrorist attack could reverse the trend toward Democrats, analysts say.

"Nobody's listening to the rhetoric anymore," says political scientist Gary Jacobson of the University of California, San Diego. "They're responding to the news."

GOP advantages dwindle

Democrats need 15 new seats in the House and six in the Senate to claim a majority. Non-partisan analysts Stuart Rothenberg and Charles Cook estimate Democrats will gain at least 18 to 20 House seats and possibly more.

Taking over the Senate is a tougher proposition. Democrats are favored to pick up four Senate seats held by Republicans and are competitive in three more in border states: Virginia, Tennessee and Missouri.

Democrats are keeping an eye on a potential pickup in Arizona, Republicans on possibilities in New Jersey or Michigan.

This year, some traditional Republican advantages "aren't quite what they seemed," says political scientist John Pitney at Claremont McKenna College in Claremont, Calif. Among them:

•Money. Republicans have raised more money than Democrats overall, but Democrats are competitive, and some candidates are experiencing a late surge.

The RNC and the GOP House and Senate campaign committees had a combined $77.6 million in cash on hand as of Sept. 30, according to federal reports. The three Democratic committees reported $67.3 million on hand.

Democratic Party committees have invested at least $12.6 million to support Senate hopefuls Claire McCaskill in Missouri, Harold Ford Jr. in Tennessee and Jim Webb in Virginia.

Republican committees have spent $8.6 million in Missouri and Tennessee, including $1.8 million Monday for TV ads against McCaskill.

Brian Nick of the National Republican Senatorial Committee says the GOP may be on the defensive in those three conservative states, but he notes Democrats have been forced to spend heavily to defend seats in New Jersey, Maryland and Michigan — three traditionally Democratic states.

"Those dollars aren't going against our incumbents or for our open seats," he says.

•Redistricting. Pitney, a former Republican congressional aide, says districts mapped after the 2000 Census to protect GOP incumbents are changing and in some cases becoming less Republican.

"We're seeing demographic shifts that are bringing formerly safe Republican seats into reach for the Democrats," he says.

Robert Lang, a demographer at Virginia Tech's Metropolitan Institute, says new, far-flung mobility patterns mean the population and politics of a congressional district can shift "over half a decade, what would seem like the blink of an eye."

Many inner suburbs become more Democratic as Republicans move to outer suburbs. That has helped put into play seats such as the one held by Rep. Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio, near Columbus.

•Economic news. Low unemployment, falling gas prices and a record-setting stock market typically would translate into warm feelings about the economy. But 55% of Americans rate the economy as only fair or poor, and 54% say it is getting worse.

In places where the economy is a top concern — including Ohio, Michigan and Pennsylvania — people are upset about lost jobs, slow-growing wages for many workers and overseas competition. Democrats lambaste their opponents for voting against hikes in the minimum wage, promising a raise if they win control.

•Turnout by conservative Christians. Leaders of conservative Christian groups, including the Family Research Council, have complained that the Republican officials their members helped elect haven't delivered on such issues as a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage. So-called values voters also have been buffeted by the scandal involving Foley's lewd computer messages to former House pages.

Democrats in several states — including Ohio, Colorado, North Carolina and Tennessee — allude to Foley and other scandals in ads on Christian radio stations.

Melissa Deckman, a Christian-politics expert at Washington College in Easton, Md., says the party may convert some listeners and encourage others to stay home.

"The more likely situation is Christian conservatives are not going to go out and vote," she says.

DOJ_NMG_0085522

Foley was the third GOP House member to resign this year amid scandal. A fourth, Ohio Rep. Bob Ney, pleaded guilty to corruption charges this month. A new problem arose last week when the FBI confirmed it was investigating whether Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., used his position to help his lobbyist daughter get contracts. Two days later, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee bought $1.6 million in TV time to run negative ads against him.

'Bogged down' in war

The war in Iraq is the single most powerful issue shaping the public's mood, the survey indicates, and attitudes toward the war have soured significantly. A record 35% say the war is going "very badly" for the United States. The number that says insurgents are winning the war has more than doubled since February, to 21%.

Now, 58% of those polled say the invasion of Iraq was a mistake. Of those with that view, more than three of four are supporting the Democrat for Congress.

"Foreign policy, whether it's Iraq or in general, has become a strong issue for the Democrats, and Republicans are running away from it," New York Sen. Charles Schumer, the Democrats' Senate campaign chief, said in an interview.

Former GOP House majority leader Dick Armey says small-government conservatives don't believe the United States can create a democracy in Iraq and have become convinced the war was unnecessary. "We've gotten ourselves bogged down in a mess we can't get out of," he says.

In the survey, one-third of conservatives called the invasion a mistake, as did two-thirds of moderates and more than 8 of 10 liberals.

Some Republican candidates closely aligned with President Bush have edged away from his "stay the course" message. Virginia Sen. George Allen, facing a stiff challenge from former Navy secretary Jim Webb, has begun talking in the past week about "adapting" and "adjusting" the U.S. approach. Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., for years a staunch war supporter, said this month he is "losing faith" in how it's being fought.

Playing the fear card

Democrats call those shifts too little, too late. "Changing direction in Iraq starts with changing the people we send to Washington," Shays' challenger, Diane Farrell, said Saturday in the Democratic response to Bush's radio address.

Democrats, who since the Vietnam War have battled voter perceptions that they are soft on defense, are finding a more receptive audience for the argument that they could do a better job of protecting America and conducting its foreign policy. In the poll, 52% say the Iraq war has made the USA less safe from terrorism.

Nonetheless, Republicans continue to view the issue of terrorism as their strongest asset — both to persuade independent-minded voters and to energize core supporters. After circulating it in an e-mail to millions of supporters, the RNC broadcast an ad Sunday and Monday that showed bin Laden and other al-Qaeda leaders making threats against Americans and then the orange fireball of an explosion. The only sound: the ticking of a bomb's timer. "These are the stakes," the ad concludes, stark white words on a black screen.

Those words echo an infamous commercial President Lyndon Johnson used against Republican Barry Goldwater in 1964. Then, a girl counting daisy petals gave way to a missile countdown and a mushroom cloud. "These are the stakes," LBJ declared.

Phil Singer of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee says the new GOP ad is a reminder that, five years after the 9/11 attacks, the Bush administration still hasn't caught bin Laden.

'Intensity of feeling' a factor

Though congressional elections customarily turn on local issues, voters by nearly 20 percentage points say national issues will make the biggest difference in their vote.

Bush, whose job approval rating remained at 37%, could be a liability for candidates. By 41%-27%, those surveyed say they are more likely to vote for a candidate who opposes the president than one who supports him.

The RNC has built a get-out-the-vote machine renowned for its sophisticated technology and targeting of potential supporters. Democrats have long relied on a combination of efforts — by labor unions, interest groups, state parties and national committees — that failed to match the GOP operation in the last three elections.

This year, analysts say the underlying landscape favors Democrats.

"The Republicans' turnout operation is better," says Curtis Gans, director of the non-partisan Center for the Study of the American Electorate. "But the intensity of feeling is on the Democratic side. The issue climate is on the Democratic side."

Some groups are trying to harness that intensity. The AFL-CIO is spending a record $40 million to contact union members and encourage them to vote. MoveOn.org is running a Web-based phone bank that matches tens of thousands of volunteers with Democratic-leaning voters in three Senate races and 50 House contests.

Eli Pariser, director of MoveOn's political arm, says the project targets people who voted in the 2004 presidential race but not in the 2002 congressional elections. Some are Democrats, and others are considered likely to support Democrats based on an analysis of consumer data such as magazine subscriptions.

"This is basically a program to deliver 5 million nudges, 5 million phone calls," Pariser says.

Strategists for both sides say that phone banks and other turnout tools can only accomplish so much. "A field program is like a sailboat," Singer says. "You can have a beautiful sailboat that can win the America's Cup, but if there's no wind, it's not going anywhere."

Superior money and turnout aren't enough to prevail this year, the GOP's Black agrees. "We still need to get the national tide to swing back our way a little bit to keep our majority," he says.

Independent Voters Favor Democrats By 2 To 1 In Poll (WP)

By Dan Balz And Jon Cohen

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Two weeks before the midterm elections, Republicans are losing the battle for independent voters, who now strongly favor Democrats on Iraq and other major issues facing the country and overwhelmingly prefer to see them take over the House in November, according to a new Washington Post-ABC News poll.

The new poll underscores how much of a drag the war threatens to be on Republican candidates in competitive races. With debate underway in Washington about possible course changes in Iraq, Americans cite the war as the most important issue in determining their vote next month more often than any other issue, and those who do favor Democrats over Republicans by 76 percent to 21 percent.

Independents are poised to play a pivotal role in next month's elections because Democrats and Republicans are basically united behind candidates of their own parties. Ninety-five percent of Democrats said they will support Democratic candidates for the House, while slightly fewer Republicans, 88 percent, said they plan to vote for their party's candidates.

The independent voters surveyed said they plan to support Democratic candidates over Republicans by roughly 2 to 1 -- 59 percent to 31 percent -- the largest margin in any Post-ABC News poll this year. Forty-five percent said it would be good if Democrats recaptured the House majority, while 10 percent said it would not be. The rest said it would not matter.

The poll also found that independents are highly pessimistic about the Iraq war and the overall state of the country. Just 23 percent said the country is heading in the right direction, compared with 75 percent who said things have gotten off track. Only a quarter of independents approve of the job Congress has done this year. Only a third say the Iraq war is worth fighting. A month before the 2004 election, independents were almost evenly split on that question.

Independent voters may strongly favor Democrats, but their vote appears motivated more by dissatisfaction with Republicans than by enthusiasm for the opposition party. About half of those independents who said they plan to vote Democratic in their district said they are doing so primarily to vote against the Republican candidate rather than to affirmatively support the Democratic candidate. Just 22 percent of independents voting for Democrats are doing so "very enthusiastically."

Among the electorate as a whole, the poll highlighted how the political climate continues to favor Democrats. President Bush's approval rating among all Americans stood at 37 percent. Two weeks ago he was at 39 percent, and in September he was at 42 percent. By more than 2 to 1, Americans disapprove of the way Congress has been doing its job.

The generic vote for the House -- a question that asks people which party they favor in their district but that does not match actual candidates against one another -- remained strongly in the Democrats' favor, 54 percent to 41 percent.

These national numbers do not translate directly into predictions of whether Democrats will gain the 15 House seats or six Senate seats they need to take control of those chambers. But an analysis of the findings sheds light on why Republicans are now deeply worried about losing their House majority and why the Senate is in play as well.

The poll showed that Democrats not only have a significant advantage in blue states -- those won in the 2004 presidential race by Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) -- but also have a narrow advantage in Bush-backing red states, which helps to explain why the number of GOP-held seats that appear competitive has increased recently.

Iraq is cited most frequently as the most important issue in the midterm elections. Two weeks ago, 26 percent of those surveyed cited the war as the single most important issue determining their vote in November, compared with 23 percent who cited the economy and 14 percent who said terrorism. In the new poll, 27 percent said Iraq, 19 percent cited the economy and 14 percent said terrorism.

Independents are almost as likely as Democrats to cite Iraq as the single most important issue in the campaign. Both groups are twice as likely as Republicans to single out the war when asked about the election's top issues.

Independents do not limit their criticism of the war's handling to the president. Fifty-five percent of independents said congressional Republicans deserve a "great deal" or a "good amount" of the blame for problems in Iraq. Fewer, 36 percent, give congressional Republicans credit for helping prevent terrorist attacks against the United States since Sept. 11, 2001.

Bush agreed last week with a commentator's suggestion that a recent surge in violence in Iraq could be equivalent to the 1968 Tet Offensive, which marked a turning point in U.S. public support for the Vietnam War. But the percentage of Americans who believe that Iraq could be another Vietnam is no higher, at 45 percent, than it was in June.

Four in 10 Americans said the war is not worth fighting, and three in four said the war has damaged the United States' image in the rest of the world. Not quite half of those surveyed said that overall, the war has helped to improve the lives of the Iraqi people, a sharp decline since June, when roughly seven in 10 believed it had.

The small decline in the economy's ranking as a top voting issue comes at a time when Americans are increasingly upbeat about the state of the national economy. Fifty-five percent of those surveyed said the economy is "good" or "excellent," a sharp jump over the past two weeks and the highest since Bush took office.

But Republicans appear to be getting little tangible benefit from the growing economic optimism, which has come amid declining gasoline prices and a record high in the Dow Jones industrial average. Those who cite the economy as the most important issue favor Democrats by 18 percentage points, 57 percent to 39 percent.

One reason is that only a quarter of those surveyed said they are getting ahead financially. About the same number said they are falling behind. Most, however, said they are just able to maintain their standard of living. Republicans have an advantage only among those who say their financial condition is improving.

Among those voting primarily on Iraq, Democrats hold a sizable lead, 76 percent to 21 percent, in voting intentions. Democrats also are favored by voters who cite health care as their most important issue, while those voting on terrorism or immigration strongly favor Republicans.

Voters also continue to trust Democrats more than Republicans to deal with the war, the economy, North Korea and ethics in government. On terrorism, the two parties are at parity.

But independents, the key swing voter group, strongly trust the Democrats on all of those issues by margins ranging from 14 percentage points on terrorism to 23 points on Iraq and North Korea and 26 points on ethics in government.

The growing independent support for Democratic House candidates represents a significant shift in attitudes since the 2004 election, when Democrats held only a slim advantage. In winning reelection, Bush narrowly lost the independent vote, 50 percent to 48 percent, and in the vote for the House, independents split 50 to 46 for Democratic candidates.

One important question that will affect the outcome of the elections is who shows up to vote. More Democrats than Republicans, 32 percent vs. 24 percent, said they are "very closely" following the campaign, and Democrats are more likely to be very enthusiastic about voting. Independents show less enthusiasm about this election than do Democrats or Republicans.

Almost three in five respondents said this congressional election is more important than past congressional elections. A higher percentage of Democrats said this election has more significance than did Republicans or independents.

Both parties are making extraordinary efforts to turn out their voters in November. Twenty-nine percent of registered voters said they had been contacted by one party or the other for their votes, and three in 10 of those said they had been contacted by advocates for both parties.

Republicans appear to be doing a better job of contacting independents. In the poll, 45 percent of those independents who said they had been contacted said they were urged to vote for Republicans, while 17 percent said they were urged to vote for Democrats. The rest said they were contacted by both sides.

The Post-ABC News poll findings are based on telephone interviews with 1,200 adults conducted Thursday through Sunday. The margin of sampling error is plus or minus three percentage points.

In Southwest, A Shifting Away From Party Ties (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

SHOW LOW, Ariz. — Political parties are like cowboy boots in many parts of the West. If one pair doesn't fit, you try on another.

Hal F. Butler is old enough to remember when the boots here in Navajo County were overwhelmingly filled by Republicans, and then, beginning in the late 1940's, how the county turned Democratic. Mr. Butler became a Democrat in the 1950's at the urging of his mother, a staunch Republican who said the Democratic Party was the party of the future for an ambitious young man.

Now Mr. Butler, who is 81 with half a century of elected and appointed office behind him, including a stint as Show Low's mayor, sees an emerging third wave: the age of the independents is here, he said, and his own family is shifting along with it.

"The independent vote is swinging everything," he said. "They're going to be the powerhouse."

Nowhere has the shift been more pronounced in recent years than in the Southwest, where Republicans have enjoyed an overwhelming advantage since the days of Barry Goldwater. Here in Arizona, people who reject the old major party labels are by far the fastest-growing category of voter, with the number of independents doubling over the last 10 years, to more than one in four.

Numbers like that are the stuff that ulcers are made of for party regulars and election prognosticators, who are trying to figure out where the new independents are coming from politically or geographically and where they might hang their hats on Election Day. No one is fully confident. Anxiety is high.

"Arizona has always had an independent streak, but these new voters are of all stripes," said Garrick Taylor, a spokesman for the Arizona Republican Party. "They're going to be a wild card."

But if the trend toward independent voters continues — and there is no sign of faltering — experts say it will lead to more competitive races not only on local and statewide levels but also in the presidential election.

As the Nov. 7 elections approach, the whole idea of party is in flux in many parts of the nation as candidates and voters reassess the connotations — in baggage or benefit — of party association. Some office seekers are omitting their party label on their lawn signs, and some dwell at length on the stump on how much they disagree with their own parties on issues like the environment or stem cell research— all to look more unaffiliated in order to lure the independent vote.

Closer elections and more balanced war chests, meanwhile, in races across the nation are elevating the role of independents regardless of their numbers — and changing as well the strategies of how to reach them, even as they turn their noses up at what the two-party system has become.

"The first message they're sending to us in the political world, and to general public, is 'Don't assume anything,' " said Michael J. Frias, director of campaigns for the Arizona Democratic Party.

Who the independents are is probably the first assumption to discard, politicians and researchers say. Polls by Arizona State University, for example, suggest that younger voters who no longer see the relevance of party membership are one of the largest engines of the growth.

But here in Arizona's First Congressional District, the growing number of independents — about 23 percent — is compounded by a surge in newcomers, especially from California and the Midwest.

A spokesman for Representative Rick Renzi, a two-term Republican, said many of the new independents were libertarians who rejected party just as they rejected intrusion by government. A spokesman for Ellen Simon, Mr. Renzi's Democrat challenger, said that the independents could not be pigeonholed and that the only reasonable campaign tactic was to talk to them — and talk and talk.

"With the independent voters, you have to talk to them more often, with more frequency and be as specific as possible," said Brandon Hall, the campaign manager for Ms. Simon.

In other races around the country, courting independent voters has coincided with a feeling that party affiliation of any kind this year could be toxic. In New Hampshire, where independent and third-party voters account for more than 40 percent of the electorate, Representative Charlie Bass, a Republican, has run television advertisements proclaiming how different he is from his party.

In Colorado's closely fought Seventh Congressional District outside Denver, lawn signs for the candidates — Ed Perlmutter, a Democrat, and Rick O'Donnell, a Republican — mostly carry no party identification. About one in three voters in Colorado are independents — in the Seventh it is even higher, 37 percent.

Some election experts are skeptical about voter statistics and say party registration as counted by most states is a poor measure of the electorate. Massachusetts, for example, has rules that encourage strategic registration, since independents can vote in any party's primary. Most national surveys have shown little change in the numbers of self-described independents since the late 1970's, but the polls tend to ask about ideological preference rather than actual party registration.

But here in the Southwest, the shift away from major party affiliation has been pronounced. Of the seven states with the fastest-growing proportion of independent or third-party voters from 2000 to 2004, four are clustered in the Southwest — Arizona, California, Nevada, and New Mexico, according to Election Data Services, a nonpartisan consulting company that tracks election information. New Hampshire had the second-fastest growth after Arizona, followed by Florida and Maryland.

And the changes in voter registration have coincided, at least in the West, with a decidedly positive turn for local Democratic candidates in states where Republicans had been dominant, either by history or in number. Four states in the eight-state Rocky Mountain region — Arizona, Montana, New Mexico and Wyoming — now have Democratic governors, up from zero in 2000. And in Colorado, Bill Ritter, a Democrat, has led Representative Bob Beauprez, a Republican, in most polls going into next month's election for governor.

Arizona had the fastest growth in the nation in no-party and third-party registration from 2000 to 2004 among the 25 states that count party numbers, up to 25.5 percent in just four years from 14.7 percent of the electorate, according to Election Data Services. Nationally, the ranks of the independent rose by 21 percent in that period among the 25 party-counting states, compared with a 7.4 percent increase for Democrats and 5.5 percent for Republicans.

Meanwhile, Republicans of Western libertarian bent have chafed as their party has held ever more tightly to the morals-based agenda of its Christian evangelical wing, said Ryan Sager, author of the recently published book "The Elephant in the Room," which chronicles the libertarian-evangelical tension.

California, with Democrats dominant but independents rising in number, also has a moderate Republican governor in Sacramento, which suggests that perhaps nonparty voters are not tilting Democratic at all, that the only certainty is that they have rejected the old labels.

"The Western image of the small-government, leave-me-alone conservative no longer fits into the modern Republican Party," Mr. Sager said in an interview. "And the Democratic Party is not as scary as it used to be."

Experts like Mr. Sager say that places like Navajo County, about three hours northeast of Phoenix, are a natural breeding ground for antiparty sentiment because party labels have always been a bit artificial, reflecting local culture more than ideology, and are therefore easier to shake off. Between the 2000 election and last month, the number of independents here rose from about 15 percent of the electorate to 22 percent heading into the November elections, according to Arizona secretary of state's office. Shifts like that are getting politicians' attention all around the country.

"Politics has become a winner-take-all game played at the expense of ordinary citizens," said Ben Westlund, a state senator from Oregon who resigned from the Republican Party this year to run for governor as an independent. But Mr. Westlund withdrew from the race in August because he said he did not want to be a spoiler candidate who would skew the election.

The deepened sense of polarization in American politics is also making the independent voters' journey harder. As recently as the 1970's, for example, many voters told pollsters that they would vote across party lines for a presidential candidate they liked. They have become much less likely to think outside the box in the years since, said Robert Y. Shapiro, a professor of political science at Columbia University.

Here in Show Low, which was named for a turn of the cards in an 1800's property dispute between two ranchers — low card takes all — hardened partisan orthodoxy is exactly the problem. "Both parties are out for themselves," said Greg Butler, Hal Butler's son, who grew up a Democrat but changed to independent in 2004 and said he was supporting candidates in both parties this year. "I think you've got a right to do what you want and a right not to be labeled — I like that," said Mr. Butler, 56.

His son, Dusty Butler, 26, skipped the Democratic phase entirely and went right to independent when he registered for the first time. He plans to vote mostly for Republicans next month, he said.

"I asked Dad a lot of questions, and it made sense to me," he said.

Some Navajo County residents say that because lots of Democrats have voted for Republicans over the years, and vice versa, the divisions between the parties are not as pronounced here, which makes it easier to abandon the idea of a party at all.

Other people say the major parties have simply made people angry.

Hal Butler said that some of environmental protection rules under the Clinton administration, including restrictions on mining, ranching and forestry — the big three traditional industries here in Navajo County — were not popular, to say the least. But Mr. Butler said the Republicans had made no friends by promising to reverse the Clinton rules and mostly failing to follow through.

Mr. Butler said he had kept his Democratic Party membership, for now, in support of his son Gary H. Butler, a Democrat who has been the elected Navajo County sheriff for the last 18 years. When Gary Butler retires in two years, Hal Butler said, that obligation will end and he will quit the Democratic Party and turn independent.

Gary Butler, 60, said he, too, planned to resign his party membership upon retirement, though he was not sure where he would go.

"Right now, both parties are way too far apart and nobody is looking out for the good of the people," he said.

Rising Radical Center (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

HANCOCK, Mich. -- President Bush's six-year effort to create an enduring Republican majority based on a right-leaning coalition is on the verge of collapse. The way he tried to create it could have the unintended consequence of opening the way for an alternative majority.

This incipient Democratic alliance, while tilting slightly leftward, would plant its foundations firmly in the middle of the road, because its success depends on overwhelming support from moderate voters. That's why a Democratic victory in November -- defined as taking one or both houses of Congress -- would have effects far beyond a single election year.

The Democrats' dependence on moderate voters and moderate candidates belies Republican claims that a Democratic victory would bring radically liberal politics to Washington. In fact, the first imperative of Democratic congressional leaders, if their party is successful, will be finding policies, ideas and rhetoric to allow the party's progressives and moderates to get along and govern effectively together.

The strategy pursued by Bush and Karl Rove has frightened most of the political center into the arms of Democrats. Bush and Rove sought victory by building large turnouts among conservatives and cajoling just enough moderates the Republicans' way. But this approach created what may prove to be a fatal political disconnect: Adventurous policies designed to create enthusiasm on the right turned off a large number of less ideological voters.

The Democrats' lead in the polls can be thus explained by two factors: the energy of a passionate phalanx of voters desperate to use this election to rebuke Bush, and the disenchantment of moderates fed up with the failures of Bush's governing style and ideology, notably in Iraq.

A survey this month for National Public Radio in the 48 most-contested House districts makes clear that anti-Bush energy is this election's driving force. While only 22 percent of those surveyed by Public Opinion Strategies and Greenberg Quinlan Rosner strongly approved of Bush's performance in office, 44 percent strongly disapproved. This points to a huge enthusiasm deficit for the Republicans.

But the survey also showed that the Democrats' 51 to 40 percent lead in these competitive districts came not just from liberals but also from self-described moderates, who favored the Democrats by 59 percent to 34 percent. There are twice as many moderates as liberals in these key districts, so moderates are the linchpin of Democratic chances.

If a Democratic majority depends on moderate voters, it also depends on the victory of moderate candidates. In five of the seven races likely to decide control of the Senate, Democrats have nominated candidates who simply cannot be seen as conventional liberals.

That is certainly true of Harold Ford Jr. in Tennessee, Jon Tester in Montana, James Webb in Virginia and Claire McCaskill in Missouri. In Pennsylvania, Democrat Robert Casey is moderate or even moderately conservative on many social issues. In House races in more conservative states, Democrats have gone out of their way to find middle-of-the-road candidates.

But Democratic moderation this year carries a sharp edge of economic populism, and a consensus is already developing around health care, energy and corporate accountability. In one his advertisements, Montana's Tester marries fiscal conservatism with an anti-corporate appeal by promising to "stand up to oil company giveaways, no-bid contracts to Halliburton and billions in pork, including bridges to nowhere, all saddling our kids with more and more debt."

One of the Democrats' more conservative House challengers, Heath Shuler in North Carolina, declares that "it's not right when big insurance companies write health care laws and millions can't afford to see a doctor." In Michigan's 8th Congressional District, challenger Jim Marcinkowski's attacks on incumbent Republican Mike Rogers's ties to the energy and health care industries are a key part of his campaign. And Democrats of all stripes have become increasingly pointed in criticizing the president's Iraq policies.

There has long been talk about the rise of a "radical center," made up of voters essentially moderate in their philosophical leanings but radical in their disaffection with the status quo. This looks to be the year of the radical center. If it is, the Democrats will win. And if they win, their task will be to meet the aspirations of a diverse group of dissatisfied and disappointed Americans. Not an easy chore, but one that certainly beats being in the opposition.

With Two Weeks Left, Republicans Should Quit Playing Defense (RC)

By David Winston

In the fall of 1982, I was a young opposition researcher at the National Republican Congressional Committee. All that summer, the political environment had become increasingly difficult for Republicans.

Our election strategy had been based on then-President Ronald Reagan's economic plan to turn around the disastrous economy he inherited from former President Jimmy Carter's failed administration. When Reagan took office, interest rates were in double digits with home mortgage rates as high as 15 percent. Americans had been forced to sit in long lines at the gas pumps, only to pay exorbitant prices. Our hostages had been returned, but our national prestige had been badly damaged by Carter's weakness.

The national party's message that year was simply "stay the course" — stick with Reagan's economic policies, we asserted, and America will be strong once again. Unfortunately, party leaders misjudged voter attitudes and patience.

Despite the fact that Reagan's new supply-side economic plan had been in effect less than a year, people wanted to see still more aggressive action, not hear "stay the course." When unemployment hit 10 percent one month before the elections, it became clear that Reagan's policies would not work in time. Still, the party clung to its message, which simply flew in the face of reality. Our faith in the Reagan economic program wasn't misplaced, just mistimed.

Eventually, his policies did restore the country's economy, but not soon enough, as Republicans in the House lost 26 seats that fall. It wasn't long before the joke around town became "stay the curse." Developing election themes can be tricky. External events don't always cooperate. In 1982, it was unemployment. This year, it's the Iraq War and an unhappy electorate, which seems convinced, despite overwhelming evidence to the contrary, that the country's economy is on the wrong track.

Much like 1982, an impatient public doesn't want to hear "stay the course." They want a more activist approach focused on solving what they see as the country's problems, as well as their own. With two weeks left before the elections, Republicans ought to take the advice of former Rep. J.C. Watts (Okla.), who used to advise the Republican Conference to "stay on offense." "Stay the course" is defensive, and Republicans need to break out of their self-imposed box — and do it quickly.

Fortunately, the campaign seems to have reached a pivot point. If nothing new emerges concerning the former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) scandal, the side that defines the focus of political discourse in the last 14 days will go into Election Day with an advantage.

Republicans still have two great strengths — the economy and national security — if they are willing to follow Watts' advice and take their record on offense.

The stock market has hit new highs, which means people are likely to feel better about their retirement and college funds. Unemployment has dipped to a low 4.6 percent, which means people are working.

The Bush economic policies have created more than 6 million new jobs over the past four years, and we're beginning to see wages rise, with an increase of 4 percent over the past 12 months. Homeownership also is at record highs, and gas prices have fallen dramatically.

Thanks to a historic rebound in federal revenues, the deficit has been cut almost in half while state budgets are back in the black, as their revenues continue to grow at a fast pace. Today, Republicans can legitimately argue that a balanced budget is only three to four years away.

That's not a record that reflects stagnant policies or neglect, as Democrats charge. Republicans should take credit for a strong, steady economy that is at least as good, if not better, than the Clinton economic bubble of the late 1990s.

They also should claim credit for keeping America safe for the past five years. The bottom line is this country hasn't been attacked since Sept. 11, 2001. That fact was brought home once again when the U.S. and British governments foiled the London terror plot in September, thanks in part to the president's aggressive intelligence operations.

In September, the Republican Congress passed new port-security legislation to beef up inspections of incoming ships to America's ports. It passed a border-security bill to authorize new tools, including a fence, to stem the tide of illegal immigration and to make our borders more secure and the country safer. And over Democratic objections, Republicans in Congress took action to ensure that we can effectively interrogate terrorists who would do us great harm.

Republicans have a solid record proving they are working to solve many of the nation's most difficult problems with little or no help from Democrats. They need to jettison "stay the course" now, forcefully take their record to the voters, and make Democrats do more than carp and criticize.

Voters will see that Democrats have no real solutions other than to offer themselves up as an alternative to President Bush, an alternative devoid of real ideas. They have no serious plan for Iraq. Their economic program boils down to Rep. Charlie Rangel (D-N.Y.), the likely chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in a Democrat-controlled House, putting us on notice that there isn't a single Bush tax cut "that merits renewal." Voters need to understand that if Democrats take control of Congress, they might as well mark 2010 on their calendars for tax increases, if not sooner.

But voters don't understand. They hear "stay the course," and they instinctively reject what sounds to them like a strategy of the status quo. More to the point, it doesn't accurately represent the president's Iraq or domestic policies. While the goal remains the same, a democratic and free Iraq, strategy and tactics have changed over time to respond to the enemy and, as evidenced this past weekend, will continue to change.

Tax cuts, national security measures, a comprehensive energy plan, a Medicare prescription drug program, class-action litigation reform — these hardly are the hallmarks of a status quo domestic agenda either.

Republicans are not the party of "stay the course" and never have been. It's time they stop acting like it.

Minority Church Leaders Backing Away From GOP (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0085530

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, October 24, 2006

— A major effort to draw Latinos and blacks into the Republican Party, a central element of the GOP plan to build a long-lasting majority, is in danger of collapse amid anger over the immigration debate and claims that Republican leaders have not delivered on promises to direct more money to church-based social services.

President Bush, strategist Karl Rove and other top Republicans have wooed Latino and black leaders, many of them evangelical clergy who lead large congregations, in hopes of peeling away the traditional Democratic base. But now some of the leaders who helped drive Bush to victory in 2004 are revisiting their loyalty to the Republican Party and, in some cases, abandoning it. "There is a fissure, and I doubt it will be closed in this election," said the Rev. Luis Cortes Jr., a Republican who founded the annual National Hispanic Prayer Breakfast that has featured Bush every year since 2002. His Philadelphia-based Esperanza USA boasts a national affiliate network of more than 10,000 churches.

The Latino backlash has grown so intense that one prominent, typically pro-Republican organization, the Latino Coalition, has endorsed Democrats in competitive races this year in Tennessee, Nebraska and New Jersey. The coalition is chaired by Hector Barreto, the former administrator of the Small Business Administration under Bush; its president is a former strategist for the Republican National Committee.

The disaffection comes as Republicans face a challenge in building enthusiasm for the upcoming election among white evangelicals and other conservatives, who have been the core of the GOP's political base.

Taken together, the unhappiness among these groups could threaten GOP hopes of minimizing losses in the Nov. 7 congressional election and may undercut the party's goal of keeping the presidency in 2008. The Latino Coalition, for example, has endorsed the presumed Democratic presidential front-runner, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), in her reelection bid this year.

Complaints among black pastors who had been courted by the White House — while less pronounced than those of Latino leaders — have been fueled by a tell-all book by former White House aide David Kuo. The new book says that Bush, referring to pastors from one major African American denomination, once griped: "Money. All these guys care about is money. They want money."

A White House spokeswoman said Friday that nobody there recalled hearing such a comment from the president.

The Rev. Eugene Rivers, a Boston Pentecostal minister and one of about two dozen black clergy invited to a series of White House meetings with Bush, said Friday that black leaders had been wooed with assurances that their social service groups would receive money from the president's faith-based initiative. But, Rivers said, the bulk of the money had gone to white organizations, leaving black churches on the sidelines.

Rivers plans to send a letter early this week to the White House demanding to know how much social services money has been directed to black churches under the faith-based initiative, and requesting a "new conversation" with Bush.

"There's a growing frustration and anger in the black religious community nationally as the Kuo book makes the rounds," Rivers said. "Meetings at the White House show you the door, but they don't necessarily open the door."

Bush won an estimated 44% of the Latino vote in 2004. While polling numbers vary, many analysts said that represented about a 9-percentage-point improvement from 2000, suggesting that Latinos might become a substantial pillar upholding a durable Republican majority.

But in recent months, Democratic activists who marveled at Bush's success in courting Latino voters watched with amazement as Republicans pushed into law a 700-mile fence along the Mexican border and tried to make it a felony to migrate illegally or to help undocumented immigrants. The latter provision did not become law, but it especially angered some church leaders, who said it would have criminalized their religious duty to help the least privileged in society.

Despite Bush's lobbying for an immigrant guest-worker program, favored by many Latinos, conservative lawmakers in the House refused to bend, forcing Bush to endorse the fence legislation and dimming his popularity among Latinos.

A survey released this month by the Latino Coalition found Latino registered voters supporting Democrats over Republicans 56% to 19% in congressional elections. "If Republicans nationally get 25% of the Hispanic vote, it would be a miracle," said Robert de Posada, the coalition president.

That disaffection is felt among some of the Latino clergy who were courted by the White House.

The Rev. Danny de Leon of Templo Calvario in Santa Ana, considered the biggest Latino bilingual church in the U.S., said he was so frustrated with his party's response to immigration that he was likely to stay home next month rather than vote for Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger — and that he might also sit out the 2008 election.

"A lot of people are saying, 'Forget being a Republican. I want to go to the Democratic Party,' " said De Leon. "It's a shame that one issue has divided many of us that have been in the Republican Party for a long time and has brought us to ask the question: Do I or do I not want to belong to this party?"

Pastor Luciano Padilla Jr. of the Bay Ridge Christian Center in Brooklyn said he had backed Republicans because of their views on such issues as gay marriage and abortion. But in the midst of the immigration debate, he said, "We will have to look at where we put our allegiance in the future."

Cortes, of Esperanza USA, says he continues to respect Bush but now has doubts about the GOP. "That group in the Republican Party said, 'We want your parents, your grandparents, we want anyone here without documentation, regardless of why — we want them out,' " he said. "If voting is about personal interest, how are Hispanics to vote? They will vote against those guys."

The White House now faces a symbolic choice on the border-fence legislation: Does Bush rally the GOP base with a large, pre-election signing ceremony, or does he reject such fanfare in hopes of avoiding long-term damage among Latinos?

Republican officials said their internal polls showed the party winning about 32% of the Latino voting bloc this year — similar to the 2002 results that helped the GOP gain seats in Congress.

They said the party would continue its aggressive outreach, focusing on issues such as home ownership, jobs and family values.

"We cannot maintain majority status in America without a growing share of the Latino vote," said Adrian Gray, director of strategy at the Republican National Committee. He said that "when 44% of Latinos supported President Bush in that last election, it opens the door for many of them to vote Republican in the future."

Causing new wrinkles in the White House relationship with evangelicals is the Kuo book, "Tempting Faith: An Inside Story of Political Seduction," in which he describes top White House aides embracing religious conservatives in public while calling them "nuts" behind their backs.

One leading black evangelical who has been an occasional White House guest, Bishop Harry Jackson Jr. of the Hope Christian Church in Maryland, wrote of a similar incident this month.

Jackson railed against senior administration officials who, he said, had insulted clergy at a meeting this year by dismissing their contribution to Bush's reelection in 2004. He also complained about "the GOP's failure" to react speedily to the House page scandal involving Mark Foley, the Republican congressman from Florida who resigned recently.

Jackson still supports some Republicans, including Michael Steele, an African American candidate for Senate in Maryland. But in an essay on the website townhall.com, Jackson offered a caution for the party: "Evangelicals must ask themselves if we can work in harmony with a group that takes us for granted and compromises on major moral principles."

Poll Watchers Split On Hispanic Turnout (WT)

By Keyonna Summers

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

Hispanic rights activists and immigration-policy researchers disagree on how many Hispanics will turn out to vote on Nov. 7.

Advocates say Hispanics are encouraged by rallies last spring and motivated by local government efforts to limit day-laborer practices and housing of illegal aliens. Researchers argue that the rallies had little effect.

Wilma Linares, of the immigrant advocacy group CASA of Maryland, said local politicians have ignored immigrants' concerns about affordable housing, health care, education and immigration reform, and that Hispanics will respond on Election Day.

"We want our politicians to understand that ... we have 90,000 Latinos who are capable of voting in Maryland alone and we are going to do everything we can for them to get out and vote for those candidates who are really looking to improve their response to the issues that we're interested in," Miss Linares said last week at "Your Vote Is Your Voice," a nonpartisan campaign to rally immigrant and black voters.

Researchers say many Hispanics are here illegally and represent the ethnic group with the fewest registered voters. They noted that demonstrations fizzled when legislation to grant illegals a path to citizenship stalled in Congress.

"There's no doubt that the series of events around the national mobilization ... will help serve as a stimulus for Hispanic turnout," said Adam J. Segal, director of the Hispanic Voter Project at Johns Hopkins University.

"But months later we have a situation where the only legislation that's come out of Congress has been a modestly funded and incomplete federal border security program and fence and no real resolution on the status of undocumented workers," Mr. Segal said.

So, "I think there's a real question whether [the Hispanic turnout will] be anywhere near where a lot of community activists had predicted at the time."

More than 17 million Hispanics in the U.S. are eligible to vote, a 7 percent increase from 2004, the Pew Hispanic Center reported. More than 95,000 Hispanics are eligible to vote in Maryland and more than 140,600 are eligible in Virginia.

"What they're really showing is that the number of naturalized immigrants has increased nationally," said Jack Martin, a special projects director for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, a District-based think tank that favors curbs on illegal border crossings.

"What it doesn't show is that there is likely to be any increase in voter participation."

Immigration advocates point to hot-button issues such as driver's licensing, day-laborer centers and local enforcement of federal immigration laws as reasons for Hispanics to go to the polls.

Pew figures show that Hispanic voter turnout increased from 5.5 percent of votes cast in 2000 to 6 percent in 2004.

"We've had a tremendous amount of frustration with the political clog-up on the issues and we expect a lot of voter anger in November," said Kim Propeack, a spokeswoman for CASA of Maryland.

CASA officials said they registered nearly 600 voters during the summer and that citizenship course enrollment has quadrupled.

CASA volunteers plan to knock on at least 100 doors by Election Day and help Executive Director Gustavo Torres make calls to residences. The group is asking people who use its legal, financial, language and employment services to bring at least five friends or relatives to the polls in an effort to increase participation by 30,000 voters.

The Prince George's County chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the D.C.-based African Resource Center and labor unions will join the initiative.

Mr. Segal said that may not be enough to tip the outcome of local elections.

"The most significant challenge is that a large number of Hispanic voters in Maryland are not registered or are not citizens," he said. "And while CASA has a tremendous amount of clout, the question is -- because of who they represent -- how much electoral strength can they garner?"

Control Of The U.S. Senate Down To The Wire In Two Pivatol Races (MINNST)

By Steven Thomma

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Republican Senate candidates have fought back to regain an edge in two key races, pivotal battlegrounds that could determine which party controls the Senate, according to a series of new McClatchy-MSNBC polls and a companion Virginia Poll.

Republicans hold narrow leads in Tennessee and Virginia, two states where the party hopes to build a Southern bulwark against a Democratic tide that's threatening their Senate seats elsewhere in the country.

The new polls show Democrats leading in two states they must hold -- New Jersey and Washington -- as well as in five states now held by Republicans: Missouri, Montana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island.

Yet even if Democrats take all seven of those battleground states, they still need to win either Tennessee or Virginia to take control of the Senate. Democrats must gain six seats overall to take a majority. "Control of the Senate is going to come down to Tennessee and Virginia," said Brad Coker, the pollster for Mason-Dixon Polling & Research Inc., who conducted the surveys for McClatchy-MSNBC in eight states.

Coker noted that Tennessee and Virginia are culturally conservative states in which Republicans have won Senate campaigns for more than a decade. Also, the Republican candidates in each state appeared to find their footing in recent weeks.

In Virginia, Republican Sen. George Allen stopped losing ground after he was accused of racial insensitivity and went on the attack against his Democratic opponent, James Webb, in part charging that Webb was insensitive to women in the military.

In Tennessee, Republican candidate Bob Corker fired his top campaign staff and went on the attack against his Democratic rival, Rep. Harold Ford.

While many analysts and insiders of both major parties expect the Republicans to lose control of the House of Representatives, the Senate is viewed as a closer contest. Control of either house of Congress is crucial to passing legislation, while the Senate has sole power to confirm appointments to the federal judiciary, including the Supreme Court.

The polls revealed a shifting landscape in recent weeks, with Democrats leading in several states but Republicans not only clawing back in Tennessee and Virginia but also narrowing the gap in Montana. Democrat Jon Tester led incumbent Republican Sen. Conrad Burns by 46 percent to 43 percent. Three weeks ago, Tester led 47-40 percent.

Of the nine key battleground states, Republicans are ahead in two and within the polls' 4 percentage-point margin of error in three more.

Iraq remains the dominant issue in all but one battleground state, despite intense news coverage of the House page scandal, North Korea's nuclear test and record highs in the stock market. That hurts Republicans because those voting on Iraq break for Democrats by margins of 2 to 1 or more.

Terrorism --usually a Republican strength -- has receded as an issue, with the 9/11 anniversary now a memory. Even Republican efforts to rekindle fear of terrorism might not help in most of these Senate campaigns:

• Voters who say they are worried about a terrorist attack on the United States gave the Republican Senate candidate an edge in Montana and Tennessee.

• They favored the Democrat in Pennsylvania and Rhode Island.

• They split almost evenly between the Democrat and Republican in Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio and Washington state.

The polls partly affirmed decisions by Republican leaders to build a Southern wall to protect their Senate majority, steering campaign cash into Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia while pulling it out of states such as Montana, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

The McClatchy-MSNBC Poll is a snapshot of voter opinion at the time it was conducted. It is not a prediction of how people will vote. The poll of 625 likely voters in each state was conducted by telephone Oct. 17-21. Those interviewed were randomly selected by telephone numbers from a cross-section of telephone exchanges. That means anyone in the state with a land-phone line had the same odds of being called as anyone else. Cell phone numbers are not in the exchanges.

The margin of error was plus or minus 4 percentage points. That means that 95 percent of the time, the correct numbers could be up to 4 percentage points above the poll's percentage point findings or up to 4 percentage points below them.

The Mason-Dixon Virginia Poll was conducted for several major state newspapers and made available to McClatchy Newspapers. For the complete results of the latest McClatchy/MSNBC poll, go to www.mcclatchydc.com.

The Money Starts Talking (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

After weeks of Republican and Democratic boasting (and feinting) about what states and districts are in play, the time for bluffing is just about past.

A look at where the Republicans are spending their money makes it increasingly evident that they are choosing to focus on defending a relative handful of Senate and House seats. Democrats are trying to expand the battlefield to races that were not considered competitive even a few weeks ago.

Republicans have all but given up on Senate races in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Montana and Rhode Island. They are pinning their hopes of keeping control on Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia, and are debating whether to try to put Democrats on the defensive in New Jersey. Republicans said they would decide in the next few days whether to make a high-risk, all-out assault there on Senator Robert Menendez, to follow up on some relatively small spending done to test the waters.

In the House, Democrats have steadily increased the number of races where they are competing. By Sunday it was 40, including Republican-held seats in California, Minnesota, Nevada and New York. The Republicans have apparently pulled out of two Ohio districts, as well as once-competitive districts in Indiana, West Virginia and South Carolina. ADAM NAGOURNEY

Some Republicans Aren't Sharing The Wealth (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

Senate Republicans with enormous campaign war chests are refusing to transfer significant amounts of money to help fellow Republicans who are cash-strapped and face defeat in the final weeks of the campaign.

The stinginess alarms some of the Republican Party's top campaign strategists, especially because it is in such stark contrast to the millions of dollars that Democrats have transferred to their candidates in need.

Control of the Senate will come down to a half-dozen close races next month, and both sides agree that money will likely determine the outcome of each. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) has nearly twice as much money on hand as the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) for that final sprint to Election Day.

According to the latest figures available, the DSCC has $23 million and the NRSC has $12 million. Much of that difference stems from the disparity in late giving from sitting senators.

"Time is running out," one senior Republican aide said. "People will not want to look back and wonder what more could have been done. That would be a real shame."

The ire of some Republicans in Washington and on the campaign trail has been directed at some of the most senior Republican senators who are harboring millions in campaign cash.

For example, Republican Sens. Richard C. Shelby of Alabama and Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas both have more than $9 million in their campaign accounts, and there is no limit to how much they can legally transfer to the NRSC.

Mr. Shelby isn't up for re-election until 2010 and won his last election with 68 percent of the vote. His campaign account contains $11.6 million, but he has given $15,000 to the NRSC. If Democrats take over the Senate, Mr. Shelby will have to surrender his chairmanship of the banking committee.

"Senator Shelby is committed to expanding the Republican majority and assisting those who share his conservative philosophy," said spokeswoman Katie Boyd. "Senator Shelby's PAC, Defend America, has contributed heavily to Republican candidates throughout the country."

Mrs. Hutchison, one of the top Republican leaders in the Senate, has $9.5 million on hand, and polls in Texas show her trouncing her opponent by 20 points or more. She has given $115,000 to the NRSC, a little more than 1 percent of her campaign holdings.

Spokesman Marc Short dismissed any criticism and said she's given more than $1.5 million directly to candidates through her political action committee (PAC).

"You would be hard-pressed to find a candidate who is up for election this cycle who has given more than Senator Hutchison," he said.

But given the stakes, Republicans say it's hard not to make comparisons to Democrats who have given far more generously from their campaign accounts.

In all, five Democrats have transferred $1 million or more from their campaign accounts to the DSCC during the current two-year cycle, compared with only one Republican -- Majority Whip Mitch McConnell of Kentucky.

Far and away, the most generous Democrat is Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, who has transferred more than $2 million from her campaign account to the DSCC. Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts, Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Dianne Feinstein of California also have given $1 million or more from their campaign accounts.

"We wouldn't be in the good position we are in heading into November if we didn't have deep support from the entire Democratic caucus," Phil Singer, spokesman for the DSCC, said yesterday.

For the NRSC, spokesman Brian Nick said: "We're very pleased with the generous support we have received from our incumbents, which is essential to protecting the majority."

That money is so crucial, campaign strategists say, because it allows the party to dump huge amounts of advertising money quickly into a state that suddenly becomes winnable or suddenly becomes vulnerable.

Many point to Michigan's Senate race in which Republicans say challenger Michael Bouchard is gaining momentum against incumbent Debbie Stabenow. If Republicans had more money, they say, the state would be ripe for picking.

"That's where it hurts," said Jennifer Duffy of the Cook Political Report.

Michigan would be "a reach, but you could make it a race if you had the money to go there."

Other Republicans who have cash on hand but aren't up for re-election or face only minor opposition this cycle are Craig Thomas of Wyoming, Sam Brownback of Kansas, and Norm Coleman of Minnesota.

Mr. Thomas has $1.1 million on hand and is expected to win easily, and Mr. Brownback has $600,000 but doesn't face re-election. Neither has transferred any funds to the NRSC. A spokesman for Mr. Brownback said he's given heavily to candidates this cycle from his PAC.

Of his $1.8 million campaign account, Mr. Coleman has transferred $15,000 to the NRSC. A spokesman said Mr. Coleman just transferred an additional $100,000 to the state party to help Republicans capture the open Senate seat there.

Allen Slightly Ahead In Va. Senate Poll (CCT)

By Bob Lewis

The Contra Costa Times, October 24, 2006

RICHMOND, Va. - Republican Sen. George Allen is slightly ahead of Democratic challenger Jim Webb in a closely watched race that could determine whether the GOP retains control of the Senate, according to a poll published Monday.

A statewide survey by Mason-Dixon Polling & Research Inc. showed that 47 percent supported Allen while 43 percent favored Webb, a former Republican and first-time candidate. Two percent supported independent Gail Parker, and 8 percent were undecided.

The results, published on the Web sites of several Virginia newspapers, are based on telephone interviews conducted Oct. 17-19 with 625 registered voters statewide.

Allen's tenuous advantage is equal to the poll's margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points. His campaign was optimistic.

"We know what we have to do and we know how to get there, and when people vote issues and issue differences, they're going to vote for George Allen," said Christopher J. LaCivita, a longtime Allen adviser.

Allen held a 16-point lead over Webb in July but saw it vanish after weeks of damaging developments beginning Aug. 11, when he called a young man of Indian descent "macaca," an obscure racial slur.

Webb's chief strategist, Steve Jarding, said he is confident the Democrat remains on track.

"We feel very good about these numbers and the numbers in other recent polls, including our own, that show Jim moving up while Allen is moving down," Jarding said. "These numbers show Allen has hit his ceiling."

GOP Attack Ad Draws Heat For Racial Overtones (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

WASHINGTON — A new Republican Party television ad featuring a scantily clad white woman winking and inviting a black candidate to "call me" is drawing charges of race-baiting, with critics saying it contradicts a landmark GOP statement last year that the party was wrong in past decades to use racial appeals to win support from white voters.

Critics said the ad, which is funded by the Republican National Committee and has aired since Friday, plays on fears of interracial relationships to scare some white voters in rural Tennessee to oppose Democratic Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. Ford is locked in a tight race, hoping to become the first African American senator since Reconstruction to represent a state in the former Confederacy.

"It is a powerful innuendo that plays to pre-existing prejudices about African American men and white women," said Hilary Shelton, head of the Washington office of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People, the country's oldest civil rights organization.

A former Republican senator, William S. Cohen of Maine, was more blunt. Cohen, who was also Defense secretary under President Clinton, said on CNN that the ad was "a very serious appeal to a racist sentiment."

The 30-second ad features fictional characters satirizing Ford.

A black woman notes that Ford "looks good" and asks, "Isn't that enough?" Others suggest Ford backs privacy for terrorists, accepts money from the pornography industry, wants to raise taxes and backs letting Canada deal with the North Korea nuclear threat.

The character who has raised complaints is a blond woman who speaks in a hushed, suggestive tone and says that she met Ford at "the Playboy party."

At the end of the ad, she reappears and says: "Harold, call me." She winks and holds her hand up as if holding a phone.

Shelton said the ad contradicted the spirit of remarks delivered at last year's NAACP convention by the Republican National Committee chairman, Ken Mehlman, in which he decried those in his party who had tried to "benefit politically from racial polarization." He was referring to the party's so-called Southern strategy of energizing white voters with race-baiting messages about integration and civil rights.

"I am here today as the Republican chairman to tell you we were wrong," Mehlman said in the July 2005 address, in which he also said the party would now use positive messages to draw African Americans to the GOP.

Ford's Republican opponent, former Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker, has asked Tennessee television stations not to run the spot, calling it "over the top." But the ad has continued to run — and on Monday the Republican National Committee was unapologetic.

"I won't even entertain the premise" that the ad is racially offensive, said Danny Diaz, a Republican Party spokesman. He said the allegation was "not fair and not serious and not accurate."

Diaz said the ad was an "independent expenditure" produced by an arm of the Republican National Committee that is legally prohibited from coordinating with Mehlman. Because of this, Diaz said, Mehlman did not see or approve the ad before its release.

Democratic strategist Donna Brazile said Monday that she was shocked by the ad. Brazile, an African American who has forged a friendship with Mehlman and White House strategist Karl Rove, said she intended to call Mehlman to request that the Republican National Committee discontinue the ad.

"With this ad, Mehlman's apology rings hollow," she said, referring to the 2005 speech.

John Geer, a Vanderbilt University political scientist who published a book this year on attack ads, "In Defense of Negativity," said he had watched the anti-Ford spot repeatedly in recent days.

"I just couldn't believe what I was seeing," he said. "I don't see how you can think it's not playing a racial card. It's making references to interracial sex. It's an ad that is in some sense breaking new lows."

For Mehlman, such criticism is unusual. He has won accolades from African American leaders for aggressive outreach efforts, speaking to more than 50 black organizations since becoming chairman in 2005.

His remarks on the Southern strategy were viewed as a milestone in the GOP effort to diversify the party base by attracting blacks with messages of economic empowerment and appeals to faith.

The party is fielding black candidates in three major races this year in Ohio, Pennsylvania and Maryland.

Ford, though, has proved a challenge for the GOP. He has run as a hawkish Democrat, opposed to amnesty for illegal immigrants and a supporter of banning gay marriage. His race with Corker is considered to be neck-and-neck.

A new response ad by Ford that began airing Monday features the candidate, talking to the camera, accusing Corker of unleashing attacks rather than talking issues.

"If I had a dog," Ford says, "he'd probably kick him too."

In Montana Race, A Yen For Change? (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0085537

By Amanda Paulson

The Christian Science Monitor, October 24, 2006

BILLINGS, MONT.

As Jon Tester crisscrosses Montana, he chats with voters about his wheat farm, discusses energy independence and healthcare, and stresses a single point: integrity.

Montana, the Democrat insists, is ready for a change from Sen. Conrad Burns, the Republican who has served the state for 18 years. Beloved for bringing home big federal dollars, Senator Burns was also the recipient of nearly $150,000 in campaign donations from convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff - and Mr. Tester is not about to let Montana voters forget it.

Tester's strategy of making Burns himself the issue seems to be working: Polls now show the farmer/state senator with a slight edge over the incumbent, lifting Democrats' hopes of adding a key seat in their quest to gain control of the US Senate.

In large part, "the election will depend on [Montanans'] evaluation of Senator Burns," says Christopher Muste, an assistant professor of political science at the University of Montana. "Whether, when they go into the voting booth, they're thinking about his problems with the Abramoff scandal and off-the-cuff embarrassing comments he's made, or if they're thinking about the material things he's brought to the state from the federal government."

A former agricultural reporter and livestock enthusiast, Burns has an easy Montana charm. He moves comfortably among his constituents - most of whom call him "Conrad" - and asks distant acquaintances about their parents and children, almost all of whom he seems to remember.

He reminds residents of the $2 billion in federal money he's brought to the state and his coveted seat on the Senate Appropriations Committee. "I've got a little investment here I want to see," he told reporters last week as he toured the new $8 million control tower at the Billings airport.

From the top, Burns admired the view and pointed out where his own house was, on "Alkali Crick." "It's not very big and it ain't very fancy, but it's somewhere to go when it's raining," he said in his drawl. "No matter where you live in Montana, we identify by the crick you live on."

That off-the-cuff style, though, has also gotten Burns into trouble. He called Arabs "ragheads" in a 1999 speech, for instance. His response to a rancher's racist comment about living in the majority-black city of Washington was hardly high-end senatorial: It's "one hell of a challenge," he replied, back in 1994.

Some Montanans shrug off his rough-hewn language with a laugh, noting he's "not a diplomat." But when Burns used crude language to dress down some Virginia firefighters in the Billings airport this summer, many people here were furious. Some admit to being tired of his comments and the Abramoff connections - and of worrying about Montana's public image.

Tester, meanwhile, is capitalizing on his Montana roots. A third-generation wheat farmer with a flat-top haircut and big belly, he hardly fits the image of the Washington senator. But in the Rocky Mountain West, that can be an advantage. "Isn't it time we make the Senate look a little bit more like Montana?" he asks in one commercial.

He's against gun control and gay marriage, and for the death penalty, which are all political requirements in Mountain states. But he's also a populist candidate who speaks eloquently about the need for opportunity and a debt-free future for children, for affordable healthcare and boosts for small businesses and the middle class, and for a plan to withdraw from Iraq.

A former music teacher and custom butcher, Tester recently took five days off from campaigning to harvest crops on his 1,800-acre farm, and has an easy laugh and smile when he meets voters - a staple of campaigning in a state where retail politics is what wins elections. But he gets serious when he starts talking about the values that he says are the background of this election.

"It's all underpinned by honesty and ethics," he says in an interview. "I think people are very concerned by the culture of corruption back in Washington, D.C."

Burns dismisses those charges angrily, telling Tester in a recent heated debate in Billings, Burns's hometown, "Jon, you've dribbled this out for the last 18 months - and there's nothing there."

But some Montanans are listening.

"Conrad Burns has embarrassed Montana long enough," says Valerie McMurtry, a special-ed teacher in Billings, wearing a Jon Tester sticker as she waits in line to see the Billings debate. She used to consider herself an Independent before Burns turned her into a Democrat, she adds. "Time magazine called him the first of the worst." Burns himself has noted his tendency toward flip comments, once joking that he "can self-destruct in one sentence - sometimes in one word."

Burns instead tries to remind constituents of his seniority in the Senate and paints his opponent as a tax-raiser who's far too liberal for Montana, which President Bush won by 20 percentage points in 2004.

"The Senate already has one Ted Kennedy, and if Tester is elected it will have a second," says Jason Klindt, Burns's spokesman. The polls, he says, don't worry him. "Voters will take a look at both candidates and see Conrad Burns is the only one with the seniority, experience, and effectiveness to get things done for Montana."

That's the case with some staunch Burns supporters, many of whom dismiss the Abramoff charges as overblown or simply a reality of politics. "If the money doesn't go to us, it'll go to New York or California," says Bernie Hedrick, a court-services worker. "We've got two very powerful people in [Democratic Senator Max] Baucus and Burns."

Still, while Montana may be "red" in presidential elections, it's demonstrated a willingness to vote for its own Mountain version of Democrats, with a popular Democratic governor and a Democratic legislature. And Tester's home-grown approach seems to be working.

"He's a rancher and hard worker and that's my style," says Jeff, a physical therapist at St. Vincent Healthcare who did not give his last name. He says that after shaking Tester's hand he's decided to vote for him. "Burns is not so much connected to Montana anymore - he's lost where he's come from."

Love Chafee, Hate Bush (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, October 24, 2006

WARWICK, R.I. — If the Rhode Island Senate race were a popularity contest, Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R) would have no trouble winning re-election.

Unfortunately for Chafee, his opponent's message that a vote for Chafee is essentially a vote in favor of President Bush seems to be resonating in the Ocean State.

Chafee successfully has transferred on to himself the voters' affection for his father and predecessor, the late Sen. John Chafee (R), who died in office in 1999.

Rhode Islanders genuinely like the younger Chafee, who previously served as mayor of Warwick, the state's second-largest city, before being appointed to complete his father's Senate term.

Roberta Coughlin of Cranston, who waits tables at the Eddie & Son diner in downtown Providence, says she is not very political. Nonetheless she has served Chafee numerous times, as she did his father when he was alive, and finds him extremely personable.

The 53-year-old Senator brings his family into the diner — a regular stop for local pols and powerbrokers — and just comes across as a regular person, Coughlin said.

"He's very humble," she said.

And that is where the Chafee appeal lies. Even people who say they plan to vote for Sheldon Whitehouse (D), the state's former attorney general who has a slight lead in the polls, say they like Chafee.

"I don't think Lincoln Chafee is a bad guy, but it's been how long since the Democrats have had anything to say" about how the country is run, asked Pete Wilson of Narragansett, who was part of a pro-Whitehouse rally outside Toll Gate High School in Warwick last Thursday night, where the two candidates squared off in their first televised debate.

"He's a straight shooter and he does have the name," Wilson continued. "You have to look at what's best for Rhode Island. If [Chafee] ran as an Independent, I think the race would be much tougher."

As much as Chafee reminds voters that he was the only Senate Republican to oppose giving Bush the authority to invade Iraq and as much as he plays up how he differs with the national GOP, it is his party affiliation that ultimately might end his Senate career.

"I think people like Lincoln Chafee a lot, but there's so much antipathy toward Bush that Chafee has become the proxy target," said Darrell West, the political scientist who runs the Brown University poll.

"If he loses, it has very little do with Lincoln Chafee," West said. "It will be because of Bush."

Chafee seems keenly aware of that fact.

During the debate he told voters that he has "not actually been in sync with the president," and ticked off the number of times he has bucked his party in his almost seven years in the Senate. (Chafee previously has acknowledged that he did not vote for Bush in 2004, instead writing in the name of his father, former President George H.W. Bush.)

Rhode Islanders can look at the statue of the Independent Man that sits atop the statehouse in Providence and think, "that's Lincoln Chafee," he said.

Happy Bucks for a Happy Warrior

During a presentation to the Warwick Rotary Club earlier in the day, Chafee sounded more like a Democrat than a Republican. He talked about protecting the environment and the need for stability in the Middle East.

If he is returned to the Senate, Chafee said he would use his seat on the Environment and Public Works Committee and his chairmanship of the subcommittee on fisheries, wildlife and water to push Congress to force U.S. automakers to build more fuel-efficient cars. He also wants the federal government to regulate the emission of carbon dioxide as a way to rein in global warming.

"Shame on Americans for being such consumers," Chafee, who drives a hybrid electric automobile, told the Rotarians.

Chafee received a warm reception from the group assembled for lunch at the Boys and Girls Clubs in Warwick, which was built thanks to an earmark Chafee won during the appropriations process.

Before Chafee began speaking, a slew of Rotarians stood up and threw "happy bucks" — money members donate to announce good news — into the pot in his honor.

One woman put in $1 to celebrate "happy shoers in the Senate." Chafee once worked as a farrier, someone who shoes horses, in Canada. Another contributed $1 because she "already voted for Linc." That prompted Chafee to spring up and throw his own "happy buck" into the pot.

While Chafee tries to hammer home that he can deliver for Rhode Island because he has been in "the right place at the right time in the right party," Whitehouse's campaign is based almost entirely on trying to hang Chafee's party affiliation around him like an albatross.

"The price of Sen. Chafee bringing home that bacon is so high," Whitehouse said during their extremely cordial, hourlong debate. He reminded the audience that the first vote Chafee takes during each new session of Congress is to make a Republican Senate Majority Leader.

"Once that leadership is in place, the dye is set," Whitehouse said. "I accept [that] Lincoln Chafee prefers a different Republican Party, but reality is ... send someone down to vote them out of power. That is the only way to get the Bush agenda out."

Chafee and Whitehouse differ very little in substance or on the issues. Both are polite, liberal politicians who hail from prominent Rhode Island families.

The Chafees are one of the "Five Families" — the term given to the wealthiest, most influential families in the state's early history — while Whitehouse's father was an ambassador. John Chafee and Whitehouse's father, Charles Whitehouse, even were roommates at Yale, prompting a question from the debate audience about what the candidates' fathers would say about the campaign if they were alive (neither answered very effectively).

Questioning Whitehouse's Independence

The candidates' similarities, combined with Bush's unpopularity, have led Chafee to look for a new way to distinguish himself and to highlight his independence from party orthodoxy — and contrast that with Whitehouse's own relationship with Democratic leaders.

Chafee held a news conference last week calling on Whitehouse to answer questions about a public corruption case that emerged when he was attorney general and that just ended with a former hospital president being sent to jail.

He spent most of the debate trying to put Whitehouse on the defensive about the controversy, suggesting that Whitehouse has blanched when faced with the prospect of challenging state Democratic powerbrokers who served on the hospital's board and worked for the medical center.

"He made a calculated decision not to pursue [the hospital-statehouse case] based on who was involved," Chafee alleged during an interview.

Whitehouse called Chafee's allegations "desperate" and unfounded.

"When you're desperate you revert to desperate measures," Whitehouse said after the debate. "They're bringing it up now because they got nothing else, because they urgently need to distract Rhode Island voters from the consequences of Lincoln Chafee's vote for a Republican Senate."

Whitehouse resisted Chafee's efforts to engage him on the subject during the debate, calculating that there really is no upside in doing so because the issue is too obtuse to penetrate.

He acknowledges there is a risk in his strategy but said the issues and momentum are on his side.

"I'd rather be in the position of talking to voters about issues versus something that happened seven years ago," Whitehouse said. "It's complicated and, frankly, isn't being explained very fairly by them anyway. I'd rather be in the spot where I'm talking to voters about what they care about."

Whitehouse also is enjoying a financial advantage.

Chafee entered the final weeks of the campaign trailing Whitehouse in cash on hand. Whitehouse started October with $1.4 million in the bank, while Chafee had just $583,000.

Since then, Chafee contributed $500,000 from his own deep pockets and triggered the "Millionaires' Amendment," enabling Whitehouse to exceed federal campaign contribution limits.

The national Republican Party spared no expense getting Chafee through his tough primary with Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey and continues to lavish money on the race.

The Republican National Committee's much-ballyhooed 72 Hour Program to get out the vote largely is credited with Chafee's win in the historically low-turnout Republican primary.

'A General Is Different'

Chafee again will need the votes of independents and Democrats if he is to win Nov. 7, but he dismissed the idea that the results on Election Day will again turn on GOTV.

"In the primary, it was the most important — voter identification and GOTV," Chafee said. "A general is different.

"It's a close election, everything is going to count; it's going to be debates, earned media ... paid media; it's the combination," he said.

Whitehouse said he is confident that if the race comes down to a ground game, his team is prepared.

"I'm waiting to see whether this vaunted Republican 72 Hour Program is really all it's cracked up to be," he said.

While the race undoubtedly will take a few more turns before it is over, in many ways the general election dynamics have not changed at all since the race began. It will still come down to whether Rhode Islanders like Chafee so much that they are willing to shed their Democratic preference and overlook the R after his name.

"There's no doubt there's deep affection in Rhode Island for the job that I've done, but they are very, very angry at President Bush," Chafee said. "But I'm dealing with it."

Steele Shrugs Off Foe's Attacks (WT)

By S.a. Miller And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele said yesterday that Democratic attacks on his U.S. Senate candidacy have not hurt him but have sparked interest in his status as a black Republican.

"I hear it from people who come up to me who are angry themselves. They are sick of it. They are tired of it. It's like, 'Why are they coming after you?' " Mr. Steele told editors and reporters at The Washington Times.

"The commercials that they have run have really not resonated the way I think they thought they would. It is not scaring people away from me. In fact, it is actually drawing them to pay closer attention," he said.

Mr. Steele expressed support for full congressional voting rights for the District, discussed how his Catholic faith informs his politics and said he expects to win "20 to 25 percent" of the black vote in next month's election.

He also said that he expects some white voters, including Republicans, will not vote for him because he is black.

"We have factored in in our numbers a percentage drop-off. I'm not silly," Mr. Steele said. "Is it a concern? Sure it is -- like anything.

"Will it be a factor in this race? Absolutely it will. You have to go into this race with your eyes wide open. You can't sit back and pretend that everybody is going to love you and just vote for you because you are a member of their party or you hold their values."

He said that all he can do to counter such attitudes is to "just get in your face."

Mr. Steele's Democratic opponent -- Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin -- has declined an invitation to be interviewed at The Times.

The Cardin campaign has focused on tying Mr. Steele to President Bush as part of a Democratic strategy to dampen the lieutenant governor's appeal among blacks.

Blacks account for about 40 percent of registered Democrats in Maryland, where Democrats outnumber Republicans 2-to-1.

A poll targeted at black voters, which was released yesterday by Ariel & Ethan LLC in the political journal Hotline, showed Mr. Steele with 12 percent of the black vote; 23 percent were undecided.

The poll of 400 black registered voters was conducted from Oct. 11 to 13 and has a margin of error of 4.9 percentage points.

A Baltimore Sun poll showed Mr. Steele with 23 percent of the black vote; Survey USA has shown him gaining as much as 33 percent of the black vote; and an internal Democratic poll in March showed Mr. Steele with 16 percent.

"We don't need polls to tell us that a large majority of African-Americans are frustrated with President Bush and the direction he's taking our nation," Cardin campaign spokesman Oren Shur said. "Michael Steele will support the same failed Bush policies, and everyone knows it."

The internal Democratic poll also identified 44 percent of black voters as undecided, calling the bloc an "emerging black swing vote."

Mr. Steele acknowledged there is still a large segment of black voters who are undecided or conflicted about voting for him because he is a Republican.

"I've just got to keep doing what I'm doing. Whatever I've been doing has gotten me to 46-46 [percent in the polls], so I keep doing that," he said, referring to a recent poll by Survey USA that showed the race to be a dead heat.

Mr. Steele, who was raised in the District and lives in Prince George's County, said he supports D.C. voting rights.

"I think it's very important for the citizens of that community to have full representation. I just do," he said.

Mr. Steele also reiterated that he is a "pro-life Roman Catholic" on abortion, and that although he supports stem-cell research, he does not support such research that destroys human embryos.

However, he said he would not require a "litmus test" of nominees to federal judgeships, saying such tactics do a "disservice" to the nominees and the advise-and-consent process of the U.S. Senate.

"I have no litmus test," he said, "nor should anyone."

In addition, Mr. Steele said he prefers that the states settle the issue of same-sex "marriage," but "should it come to the federal level, then, yes, I would support" a ban on such "marriages."

In 2002, Mr. Steele became the first black to win a statewide election in Maryland, as the running mate of Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., who became the state's first Republican governor in more than 30 years.

Yesterday, Mr. Steele said that he will win his Senate race and that Mr. Ehrlich will win his re-election bid against the Democratic nominee, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley. Mr. Steele said "there is no reason" for Maryland voters to "fire" Mr. Ehrlich.

DOJ_NMG_0085542

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin has firmed his stance against the Iraq war by demanding an immediate troop withdrawal and now faces criticism from his rivals in Maryland's U.S. Senate race for "pandering" to anti-war voters and jeopardizing the war effort.

"Start the process now," Mr. Cardin, a Democrat, said in a campaign speech last week at Towson University. "We don't need a time schedule, but we should start redeploying now so it is a clear signal to the international community [and] a clear signal to the Iraqis that they need to take responsibility for the defense of their own country. We need to do that now."

Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the Republican nominee for senator, called Mr. Cardin's comments "irresponsible."

"It is pandering to a political mind-set that would ... endanger our soldiers for a political price," Mr. Steele said. "I don't think it is worth playing politics here at home to put our troops in harm's way in Iraq."

President Bush has said that he opposes major changes to the Iraq war plan.

Mr. Cardin, a 10-term congressman from Baltimore, has made his vote against the Iraq invasion the cornerstone of his campaign and often cites it as an example of how he "stood up toPresident Bush."

Still, he has moved his anti-war position steadily to the left from early calls for a "new strategy" in Iraq to his recent support of an immediate exit for troops.

"Mr. Cardin needs to decide what exactly he thinks the policy in Iraq should be," Mr. Steele said. "He's always said that he didn't want a timetable, now he has called for one. He didn't want immediate withdrawal, now he has called for one. I don't know which Ben Cardin we should expect tomorrow."

Mr. Cardin's redeployment plan also drew criticism from anti-war activist Kevin Zeese, the Senate nominee of the Green, Libertarian and Populist parties.

"His election-year rhetoric is inconsistent with his voting record on Iraq," said Mr. Zeese, who advocates a complete troop withdrawal within six months. "He's voted for staying the course, and now he comes up with a vague plan for withdrawal."

He noted that Mr. Cardin repeatedly voted to fund the Iraq war and voted against a measure that would have compelled Mr. Bush to come up with an exit strategy for the war.

The Cardin campaign declined to respond to Mr. Zeese's comments.

"The differences between Ben Cardin and Michael Steele on the war in Iraq are crystal clear," Cardin campaign spokesman Oren Shur said. "Cardin voted against the war; Steele supported it. Cardin has called for a change of course in Iraq; Steele supports the president's failed policies that got us into this mess."

In his Towson University speech, Mr. Cardin also called for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, and criticized the lieutenant governor for supporting the war plan.

He said that Mr. Steele and Mr. Bush "cannot acknowledge mistakes and cannot acknowledge when we need to change in order to be able to have a successful completion of what we have done in Iraq."

"I believe we need change," Mr. Cardin said. "Michael Steele believes in the status quo."

Mr. Steele, who since last year has advocated a new war strategy, said calling for Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation was "political hyperbole."

"I think [Mr. Rumsfeld] can do better," Mr. Steele said Friday after opening a Thanksgiving food drive for the poor in Baltimore.

Mr. Cardin said U.S. troops in Iraq could be replaced by the "international community."

He proposed convening an international conference to broker peace in Iraq and negotiate a cease-fire to sectarian violence there. Nongovernmental organizations should take over the job of rebuilding Iraq, Mr. Cardin said.

Michael J. Fox Records TV Ad For Cardin (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Appearing grimly unsteady from his long bout with Parkinson's disease, actor Michael J. Fox is inserting his halting voice into the campaign for the U.S. Senate in a new television commercial about the importance of stem cell research.

The ad, endorsing Democrat Benjamin L. Cardin in his race against Republican Michael S. Steele, bears witness to the actor's unmistakable decline and harnesses that physical degeneration into a political message.

"Stem cell research offers hope to millions of Americans with diseases like diabetes, Alzheimer's and Parkinson's," Fox says, seated in a dimly lit hotel room, staring directly into the camera. "But George Bush and Michael Steele would put limits on the most promising stem cell research."

Coming, as it has, just two weeks before Election Day, the commercial could serve as Cardin's antidote to the much-discussed advertising campaign launched by Steele, political analysts said yesterday.

Whereas Cardin to this point has run a series of conventional ads, Steele's visually spare but upbeat spots have won praise for the way they have presented the lieutenant governor as a Washington outsider who pledges to address the worst from both parties.

The Fox commercial makes those ads seem shallow by comparison, said Paul S. Herrnson, a University of Maryland political science professor.

"I think it's aimed at cutting through all the platitudes that normally accompany campaigns and says, 'Here's an issue that affects people's real lives,' " Herrnson said. "You look at him, and you see the effects."

Opponents of embryonic stem cell research who heard about the ad said they found it sad.

"To me, this is a shame that they're exploiting someone like Michael J. Fox for something that the scientists say is not going to do anything," said Douglas Stiegler, executive director of Maryland's Family Protection Lobby.

Steele campaign spokesman Doug Heye agreed, saying he considered the ad "in extremely poor taste."

Fox, who gained fame for his roles in the "Family Ties" and "Spin City" television shows and "Back to the Future" movies, has long been open about his battle with Parkinson's and his support for the research that could lead to a treatment. But in this ad he shows a noticeable degree of decline. His speech is clear but his head and body are jerky and unsteady. The camera remains still -- nothing about the production by Cardin consultant LHKK Media appears aimed at diminishing the striking visual impact of Fox's condition.

Though Fox's illness has progressed, his political involvement has not slowed.

In addition to the Cardin ad, Fox filmed 30-second spots for Senate candidate Claire McCaskill, a Missouri Democrat who is seeking to unseat Republican James M. Talent, and for Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle (D), who is seeking reelection. He has also made plans to appear at events for two Democrats, Sen. Robert Menendez of New Jersey and Tammy Duckworth, a candidate for Congress from Illinois.

"He wants to take on races and get involved in races that involve a pro stem cell candidate against an anti embryonic stem cell candidate," said John Rogers, a publicist for Fox.

Cardin aides said Fox contacted the campaign after seeing news accounts of Steele's position on the research. In February, Steele told members of a Baltimore Jewish group, "Look, you of all folks know what happens when people decide they want to experiment on human beings, when they want to take your life and use it as a tool."

He later apologized for the remark, which was interpreted as a comparison between embryonic stem cell research and Nazi experimentation. But he has maintained his position that research on embryos is not needed, especially, he has said, because there is promising research being done on adult stem cells. Heye said yesterday that Steele opposes only stem cell research that destroys the embryo.

Fox's message, though, makes clear that he believes study on adult stem cells is not enough, saying he approves of candidates who "fully" support the research.

"It's why I support Ben Cardin," he says, lifting his hand to his heart. "And with so much at stake, I respectfully ask you to do the same."

A Political Natural, Railing Against Politics (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Even for a politician, Michael S. Steele is said to have an extraordinary handshake. Not too weak but not crushing, either, with eye contact that never breaks off to scan the room. It communicates instant intimacy, a little zap of Clintonesque magic.

It is a rare thing, though, when Maryland's lieutenant governor stops with just a handshake.

Instead, supporters get a kiss on the cheek, one-armed embrace or even a full-on bear hug. This is the Steele treatment -- as light as a friendly grasp on the elbow or as intimate as a two-handed grasp of the head, all with the same message:

"He likes you," said James G. Gimpel, a government professor at the University of Maryland. "How many people do you meet where you feel, 'He likes me'? That's one of the things that make him a good politician."

Through a series of abandoned careers in the church, law and business, politics is what Steele has done longest and best -- building relationships and winning partisan battles.

Now, as a candidate for the U.S. Senate, he is running vigorously against the political system that promoted him. All the while, though, he is relying on the gifts that have gotten him this far: a confident charm and an intuition that says a hug is better than a handshake.

Here is Steele, 48, campaigning in Hagerstown: "Washington, in my view, has gotten outside of itself. It is a place none of us recognize."

Here is Steele on TV, in one of his ubiquitous blank-background ads: "Washington has no clue of what's going on in your life."

There are a few things odd about Steele's anti-Washington rhetoric -- don't 278,000 of the Maryland voters he's wooing actually work for this clueless federal government? -- but start with the most basic one.

If "Washington" is given its most literal definition, meaning the District, then Steele's nemesis is his own home town.

He was born at Andrews Air Force Base but adopted through a Catholic charity and raised in the Petworth neighborhood of Northwest Washington. Steele's mother and stepfather were Democrats -- and still are, to judge from the campaign sign for D.C. mayoral candidate Adrian M. Fenty (D) in their yard this fall.

Still, despite their dinner-table debates, Steele often cites his parents, especially his mother, as the source of personal values that would later make him a Republican. These included a belief in self-reliance and perseverance and an aversion to government interference in private lives and small businesses.

"She never took a penny of public assistance because, as she put it, she didn't want government raising her kids," Steele said of Maebell Turner when he announced his Senate candidacy last fall.

In his old neighborhood, people remember Steele as a boy who didn't run in the streets with other kids and instead found the center of his life at St. Gabriel Catholic Church. "Hey, let's play church," he would tell his sister, Monica Turner.

"He used to have a glass with vanilla wafers in it, to symbolize the host, and some apple juice in the other glass, to symbolize the wine. I would line up like I was taking communion, and he would practice saying the mass," Turner, a doctor and former wife of boxer Mike Tyson, wrote in an e-mail. "It was too cute."

When Steele got to Archbishop Carroll High School in Northeast, the boy who had once kept to himself became an outgoing actor. In his first productions, he was often consigned to the back row because he was so tall -- but he didn't often stay there.

"Somehow, he always wound his way up to the front," said James Mumford, who oversaw plays and musicals then and later became principal. Steele eventually became a confident leading actor and a graceful dancer, Mumford said, playing the president in "Of Thee I Sing" and the devil in "Damn Yankees."

In 1977, Steele went on to Johns Hopkins University, where his energy and magnetism led him to another prominent role: president of student government.

Hopkins history professor Ronald Walters, sizing up the politically gifted student that Steele had become by then, made a prediction about his future.

"That was that Michael would go a long way in Democratic Party politics," Walters said. "So I was half-right on that one."Called to God, Then to Law

After college, Steele shifted gears radically, moving from his frenetic life on campus to the discipline of a Catholic seminary. He eventually joined a handful of other "novices" at an old house in Lawrence, Mass. The routine there: Mass every day, classes on religious life, and lots and lots of quiet time.

The program was supposed to last a year, but Steele left after six months, in February 1983.

He says now that God, who had called him to join the program, also called him to leave. But one of his vows, in particular, provided a push.

"Chastity is a state of mind. And certainly, obedience, I could take being told what to do. But poverty -- whew, tough, tough, tough, tough, tough, tough. Just tough," Steele said. He said he was particularly unhappy when his canary-yellow 1973 Ford Torino became the common property of all novices.

After leaving the church as a career, Steele chose the law. He was a paralegal, a law student at Georgetown and then a lawyer from 1991 to 1998, working for a D.C. law office and then for the Mills Corp., the real estate giant.

During that time, though, Steele was laying the seeds for another career.

He and his family -- it now includes his wife, Andrea, and two teenage sons -- had moved to Largo. There, he began his long association with a group that had become the political equivalent of the Washington Generals, eternal doormats for basketball's Harlem Globetrotters.

"This guy says to me that he's here to build the Republican Party in Prince George's County," said Sydney Moore, a businessman active in county politics, recalling what Steele told him in the 1980s. "And I said, 'Wow!' "A Political Rise in an Unlikely Place

The Prince George's GOP was -- and still is -- one of the most beleaguered party organizations in a state that hadn't had a Republican governor since 1969.

Into this picture came Steele, the former seminarian, comfortable with the law and with a microphone. He has said he sometimes felt isolated in the early years because he was one of only a few African Americans in the local party. Others remember meeting someone who was deeply loyal, affable and dynamite when talking to people one-on-one. Someone who was ready to pay his dues.

"He would do the telephone banks. He would do the stuffing. He would put on the labels," recalled Audrey E. Scott, a former County Council member and now Maryland's secretary of planning. "I mean, he was a worker."

And a talker. Steele became party chairman in Prince George's in 1994 and soon became one of the loudest voices in a fight over the county's property-tax cap. Some wanted to lift the cap; Steele and others fought to keep it and won.

There were setbacks: In 1998, Steele ran for comptroller and finished third in the GOP primary. Two years later, though, he ascended to the chairmanship of the state GOP. Thereafter came a major victory, as a redistricting plan from then-Gov. Parris N. Glendening (D) was defeated in court.

"Republicans never win anything" in Maryland, said Christopher West, a Baltimore lawyer who lost to Steele in the race for party chairman. "So it was a very big deal."

Soon, Steele was a very big deal himself. Then-Rep. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) picked him as a running mate in the 2002 governor's race. When they won, beating an all-white Democratic ticket, Steele became the first African American to win statewide office in Maryland.

His victory also meant that, for the first time in several years, Steele's financial situation was secure.

Since 1999, after he'd left his last job, as a lawyer, Steele had been trying to start a consulting business. Bray Barnes, who became Steele's partner in the firm, said they sought to represent countries or companies in their dealings with the federal government, relying on their Republican contacts in Washington.

"I would say we had pretty limited success," said Barnes, a lawyer in Toms River, N.J. He couldn't remember ever signing up a client. There was at least one: During the campaign for governor, after Barnes was no longer working with the business, the Maryland Republican Party was paying the firm, and by extension Steele, a consulting fee of $5,000 a month.

With little money coming in from the business, Steele has said, he drained retirement accounts. He told an audience in a recent speech that his family went without health insurance for three years.

"Don't break anything, because Daddy can't afford to fix it," he recalled telling his sons then.

On Nov. 5, 2002, Steele's election win erased all that. His current job pays $120,000 a year. A rocketing political career had finally made a struggling business one irrelevant. He savored the victory.

"Is this sweet or what?" Steele told supporters election night, according to news accounts.Fighting the Numbers

DOJ_NMG_0085546

Steele's opponent in the Senate race, Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, is a wonkish, pedestrian orator. But so far, Cardin has also proved resolutely unwilling to shoot himself in the foot.

In a state where Democrats outnumber Republicans nearly 2 to 1 -- and where issues such as the Iraq war and the government's handling of Hurricane Katrina might keep black Democrats from crossing party lines -- that might be all Cardin needs to win.

"A good Democratic candidate running a good campaign will beat a good Republican running a good campaign in a statewide race every time, just because of the numbers," said Donald Norris, a public policy professor at the University of Maryland Baltimore County.

To counter this disadvantage, Steele has run a campaign that portrays him as above party, beyond party. In avoiding Republican-specific policy recommendations, however, Steele sometimes ends up sounding as if he's avoiding specifics altogether.

He offers policy proposals, including increased restrictions on lobbyists, tax exemptions for new businesses and a 120-day suspension of the federal gasoline tax.

But often, when pressed on domestic- or foreign-policy questions, Steele responds not with firm positions but with a call for larger, more inclusive discussions.

Energy? Get environmentalists, solar advocates and nuclear people in the room with oil and gas interests. Health care? Get all the players in the room. North Korea? Get China involved.

"We need to get them in the room. We need to get them at the table," Steele said.

The one thing he always mentions is Washington, how the culture of partisan bickering needs to change. Steele, however, is not above a bit of political gamesmanship himself.

At his Hagerstown speech, he criticized Cardin because Democratic Party operatives fraudulently obtained his credit report.

"Anyone who wants my credit report, I'd be happy to give it to you," Steele said. "If you want to know about me, ask me."

Later that day, a Washington Post reporter asked: Is it possible to get your credit report?

"No, it's not," Steele said.

Right now, the polls show Cardin leading Steele. But friends of Steele, who remember him as the giant-killer of the Maryland GOP, aren't convinced.

There are a lot more hands to shake and cheeks to kiss, a lot more connections to be made, before Nov. 7.

"I read the polls, and I don't believe them," said Scott, the Maryland planning secretary. "Because I'll tell you this: I can't believe anyone who meets and talks to Michael Steele will not vote for him."

Just Who Is The Man Behind That Steele Mask? (WT)

By Adrienne Washington

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

Calling on one of my Sistagirls who lives in Baltimore County to get her take on the U.S. Senate race in Maryland, I got a response that pretty well sums up what may be the biggest problem for the Republican candidate, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele.

"I like Michael Steele a lot personally, but I just don't know who he is or where he stands," said this black professional woman. "That's why I don't trust him." Now that he has attracted suitors with those EHarmony-like ads, the real Mr. Steele has to show up in person. He talks a good man-of-the-people game, but how will he play it?

When I reiterated my Sistagirl's nervous sentiments to Mr. Steele at a luncheon with editors and reporters at The Washington Times yesterday, he bristled at the very notion that he is an unknown quantity.

After all, he has been lieutenant governor of the Free State for almost four years, and he has raised the bar so high with his litany of pat-myself-on-the-back accomplishments that his successors "will actually have to work" in the ceremonial position henceforth, he said.

But the guessing game of the hour rests on whether Michael Steele is a right-wing Republican, an undercover moderate Democrat or a wannabe independent. Just where do this atypical candidate's political loyalties lie? Exactly who constitutes the core constituency to whom he will be beholden?

The street rap on Mr. Steele is that he is hard to read once you get past the friendly smile and platitudes, even for those who have spent time with him. He begs the question posed in those old hair-color commercials, "Does she or doesn't she? Only her hairdresser knows for sure."

I wish I could tell you for sure, one way or the other, about the man behind the steely mask. He definitely has the potential to morph into a hybrid politician, based on the conversations we have had, if he can break away from his big-bucks benefactors. More important, break away from those crude folks who characterize him as "just another Clarence Thomas," which he is not.

But it really is not my job to define Mr. Steele's nebulous candidacy. It is the ultimate Steele campaign challenge, and it hasn't been met well as he tries to beat Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, the Democrat vying to replace retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes.

Mr. Steele argues that he hasn't been given the chance to get out his message -- a hodgepodge of populist and conservative economic and social policies -- although he has visited nearly three-fourths of municipalities in the state.

He is right when he says too many partisan voters are content to stick with shallow labels, but you must offer them more than shallow stuff when you are up against fear, tradition and blind loyalty to a party that takes voters for granted.

Which brings us to those slick campaign ads that don't mention his "R" affiliation.

"No one else has had to put up [their party label] in their ads," Mr. Steele said. "Why should I?" Because he has to explain himself better. He contends that he has tried to do just that, and unlike "any other candidate in this country," he has had to deal with explaining who he is as a black man and a Republican in every room he enters.

When he was the state Republican Party chairman, Mr. Steele acknowledged, he was "the most partisan man on the block." But after he was elected lieutenant governor, he realized that he had to represent all Marylanders "from the KKK to the NAACP." So he changed.

But how? Where would he place himself now on the political spectrum? "Oh, you want labels?" he said.

Well, yeah, and so do the voters, like my Sistagirl.

"I don't like labels," he answered tersely.

I don't either, but they serve the purpose of giving folks somewhere to start, or land if you are looking to win them over.

How about giving waffling folks like my Maryland Sistagirl a few concrete reasons to take a huge leap of faith and cross over to the Other Side? For instance, how many know about Mr. Steele's calls for more tuition assistance for community colleges and historically black colleges; or more certified teachers assigned to troubled Maryland schools; or his initiatives designed to assist black women who own small businesses, which I heard touted this weekend in, of all places, Virginia? Mr. Steele does possess a Muhammad Ali penchant for fancy footing around tough questions.

But Mr. Steele is more focused and passionate about his concerns on bread-and-butter issues that he thinks the voters want to hear about. For example, he talked about finding ways to reduce high unemployment in black communities, as represented by a man who asked him how to get his 26-year-old son, a University of Maryland graduate, a job so he can move out.

The son of a laundress and a small-business owner, Mr. Steele knows what it is like "not to get a paycheck." Most senators don't have a clue, and he would like to enlighten them.

With two weeks left until Election Day, Mr. Steele says, he is going all over the state and "get in your face" to tell voters exactly who he is.

He is emboldened by his latest polls that show he can expect to receive 20 percent to 25 percent of the black vote in Maryland with another 25 percent still undecided. However, he is admittedly concerned by the prospect of white voters abandoning the Republican Party and voting against him because of his race.

"I'm not silly. ... I know the state I live in," he said.

It's not like he is unaware of his role as Goliath. "We still have a lot to do," he said.

The Steele mystique may soon change. It had better.

Solidly Republican, Suddenly In Doubt (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

COEUR D'ALENE, Idaho -- It is, perhaps, the political equivalent of hell freezing over in the interior West.

This red state where conservative Republicans routinely wipe the floor with hapless Democrats has a Republican running for Congress who just might lose.

The suddenly competitive race is a delicious development for Larry Grant, a Democratic candidate for the House who finds himself transformed from sacrificial lamb to reason for worry among national Republican strategists.

His Republican opponent is Bill Sali, an eight-term state representative with a corrosive reputation for irking his fellow Republicans. The Republican speaker of the Idaho House, Bruce Newcomb, said this spring of Sali: "That idiot is just an absolute idiot."

With an impish smile, Grant, who was a high-tech executive in Boise, took a moment from knocking on residents' doors here last week and said: "Can you imagine Republicans sitting around in Washington and saying to each other, 'Jeez, now we have to spend more money to win -- in Idaho?' "

But spending and worrying the Republicans are, here and in a handful of other usually safe House districts in the West, where unrelentingly grim news from the war in Iraq has combined with smoldering anger over federal deficits and Washington scandals to vivify Democratic candidates who not long ago were reconciled to their fate as biannual Republican roadkill.

President Bush cruised in Idaho in 2004 with 69 percent of the vote. Republicans outnumber Democrats about 2 to 1 in the district where Grant is running, and two years ago the district elected a Republican with 70 percent of the vote.

Previous occupants of the now-open seat include the late Helen Chenoweth-Hage, an archconservative who held hearings in the 1990s on a supposed "black helicopter" federal conspiracy to take away the freedoms of rural Westerners.

Now, to shore up support in Idaho's vast 1st Congressional District -- 500 miles long, from Canada to Nevada, crossing two time zones and three media markets -- the Republican National Congressional Committee spent $135,000 last week for ads against Grant. His campaign says that for the final two weeks of the campaign the Republican committee has committed about $375,000 to buy television and radio time, a figure that approaches Grant's fundraising total for his entire campaign.

"It is a tough year," said Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, who declined to say how much it would spend in the 1st District. "We spend a lot of time going over every race in the country, and we want to make sure we fix problems before they become problems."

The problems, though, are not just in Idaho. Just west of the state, there is another growing spot of bother.

In Washington's 5th Congressional District, where former speaker Thomas S. Foley (D) famously lost in 1994 when Republicans seized control of the House, confirmation of an unexpectedly strong Democratic challenge emerged in recent days from a well-placed source: the Republican incumbent, Rep. Cathy McMorris.

"It's a closer race than I first imagined," she told Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), according to the Spokesman-Review, a newspaper in Spokane. Changing voter attitudes in her conservative, mostly rural district, she said, have been "pretty dramatic."

McMorris and Craig apparently thought they were speaking privately before the start of a campaign teleconference with veterans. But an operator had connected Spokesman-Review reporter Jim Camden, who was on mute and could not announce his presence.

Craig, who is not up for reelection, told McMorris that she was not alone in feeling Democratic heat. "The new numbers are just devastating," he reportedly said.

McMorris's Democratic opponent is Peter Goldmark, a rancher whose surprising strength has attracted the support of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, which last week began spending $323,000 on television ads opposing McMorris.

In suburban Seattle's 8th Congressional District, the Republican incumbent, Rep. David G. Reichert, a well-known former sheriff from King County, is also facing a robust challenge -- from a political neophyte, Darcy Burner, 35, a former Microsoft executive.

The race, in a swing district where Democrats consistently win the presidential vote but Republicans hold the House, is widely viewed as a tossup. While behind in total fundraising, Burner has raised more money in recent months than Reichert has. To shore up the former sheriff, who made his name by catching the notorious Green River killer, the Republican National Congressional Committee has recently stepped up spending on television ads.

Here in Idaho, political analysts say that a competitive House race would never have been possible, except for the unlikely convergence of two destabilizing forces -- a noxious national climate for Republicans and a Republican candidate with a knack for being obnoxious. The Republican incumbent in Idaho's only other House seat, Rep. Mike Simpson, once threatened to throw Sali out a window.

Sali, 52, who won a bitter Republican primary against five opponents with 26 percent of the vote, has made strident opposition to abortion the signature issue of his 16-year political career.

Most notably, as Sali said in an interview in northern Idaho on Friday evening, he sees a causal link between abortion and breast cancer. "If you have an abortion, you are at increased risk," he said.

Recent studies of large numbers of women consistently show no such link, according to the National Cancer Institute, one of the federal National Institutes of Health.

Sali's pugnacious rhetoric on abortion and breast cancer during a debate this year in the Idaho House led to a walkout by Democrats and to a public tongue-lashing by House Speaker Newcomb.

"He doesn't have one ounce of empathy in his whole fricking body, and you can put that in the paper," Newcomb told reporters.

At a Republican campaign forum in northern Idaho on Friday night, a middle-aged woman from Bonner County who described herself as a party activist said that she and other Republican women in Idaho are offended by Sali's views on breast cancer.

"Women are angry about that," she said, insisting that she not be identified because of party loyalty. "They see it as an affront to their health issues."

In polls conducted for Grant, the issue showed up as one of the strongest negatives for Sali, according to Celinda Lake, a Democratic pollster based in Washington, D.C.

Political analysts in Idaho say the issue is one of Sali's many problems in securing broad Republican support.

"He has simply aggravated a lot of people over time," said Randy Stapilus, a blogger and former political editor for the Idaho Statesman. "There are a lot of Republican leaders who don't much care for Sali."

Still, this is Idaho.

"There are probably a lot of voters who have never voted for a Democrat, so you have to figure Sali is the more probable winner," Stapilus said. "But this is a different dynamic than we have seen for quite a long time."

Seats In Danger, Democrats Proclaim Their Conservatism (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

MACON, Ga., Oct. 19 — Listening to Congressional candidates in middle Georgia, it is easy for someone to think that he is in a different year and, possibly, a different country.

Democrats defend themselves against accusations that they are rubber stamps for their party's leadership. Democrats are defending the war in Iraq. And Democrats — yes, Democrats — strive to align themselves with the president.

"I agree with George Bush on this one," Representative John Barrow ends his new advertisement in favor of abolishing the estate tax.

Charles S. Bullock, a professor of political science at the University of Georgia, said, "It's a bit of a return to yesterday."

For all the talk of this being a Democratic year — experts and party leaders use words like tide or even tsunami — there are a small number of exceptions, places where Republicans believe they can take back seats from the Democrats.

And these contests are producing some of the fiercest fights — not to mention the most contrarian campaign strategies — of the midterm elections, as Democrats try to boast of their conservative credentials and their opponents try to sequester them on the opposite extreme.

As Mr. Barrow's Republican challenger, Max Burns, declared on Thursday in a debate in Augusta, "My opponent, he started out a liberal and he's trying to get to the right of Attila the Hun."

The number of embattled Democrats has gone down. Republicans at the beginning of the summer said they believed that they could take 10 Democratic seats. Now they say four.

Every one counts. Facing the possibility that control of the House could be decided on the thinnest of margins, Democrats are not taking any race for granted, and Republicans are eager to exploit any potential Democratic weakness.

Two of those four seats are here in Georgia, a predominantly Republican state where redistricting has left two Democratic incumbents, Mr. Barrow and Representative Jim Marshall, unfamiliar to a big chunk of their new constituents.

The others are Representative Leonard L. Boswell, running against a well-financed opponent in Iowa, and Representative Melissa Bean, who is serving her first term from Illinois.

The Economic Freedom Fund, an independent group financed by the Texas homebuilder who bankrolled the Swift boat veterans' attacks against Senator John Kerry in 2004, has singled out Mr. Barrow and Mr. Marshall.

President Bush has campaigned in Georgia for Mr. Burns and Michael Collins, and is to return eight days before Election Day.

The race between Mr. Marshall and Mr. Collins has been expensive and nasty. Voters tell of receiving seven telephone calls a night and as many fliers in their mailboxes. Mr. Marshall said he had decided to begin advertising early, before Labor Day, when the advertising reached such a pitch that the average viewer was seeing 30 advertisements against him for every 7 in his favor each week, most trying to lump him with liberal Democrats.

"I'm spending a lot more time with Nancy Pelosi, Ted Kennedy and Hillary Clinton on TV in middle Georgia than I will ever in my life spend in reality," Mr. Marshall said.

At a pizza and politics rally at a church in Covington, a town west of Atlanta, Mr. Collins listed familiar bogeymen from the left, Representatives John Conyers Jr., Charles B. Rangel and John P. Murtha.

"And last but not least, Congresswoman Nancy Pelosi from California wants to be speaker of the House," he said, his voice low and ominous. "And I tell you, folks, this is the last thing we need in the House.

"The next two years bogged down in investigations, with a judiciary chairman who wants to impeach the president. We don't need those things, folks. So I ask you now, on Nov. 7, vote for Mac Collins to be your congressman. Mac Collins doesn't vote that way. Mac Collins will vote for Denny Hastert, a Republican, to be speaker of the House."

Never mind that other Republican candidates are canceling appearances with Speaker Hastert, who has been caught up in the aftermath of the Congressional page scandal. Here, the Republican candidates are betting that the association with Mr. Hastert helps them.

"If you vote for Barrow, you are giving a vote to Nancy Pelosi," Joan Clay, a Republican, said at the debate in Augusta. "Do you want Nancy Pelosi to be the majority leader?"

At the debate, Mr. Barrow, a lawyer with the bookish look of a grown-up Harry Potter, jabbed his finger in the air and spoke hurriedly while Mr. Burns stood back with a bemused look and the self-assuredness of an incumbent. Senator Kerry won the 2004 presidential vote in Mr. Barrow's district, but Mr. Bush won in Mr. Marshall's, making him more vulnerable, especially against an established and well-financed candidate like Mr. Collins, who served six terms in the House in a previously configured district.

"It's awfully tempting from a Republican perspective," Mr. Marshall, a former law professor and mayor of Macon, said. "I'd have to be kind of foolish to think it wouldn't be a big fight."

Forty-three percent of the voting age population in the new district was not represented by Mr. Marshall under the old lines. So he raised more money than he thought he would need, then spent even more than that and continues to raise money two weeks before the election.

"What I thought would be a $1 million campaign has turned out to be a $2 million campaign," he said.

While elsewhere, Republicans shun their party label in advertisements, in these districts it is the Democrats who ignore affiliation, declaring themselves, as Ms. Bean does, “a moderate independent voice” or as Mr. Barrow does, “Our congressman on our side,” without mentioning which side that is.

“I have crossed the aisle and worked with the other side more often than almost anyone else,” Mr. Barrow said Thursday in the debate at a lakeside casino in Augusta. “I don’t think either team has it right in Washington 99 percent of the time.”

Republicans have had trouble portraying the two Georgia incumbents as liberals because they have largely conservative voting records. Mr. Collins says that is only because Mr. Marshall has had so many Republican bills to vote on. Mr. Marshall, recently inducted into the Army Ranger Hall of Fame, is also popular with the large military population in the district.

Republicans have tried the “too liberal for Georgia” tactic before, even on Zell Miller, the Democratic senator perhaps most popularly remembered for his fiery speech at the Republican National Convention in 2004. Mr. Bullock says the Democrats have learned from the experience of party members like Max Cleland, whose votes exposed him to accusations of being too liberal.

“If Democrats are going to get elected in this district, they’ve got to stake out the middle position, which is what traditional Southern Democrats did,” Mr. Bullock said. “And when they did, they held the South.”

Clinton Stumps For Local Democrats (CHIT)

By John Biemer And John Chase, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, October 24, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton spoke at a Chicago fundraiser for U.S. Rep. Melissa Bean and Tammy Duckworth on Monday and praised the suburban Democratic congressional candidates as "independent, clear-thinking, non-ideological, inclusive, commonsensical people."

About 600 supporters attended the event, sponsored by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, that was expected to raise about $800,000 to be split three ways between Bean, Duckworth and the DCCC.

Clinton briefly addressed campaign volunteers and reporters before the closed-door event and said "there is a profound sea change going on in this country—people know that Washington is not working for them.

"The ideologues who run things in Washington today really hate evidence and argument. They consider evidence irrelevant because they already got their mind made up and argument is an inconvenient waste of time, so they govern by assertion and attack," Clinton said. "The first rule in any human endeavor is if you find yourself in a hole, quit digging. The ideologue asks for a bigger shovel."

Duckworth's west suburban 6th Congressional District opponent, Peter Roskam, countered Clinton's visit by appearing with David Beamer, the father of Todd Beamer, a passenger on United 93, the flight hijacked by terrorists that crashed Sept. 11, 2001, in Pennsylvania.

David Beamer, a former Wheaton resident who now lives in Jacksonville Beach, Fla., said he backs Roskam for supporting the Bush administration's fight against terrorism. "It's a different kind of enemy. Their ideology is warped beyond comprehension, and this particular enemy doesn't have the word 'surrender' in their dictionary," Beamer said.

Earlier Monday, a group of 100 African-American ministers endorsed Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich for re-election and Ald. Todd Stroger (8th) for Cook County Board president. The minister said they intend to hand out at least 500,000 leaflets promoting the two candidates.

The "Unity in the Community" leaflets include a picture of Blagojevich and Stroger below the phrase, "The People's Slate."

The endorsement came as Stroger's campaign for the first time began airing commercials that promote his positions on increasing access to health insurance and equal pay while attacking Republican leadership. Stroger's Republican opponent is county Commissioner Tony Peraica.

Newly filed campaign disclosure reports show Stroger has raised about $600,000 since July, including more than $300,000 in the last two weeks. Peraica has raised more than $367,000 since July 1, including more than $126,000 in the last two weeks.

In the race for governor, incumbent Democrat Rod Blagojevich reported raising nearly $3.5 million since July 1, including at least $631,000 in donations of $500 or more since Oct. 9. Disclosure documents show Blagojevich got donations of $300,000 from the Illinois Federation of Teachers, $250,000 from the Laborers' International Union of North America and transferred $204,000 from his congressional campaign account. Aides to Republican Judy Baar Topinka said she would report more than $3 million in donations since July 1, including $687,000 in contributions of at least $500 since Oct. 9.

Born A Rambling Man (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, October 24, 2006

Having soaked up just about every last bit of limelight from the CIA leak scandal, former GOP-appointed Ambassador Joe Wilson is burning up the campaign trail on behalf of Democrats while apparently planning a full-time move away from Washington, D.C.

Sources tell HOH that Wilson and his wife, Valerie Plame Wilson — who was famously outed as a CIA operative by columnist Robert Novak — have told friends that they are ready to quit Washington. One source says the Wilsons, the parents of 6-year-old twins, have "settled on" Santa Fe, N.M.

Wilson, in a brief telephone chat with HOH, wouldn't confirm where or when they are moving. But he said, "We have entertained for a while now moving out of Washington, D.C. ... My wife no longer has a job in Washington, so we're no longer bound to the city," he said. (Thanks to Richard Armitage for those unemployment checks.)

Wilson — aka The Man Who Called B.S. on WMDs — said he and Valerie haven't sold their home in Washington (though it did sound as if there were a parenthetical "yet" on the end of his sentence). But he wouldn't confirm whether they've bought a house or are looking at houses in Santa Fe. "I don't have any comment on that," he said.

For now, he said, "I'm safely ensconced in Washington, D.C."

Or rather, he's safely ensconced on the campaign trail. As a then-President George H.W. Bush political appointee, Wilson's appeal is particularly useful in swing districts. He has campaigned for such Democratic candidates as Diane Farrell, who is running against Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.); Lois Murphy, who's trying to unseat Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.); and Iraq War veteran Patrick Murphy, who is taking on Rep. Michael Fitzpatrick (R-Pa.).

Wilson, never one to shy away from the cameras, also is campaigning on behalf of Connecticut Senate candidate Ned Lamont (D), Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.) and former CIA agent Jim Marcinkowski, who's running against Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Mich.), among several others.

"What I'm campaigning for ... is accountability in government," Wilson said. "In my view, the majority that controls Congress has sacrificed the Constitution of the United States on the altar of partisan loyalty, partisan politics."

Hmmm, anybody figure that Wilson, who comes from a modest California political dynasty, is planning a campaign of his own?

Proud to Be a Macaca? In the wake of the "macaca" controversy that knocked Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) off-stride, two young Indian-American brothers in Vienna, Va., have become quite the grass-roots politicos.

With the help of their Democratic parents, the boys, age 10 and 12, designed a "Macacas for Jim Webb" T-shirt, which they're now selling for eight bucks a pop. All proceeds are going to Webb's Democratic Senate campaign, according to their mother, Alli Guleria, an orthodontist in Reston, Va.

Guleria says her boys, Shan, 12, and Neil, 10, have been exposed to "some amount of prejudice" at their small private school in Reston but were "shocked" by Allen's infamous "macaca" moniker for an Indian American at a campaign rally. She and her husband, who were both born in India, had a family meeting to discuss the controversy with their kids, and at that point, she said, "we thought, 'Wouldn't it be hilarious if we called ourselves macacas?'"

So the Democrats decided to embark on the family project to make "Macacas for Webb" T-shirts. The boys have been selling the T-shirts at school, around the neighborhood and to their mom's patients.

"To date, we've sold 38," Guleria said.

One neighbor who hasn't bought one of the boys' T-shirts is Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.), who lives on the same street as the Gulerias and who occasionally runs in the same circles. Guleria couldn't help herself when she ran into the Congressman at a party on Saturday night and told him about her boys' project.

DOJ_NMG_0085553

"He was gracious," Guleria said of her GOP Congressman neighbor. She quoted Davis as saying, "Everyone is entitled to their opinion." She said he had "nothing but nice things" to say about Webb, and said nothing of Allen or his "macaca" comment.

Checklist for Cheap Senators. In the wake of an Associated Press report that Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) paid Christmas bonuses to the staff at his Ritz Carlton condo complex with campaign cash instead of his own money, the Las Vegas Review-Journal opined Sunday, "Is the good Senator a penny pincher?"

The newspaper devised the following checklist led by the question: "You might be a Senate skinflint if ..."

• You ask for a doggie bag in the Senate Dining Room.

• You regift to Howard Dean.

Can Democrat Dethrone Rep. King? (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton

That is where New York's 3rd Congressional district sits, and for more than a decade, Rep. Peter King (R), the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, has had little difficulty maintaining his seat in this Republican stronghold.

However, in an election year when everything seems to be going the Democrats' way, King's re-election might not be a guarantee.

The 62-year-old lawmaker is facing an unexpected challenge from Democrat David Mejias, the first-ever Latino elected to the Nassau County Legislature. Mejias, who was endorsed by The New York Times on Sunday, is touting a poll by the firm Constituent Dynamics that puts him only two points behind King.

Mejias argues that voters in the largely Republican 3rd district are ready for a change.

"From the response that we've gotten, I'd like to think it's because I'm a good candidate," Mejias said. "But I completely understand that it's really about things that are beyond me."

Mejias said King has moved further to the right over the past few elections, against the wishes of his constituents. The challenger called King a "shameful rubberstamp" for President Bush and said that the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) gives him momentum to oust King come Nov. 7.

"I pose a credible threat for him," Mejias said Monday.

Mike Dawidziak, a political consultant in Long Island, said Mejias does pose a threat to King, although he doubts it's the kind of neck-and-neck race that the Constituent Dynamics poll suggests.

Factors that give Mejias some momentum heading into November include the national mood of the country, the Democratic nature of New York and the fact that Republicans haven't mounted a competitive top-of-the-state ticket, Dawidziak said.

"It could become closer than people think it's going to be," Dawidziak said.

Still, Mejias faces a difficult task in defeating King, Dawidziak said. He added that if Republican turnout roughly matches Democratic turnout, King will come out on top.

"He really just needs to say, 'I've been there. I've been doing the hard work,'" Dawidziak said of King. "I think people will react well to that."

Dawidziak added that Mejias' tactic of tying King directly to Bush might backfire.

"I don't think people buy that," Dawidziak said. "I think voters are a lot smarter than people give them credit for."

King, for his part, isn't buying any talk of an upset. The seven-term Congressman labels it pure hype, pointing to recent internal polling giving him a lead of more than 20 points over Mejias.

DOJ_NMG_0085554

And when it comes to money, King truly is on top. According to the latest FEC filings, King has $1.6 million cash on hand, whereas Mejias lags far behind at about $136,000.

King is starting to put all that cash to use, he said. He launched radio ads in September and recently began airing television ads in the high-priced New York City market. One is an endorsement by former New York City mayor Ed Koch (D), while another features the mother of a firefighter killed during the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, King said.

King will increase the number of ads leading up to the election, as well as release 10 or 11 mailings to voters throughout the district, he said.

"I take every race seriously," King said. "So I'm going all-out."

At the same time, King argued that Mejias "is doing very little that other guys haven't done."

Past challengers have often had more money than Mejias does, yet King always managed to win anyway. King attributes much of the hype this time around to New York media outlets he doesn't count as allies.

"I don't see him as being a factor," King said of Mejias. "My opponent is Newsday and The New York Times."

Mejias, meanwhile, said he has reached about 80,000 voters through phone calls and door-to-door efforts, and he pointed to a public debate held between the candidates a few weeks ago that Mejias said generated a lot of interest in his campaign.

Born and raised on Long Island, Mejias was elected to the Nassau County Legislature in 2003. A graduate of the Fordham University School of Law, he opened his own law firm at the age of 26. He is the managing partner of David L. Mejias & Associates, which specializes in personal injury, matrimonial and criminal law.

Mejias' campaign has benefited from interest within the Internet grass roots. The debate was posted on YouTube, and liberal blogs, including kingwatch.blogspot.com, have talked up his campaign. By contrast, King does not even have a campaign Web site.

"All these years of not having a credible challenger has made him really arrogant," Mejias said.

Still, one Democratic pollster said any challenger must prove to voters that the incumbent no longer represents their needs and that a curtain surrounds their affairs in Washington, D.C.

"The task of a challenger is to raise that curtain," the pollster said.

In Calif., Charlie Brown Could Have The Last Laugh (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

ROSEVILLE, Calif. -- Charlie Brown for Congress? At first it sounded like a joke.

Brown was an unknown Democrat running in the California Republican heartland. The eight-term incumbent, John Doolittle (R), had crushed his 2004 opponent. Fewer than a third of district voters are registered Democrats. When Brown jumped in a year ago, the Peanuts references were irresistible.

"Good Grief! Charlie Brown Takes on Doolittle," proclaimed one political blog.

There are two types of candidates: the obvious ones, who are recruited to run in key races and get lots of financial and organizational help, and the bootstrap cases, who do it all on their own. Usually these second-tier candidates run and lose in obscurity. But sometimes they get lucky. If a wave breaks next month, Brown is one of many bootstrap Democrats who could be washed into Congress.

The latest polls show that Brown, a retired Air Force lieutenant colonel, has pulled within striking distance of Doolittle, whose well-documented ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff may be an albatross. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is increasingly optimistic about Brown's chances and has chipped in an undisclosed amount of cash for the final push. Brown has scooped up local newspaper endorsements and raised $750,000, much of it in recent weeks.

The one person who isn't surprised by this turn of events is Brown, who ignored all the naysayers and trusted his gut that Doolittle could be beaten. The latest news to break his way: Doolittle's campaign reported more than $38,000 in legal fees in his third-quarter fundraising report that are related to a federal investigation into Abramoff's lobbying activities. A Doolittle spokeswoman said the congressman was attempting to be helpful and had not been contacted by prosecutors, but the disclosure put Doolittle on the defensive with weeks to go.

"It all comes down to someone who lives in the district, and knows it," Brown said of his success. He's not surprised the national party kept its distance all those months. "We've had to show them in Washington that it was worth getting involved. When I got started, there was nothing here to support."

The 4th District is made up of 48 percent Republicans and 30 percent Democrats, with the balance GOP-leaning independents. The geography also is daunting. The district contains 17,000 square miles, from the Sacramento suburbs to the Oregon and Nevada state lines.

But it's a more nuanced landscape than it seems, Brown says.

Bay Area residents are moving east in search of cheaper housing, and although they are not heavily Democratic, many are registering as independents. The Sacramento area was one of the few pockets in the state to vote for a 2005 measure to end partisan redistricting. Doolittle called the initiative politically "stupid."

In June, Doolittle won the GOP primary with 67 percent of the vote, an indication that his base had diminished. The California 4th is home to 102,000 veterans. Brown was raised in a military household and has a son serving in Iraq. He coordinated Air Force surveillance flights over Iraq during the 1990s and opposed the Iraq war from the outset. As conditions in Iraq worsen, he has found local veterans increasingly responsive to his call for setting a timetable for withdrawal.

Running in a political no man's land requires building a campaign operation from scratch. Brown lined up precinct captains and courted local unions and other left-leaning organizations. He traveled to every populated cranny of the district, either alone or with his wife, Jan, a retired Air Force nurse.

Like most candidates, Brown has entered a sort of parallel universe, wired but road weary, a regular at a taqueria next door to headquarters. His campaign has grown bigger and more frenetic, part small business and part family.

One fixture is Joanne Neft, founder of Republicans for Charlie Brown, who canvasses in silver elephant earrings. Another is Don Harper, who runs Veterans for Brown.

Despite all the excitement, the party mantra remained unchanged: "Show me the polls." Brown commissioned a survey last month that showed Doolittle ahead, 41 percent to 39 percent, and 17 percent undecided. Shortly afterward, Brown was endorsed by the Sacramento Bee under the headline "Time for Doolittle to go."

On Oct. 11, the candidates met for a combative two-hour debate. "Nothing like it has ever been seen in Placer County," the San Francisco Chronicle observed.

Doolittle called Brown a "flimflam man." He cited Brown's membership in the American Civil Liberties Union, which Doolittle accused of defending the North American Man/Boy Love Association, which he said "is helping pedophiles get away with their dastardly deeds."

Brown lambasted Doolittle for his relationship with Abramoff and a San Diego businessman implicated in the bribery case that sent former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) to prison. Brown noted that his opponent had accepted a $1,000 donation from Mark Foley (R-Fla.), who resigned from Congress last month in a scandal involving male teenage congressional pages. "Mr. Doolittle knows more about man's love than I do, with his support of Congressman Foley," Brown retorted.

They say timing is everything in politics, but part of that is knowing when an incumbent's time may be up. "There's a whole lot of people who are going to win this year, simply because they showed up," said Amy Walter, who tracks House races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. "People who are willing to take the biggest risks often get the biggest rewards."

Parties Preparing For Final Push (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, October 24, 2006

Republicans, struggling to retain their Congressional majority under the weight of low approval ratings and bad news out of Iraq, are increasingly pinning their hopes for survival on a get-out-the-vote effort that Democrats acknowledge they cannot match.

Republican strategists are quick to point out that a superior GOTV operation is unlikely, on its own, to salvage races in which their candidate is trailing by even as little as 3 points.

But for those races in which the Republican is within 2 points or less, they argue that an effective ground game could be the difference between victory and defeat. And they believe their superior turnout operation may help them overcome a sense among pundits that the Republican base will be depressed on Election Day, literally and figuratively.

Democrats — who also trail the GOP in cash on hand — have moved to stem the disadvantage in key battlegrounds, spending millions to create statewide voter files in Missouri and Montana while engineering a coordinated ground game attack in key House districts in Ohio, Pennsylvania and other contested states. Also, the AFL-CIO and MoveOn.org have said they'll spend a combined $52 million on GOTV on the Democrats' behalf.

Equally important, the Democrats expect their base voters to be far more motivated than the GOP's, helping to blunt whatever tactical advantage the Republicans may have.

"People want change. They don't want a rubber-stamp Congress. It's helping us dramatically," Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) said Sunday on CBS' "Face the Nation."

Still, nothing Democrats and their surrogates do on the turnout front is likely to match the breadth and scope of a nationwide GOP voter-turnout machine engineered by the Republican National Committee.

Developed in part by Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman following the 2000 elections and repeatedly refined since then, the plan is implemented through millions of volunteers on the ground, under the supervision of paid party leaders at the state, county and precinct levels.

"In an off-year election, the ground game is extraordinarily important," said Republican pollster David Winston, who also is a contributing writer for Roll Call. "What Ken Mehlman has done at the RNC is make sure we keep a strategic edge in terms of our ability to conduct a ground game."

According to the most recent polls, there are at least two Senate races — Missouri and Tennessee — and several House contests (including those in Connecticut, Florida and Indiana, to name a few) where the RNC-run ground war could be the key to GOP chances of maintaining its grip on Capitol Hill.

The Republican operation is credited with pushing now-Rep. Brian Bilbray (R) over the finish line against college lecturer Francine Busby (D) in a June 6 special election in California's 50th district, and pulling Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) past Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey (R) in the Sept. 12 primary. Vigorously disputing suggestions that their base is dispirited, the RNC noted its operatives have made 14 million voter contacts this year — 7 million since Labor Day — surpassing the level of engagement it enjoyed during the same period in 2004.

Campaign aides for Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.), who is trying to hold off state Auditor Claire McCaskill (D) in a neck-and-neck Senate race, said the GOP ground game in the Show Me State is larger this cycle than it was in 2004 — at least based on the number of volunteers on the ground and voter contacts. Bush won Missouri in 2004 by 7 points.

"Everyone has written us off, but races are still close enough for [the ground game] to make a difference," said one Republican strategist with intimate knowledge of the RNC's effort. "We're ahead in some races people think we're behind in."

But the Democrats, believing the playing field is expanding as Nov. 7 approaches, are hardly conceding the ground war to Republicans.

Particularly in their efforts to take control of the House, the Democrats are planning a strong ground game in some districts that they believe might surprise the Republicans, including Ohio's 2nd district — where physician Victoria Wulsin (D) is battling Rep. Jean Schmidt (R) — and Colorado's 4th district, where Rep. Marilyn Musgrave (R) is facing state Rep. Angie Paccione (D).

Democratic strategists say the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is on track to spent $10 million on GOTV, with another $2.4 million thrown at the effort courtesy of the Democratic National Committee. The DSCC is spending around $20 million on GOTV this cycle in an effort that began at the cycle's outset, with Schumer allocating money to beef up state parties in 15 states where he anticipated competitive Senate races (the playing field has shrunk since then).

Schumer also prioritized targeting rural and exurban districts that have predominantly voted Republican in recent cycles but that polling data indicated were open to voting for Democrats. Voters in these regions have been identified and to date have been contacted dozens of times, said one Democratic strategist.

"The biggest advantage [Republicans] have is that they have so much money to throw at it," said a second Democratic strategist familiar with the Democrats' ground game plans, acknowledging that the RNC's GOTV operation is the more advanced of the two.

The Republicans' ground game consists of three key elements.

• Complete coordination: Because the GOP turnout effort is run by the party, the White House, the RNC and House and Senate campaign committees can coordinate with each other and every one of their candidates.

The Democrats, because they are still partly reliant on surrogates like the AFL-CIO for GOTV, cannot necessarily be as tactically efficient as the Republicans.

• Technology: All voter contact information gathered by Republican volunteers is entered into the "Voter Vault" data system for review by party operatives at all levels. Since 2004, entering the information gathered on a voter's characteristics has become more efficient, with the latest data available the same day it is gathered, rather than 24 hours or more following the contact. This allows the GOP to adjust to changing conditions on the ground at an even faster pace.

The relevant information gathered on voters includes whether they vote absentee or on Election Day and what their key issue is, so that the contacts made — whether via telephone, direct mail or in person — are focused on that subject. This information was formerly entered manually; this cycle it's all scanned in on bubble sheets that look similar to the answer sheets used on standardized tests.

• Local volunteers: As with any large-scale GOTV operation, the RNC ships paid staffers and unpaid volunteers to the states and districts that are most in need. But the committee's GOTV strategy regarding voter contacts involves relying on locally based volunteers, the theory being that voters respond more favorably to their friends and neighbors than to strangers.

The 72 Hour Program, which focuses on turning voters out to the polls during the campaign's final three days, also is considered vital to the Republican effort.

Without having the issues or the political environment on their side, however, the Republican ground game might not count for much. Polls show a majority of voters are unhappy with Bush's conduct of the Iraq War and suggest that Democrats might be more motivated to turnout and send a message to Bush than Republicans are to vote their majority back into power.

Democrats claim what could be a critical advantage here, saying unhappiness with the Bush administration combined with a desire for change in Washington, D.C., translate into the political fuel needed to make the turnout engine go. But they also took concrete steps to lessen the advantage Republicans had on the ground in 2004.

They reviewed data from specific voter precincts in targeted states, and they expanded their target area from traditional Democratic strongholds like large metropolitan cities to include Republican leaning suburbs, small towns and rural areas that suggested the population was open to voting Democrat. At the DSCC, Schumer funneled money to build state party organizations, establishing benchmarks to ensure the money wasn't wasted.

"We've worked very closely with the state parties to make sure the financing is there and that the actual work is getting done," a Democratic strategist familiar with the DSCC's efforts said. "We're obviously cognizant of the Republican turnout efforts from years past, but we think we'll be turning some heads ourselves."

Democrats Urge Their Flush Candidates To Share The Wealth (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 23 — The balance in the campaign account of Representative Martin T. Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts, is $4,886,325. It is a muscular sum for a member of the House, and ordinarily it would be hailed as an exhibit of fund-raising savvy.

But in a stream of telephone calls to his offices on Monday, otherwise admiring Democratic constituents had another word for Mr. Meehan: cheap.

With Democrats increasingly convinced that House control is within their grasp, party activists are publicly excoriating politicians in safe districts who have hefty campaign balances. Mr. Meehan, easily re-elected two years ago with 67 percent of the vote, is at the top of a new list being circulated by Democratic bloggers.

"If he's sitting on all that money, I think he ought to share," said Sue Stafford, 61, a college professor from Andover, Mass., who is one of Mr. Meehan's longtime supporters. "It would be a shame to lose because we don't have enough money."

The not-so-gentle campaign to nudge Democrats — or, in many cases, shame them — into contributing more money to the party is another way bloggers are producing a collision between the old world of politics and the new. Gone are the days when politicians could quietly squirrel away campaign money for that next big election.

Across the country on Monday, Ms. Stafford and thousands of other people received an e-mail message from the liberal-leaning MoveOn.org asking them to urge their representatives to help less fortunate Democratic candidates who now see a chance to win seats previously considered beyond their reach.

Mr. Meehan, who has amassed nearly $5 million for a possible run for the Senate, has contributed $355,000 to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee this year. "He is as committed as anyone," said his spokeswoman, Sandra Salstrom, "to having Democratic control of the House on Nov. 7."

But though Mr. Meehan has been appearing at events and vigorously campaigning for other candidates, he has no immediate intention of giving more money, Ms. Salstrom said.

Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the Democratic presidential nominee in 2004, came under fire last week when it was pointed out that he had contributed only $15,000 this year to the party's senatorial committee. Heyjohn.org, whose creator has remained anonymous, highlights the fact that Mr. Kerry has $14 million in his campaign accounts.

Dismissing the criticism, his spokesman, David Wade, said Mr. Kerry had contributed $2.8 million to campaign committees, state parties and individual candidates in this election cycle. And in appearances across the country and in Internet appeals, Mr. Wade said, the senator has helped raise about $7 million for candidates.

"Cowards can hide behind anonymous Web sites," Mr. Wade said, "but Democrats out in the country, party leaders and real net-roots activists know how hard John Kerry has fought to win these elections."

It is members of the House, though, who were drawing the most ire from the party faithful on Monday. At least 70 Democratic members of Congress face either no opponent or a nominal Republican challenger, and that was enough to earn them a position on a list of candidates that organizers say will reach 100,000 people by week's end.

MoveOn.org's goal is to get each member of Congress who has at least $200,000 in the campaign account and who does not face a competitive challenge to give 30 percent to other races. MoveOn members are receiving personalized e-mail messages complete with the telephone number of their representative and the amount of money in that candidate's account. Six instructions accompany the e-mail request, including, "Be polite."

Eli Pariser, executive director of MoveOn.org, said of the well-off candidates, "It's one of those moments when they need to put the interest of their party ahead of their own personal ambitions."

Chris Bowers, who writes for the popular political blog MyDD.com, conceived the idea that MoveOn adopted. It was an outgrowth of an online discussion about how Democrats were considering taking out a loan of up to $10 million to challenge Republicans in seats that once did not appear competitive.

"This is an extraordinary election cycle," Mr. Bowers said. "By challenging every seat, we actually stretch Republican resources so thin that we could swing the election."

By the close of business on Monday, organizers said, only Representative Barney Frank of Massachusetts had agreed to contribute 30 percent of his campaign balance, which would amount to nearly $74,000. But other members of Congress, the organizers said, are considering answering the appeal.

"Instead of a small map, we are dealing with a much larger map," said Sarah Feinberg, a spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "The issue now is making sure we have the resources to play in as many races that are up for grabs."

Clinton Says Rival In 'Swampy Territory' (AP-Y)

By Marc Humbert, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0085559

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton accused her Republican challenger of getting into "swampy territory" after he was quoted Monday as saying that Clinton was unattractive when she was younger and that she had a lot of work done on herself. John Spencer denied discussing the senator's looks during a conversation with a New York Daily News reporter.

The tabloid quoted Spencer as saying: "You ever see a picture of her back then? Whew. I don't know why Bill married her."

Spencer, former mayor of the New York City suburb of Yonkers, was also quoted as saying that Clinton underwent millions of dollars of "work" and "looks good now."

During a campaign stop at a senior citizens center in Watervliet, just outside Albany, Clinton said: "It's unfortunate that when you don't have anything positive to say about the issues that we can get off in some pretty swampy territory."

After the newspaper came out, Spencer said the comments were "a fabrication. I would never call Hillary Clinton ugly. That's outrageous. I didn't do it."

The reporter, Ben Smith, spoke with Spencer during a flight Friday from New York City to Rochester. He told the AP that Spencer made the comments as Spencer, his wife and Smith sat together. He said he did not tape-record the comments but took notes on his Blackberry.

Clinton adviser Howard Wolfson said Clinton has had no plastic surgery or similar appearance-enhancing work.

"I'm not sure what's worse, that Mr. Spencer made these insulting comments or that instead of owning up and apologizing for them, he is lying about them," Wolfson added. "Either way, it's clear that he is unfit for the U.S. Senate."

Clinton joked with reporters during her stop in Watervliet that "my high-school picture was cute." It was also on the tabloid's front page.

Polls have shown Clinton, 58, far ahead of the craggy-faced, 59-year-old Spencer in the Senate race.

Opponent Is Put On The Spot Over Remarks About Clinton (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

The two recent debates between Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton and her Republican opponent, John Spencer, may have lacked fireworks. Yesterday, however, the race was set astir by remarks that Mr. Spencer reportedly made before the first debate — comments about Mrs. Clinton's sexuality and physical appearance. .

The commotion started yesterday when The Daily News ran a front-page headline, "Getting Ugly," and reported that Mr. Spencer had claimed that Mrs. Clinton had undergone, in the newspaper's words, "millions in surgery to make her pretty."

The article then quoted derisive comments by Mr. Spencer about the way she looked when she was much younger, including, "I don't know why Bill married her," a reference to former President Bill Clinton.

Mr. Spencer angrily called the report a "complete fabrication" yesterday. He acknowledged that he had talked about how different she looked now and about her changing style. But he said it was in the context of "everyone looking different." He denied saying anything about plastic surgery or questioning Mr. Clinton's marital judgment.

That did not stop Mrs. Clinton from criticizing the comments attributed to Mr. Spencer.

"It's unfortunate that when you don't have anything positive to say about the issues that we can get off in some pretty swampy territory," she said yesterday during a campaign stop outside Albany.

Ben Smith, the Daily News reporter who wrote the article, stood by his account. He said he took notes on his BlackBerry. By chance, the candidate and the reporter were seated in the same row, one seat apart, on a JetBlue flight from New York to Rochester on Friday morning before the first debate. Both Mr. Smith and Mr. Spencer said it was a casual conversation that hit on many topics.

Last night, meanwhile, a columnist for The Journal News in Westchester County said that Mr. Spencer made an off-color remark about Mrs. Clinton's sexuality.

The columnist, Phil Reisman, said that he asked Mr. Spencer by telephone last week if he would use the debates to try to paint Mrs. Clinton as a liberal. "He said words to the effect of, 'Well, you know me, words slip out, but I won't call her a lesbian or anything,' " Mr. Reisman said. "He was definitely joking — he laughed after he said it."

DOJ_NMG_0085560

Asked about the “lesbian” remark, Rob Ryan, Mr. Spencer’s spokesman, said, “As John Spencer said this afternoon, if he offended anyone, he apologizes.”

Mining Midterms For Clues To '08 Field (WSJ)

By Christoper Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

BOSTON -- In a state with a legacy of racial tension, Deval Patrick looks poised to become the nation's second black governor ever popularly elected, and to regain the left-leaning commonwealth for the Democrats.

His strategy: tying his opponent not to President Bush but to her political patron, sitting Gov. Mitt Romney, whose politics are moving rightward in preparation for a presidential run.

Lt. Gov Kerry Healey has been running negative ads, even as she claims that she is closer to Mr. Patrick than Mr. Romney on some issues. "Deval and I have some things in common: We both support choice, we both support stem-cell research," Ms. Healey said at a recent debate here. Mr. Romney is opposed to both, and has become more outspokenly so.

Mr. Romney, who declined to seek re-election, is exploring a bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination. In recent months, he has barnstormed the country speaking to conservative groups. Along the way, Mr. Romney has tailored his appeal to core Republican supporters, including conservative Christians who are kingmakers in the presidential nomination process -- and often have a different worldview from the constituents Mr. Romney had to win over in his home state.

The Romney overhang in the Massachusetts governor's race is just one example of how the 2006 election season has begun to define the 2008 presidential contest. A big reason: This will be the first presidential race in decades with no heir-apparent in either party. Jockeying among Republicans and Democrats has begun early, and candidates have sought to use the midterm races to establish a position for when the political spotlight shifts to the White House contest.

Sens. George Allen of Virginia and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York are both considering presidential runs and both are on the ballot this year in re-election races. A recent comment by Mr. Allen that some perceived as racist has called into question his electability, while Mrs. Clinton's easy Senate re-election bid has given her a massive war chest that may scare off rivals. Illinois Democratic Sen. Barack Obama isn't standing for election but is campaigning for others in a possible test for a presidential run.

For Mr. Romney, a one-term governor with no prior political experience, Ms. Healey's fortunes may speak volumes about his ability to leave a legacy or rally a political base.

Mr. Romney's out-of-state travel has done little to bolster his popularity in Massachusetts, and Mr. Patrick has moved to exploit this, primarily by trying to bind Ms. Healey to the governor in the eyes of voters, even as he tears down Mr. Romney. Last week the Patrick campaign released a list of insults it says Mr. Romney has hurled at the state while traveling. Among them was his statement to a South Carolina group in late 2005 that being a conservative governor in Massachusetts "is a bit like being a cattle rancher at a vegetarian convention." Mr. Romney also has said that if he had to do it all over again, he might have run for governor in Michigan instead of Massachusetts.

Eric Fehrnstrom, a spokesman for Mr. Romney, said the governor didn't sully the state. "Sometimes Democrats confuse criticism of Democratic policies with criticism of the state of Massachusetts, " Mr. Fehrnstrom said. "Gov. Romney loves the state of Massachusetts."

More subtly, Mr. Patrick has stopped using Ms. Healey's full name at many campaign events, favoring instead "the Romney-Healey administration." Mr. Patrick's staff says only Mr. Romney has a more unfavorable rating with voters than Ms. Healey, who was viewed negatively by 42% of voters in a recent poll. "That's why we make it a point on the stump to always say 'the Romney-Healey administration' when we talk about her," said Richard Chacón, Mr. Patrick's spokesman.

A recent television ad from Mr. Patrick's campaign featured big pictures of Mr. Romney and Ms. Healey while an announcer reeled off complaints about their administration: increased property taxes; police layoffs; job losses and the tunnel collapse in the Big Dig, a massive highway project that has been under construction for years.

Ms. Healey, aiming to become the first female governor of Massachusetts, has shied from having Mr. Romney accompany her on the campaign trail, though Mr. Fehrnstrom said the governor is willing to do whatever is asked of him. "The extent of Gov. Romney's involvement in Kerry Healey's campaign will be determined by Kerry Healey," he said. So far, he said, the extent of Mr. Romney's participation has been "fund-raising behind the scenes."

Ms. Healey's staff says that she doesn't share all of Mr. Romney's political views. In the recent debate at Faneuil Hall, Ms. Healey was challenged to rebuke Mr. Romney for the supposed insults he has directed toward the state. She declined to do so, to boos from the audience.

Mr. Patrick, a political newcomer, appears to have the race well in hand, unlike two other black gubernatorial hopefuls this year -- Kenneth Blackwell in Ohio and Lynn Swann in Pennsylvania, both Republicans, who trail their opponents in polls. If any one of the three wins, he will become the first post-Reconstruction black governor in the nation since Douglas Wilder took the Virginia governor's mansion in 1989.

But before Mr. Patrick can claim victory, he has to fend off a withering campaign by Ms. Healey, who increasingly emphasizes law-and-order issues -- and is trying to turn Mr. Patrick's professional experience against him.

Mr. Patrick is a former lawyer for Coca-Cola Co. and Texaco Inc., and a top federal prosecutor in the Clinton administration. But Ms. Healey has focused on two events -- Mr. Patrick's defense of a convicted Florida cop-killer while he served as a staff lawyer for the NAACP, and his advocacy for a Massachusetts man who has long held that he was unjustly convicted of raping a 59-year-old grandmother in 1983.

The convicted rapist is a man named Benjamin LaGuer, and Mr. Patrick wasn't the only Massachusetts citizen who has taken up his cause over the years. In 1998 and 2000, Mr. Patrick wrote letters of support for Mr. LaGuer and donated to a legal fund to secure a DNA test for the convict. When the test subsequently linked Mr. LaGuer more firmly to the crime, Mr. Patrick, along with other prominent citizens in the state, dropped his support.

Mr. Patrick was slow to acknowledge his advocacy of Mr. LaGuer, which was revealed by the Boston Globe in early October. Ms. Healey reacted with a new campaign ad, featuring grainy footage of a woman walking through a deserted parking garage, using Mr. Patrick's own words to describe the convicted rapist: "He is eloquent, and he is thoughtful; there's no doubt about that," Mr. Patrick said. The narrator then asks "Have you ever heard a woman compliment a rapist?" Mr. Patrick, the ad concluded, "should be ashamed, not governor."

Mr. Patrick, whose campaign initially disclosed writing only one letter on Mr. LaGuer's behalf, said he should have researched the record before speaking.

"I apologize to anyone who feels we didn't come forward with all the facts," he said. "We screwed up in terms of how we have handled doing the homework before we answered questions about this issue, no question about that. And I take the responsibility for that."

Obama Offers More Variations From The Norm (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

PHOENIX, Oct. 23 — Senator Barack Obama, the Illinois Democrat who said Sunday that he was considering running for president in 2008, created a little sunlight on Monday between himself and both Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton.

For one thing, he said that as a youth he had inhaled.

“When I was a kid, I inhaled,” Mr. Obama said here to an audience of magazine editors. “That was the point.”

The direct admission was in contrast to Mr. Clinton’s denial in his 1992 campaign for president that he had smoked marijuana.

“I didn’t inhale,” Mr. Clinton said, cementing the idea that he liked to have things both ways.

Mr. Obama had written in his first book, “Dreams From My Father” (1995), before entering politics, that he had used marijuana and cocaine (“maybe a little blow”). He said he had not tried heroin because he did not like the pusher who was trying to sell it to him.

DOJ_NMG_0085562

In an interview here on Monday conducted by David Remnick, editor of The New Yorker, at a meeting of the American Society of Magazine Editors, Mr. Obama said he was not making light of the subject.

"It was reflective of the struggles and confusion of a teenage boy," he said. "Teenage boys are frequently confused."

Since Mr. Clinton's statement, the question of drug use has become a standard one for politicians, sometimes as a test of their ability to be straightforward. If the politician has used drugs, conventional wisdom says it is best to try to get the question out of the way early.

Mr. Remnick also asked Mr. Obama for his views about Mrs. Clinton, the New York Democrat who has been a dominant figure in discussions about potential presidential candidates in 2008. Mr. Obama praised her but made clear that he did not agree with her vote for the Iraq war.

"I think very highly of Hillary," he said. "The more I get to know her, the more I admire her. I think she's one of the most disciplined people I know. She's one of the toughest. She's got an extraordinary intelligence, and she's somebody who's in this stuff for the right reasons. She's passionate about moving the country forward on issues like health care and children."

But, he said, they clearly had "different assessments" about the wisdom of going to war in Iraq. Perhaps mindful that he could end up as her vice-presidential running mate, he added that he had it easier because he was not in the Senate at the time, while she had to vote.

Asked how he might campaign against her in a primary, he said he had not thought about that.

But he did sound like a candidate in criticizing the Bush administration in somewhat stronger terms than he has in the past. He called it "the most ideologically driven administration in my memory" and said it was "obstinate in resisting facts," as well as dissent and compromise.

"This administration has done great damage to this country," he said, citing the Iraq war as the chief reason.

Why Not Obama? (WP)

By Richard Cohen

Ancient Rome had a term for a certain political process: cursus honorum , the honors race. It was, I am told by Anthony Everitt in his new biography, "Augustus," the process by which politicians moved up the ladder. Along the way, they were evaluated until, finally, some made it to the top. Nowadays, the system is different. All you have to do is appear on "Oprah."

I am referring, obviously and insidiously, to Barack Obama, who announced Sunday that he might run for president. This followed, of course, the aforementioned appearance on "Oprah" which I, diligent in pursuit of truth, watched. This is how I learned that Obama loves his wife and she loves him and they both love their children. Cursus honorum this is not.

Life itself -- its hard lessons -- cautions me to look with consummate cynicism on the Obama trial balloon. After all, the man has been in the United States Senate for a mere two years, and before that he served -- with distinction, we are told -- in the Illinois legislature, where, it seems, just staying out of jail is distinction enough. We know little about Obama's political performance, since he has performed so little. He is only 45, which is about the age of some of my suits. On the world stage, he would be a child.

And yet I cheer his announcement that he might announce he is going to announce -- something like that. I say this not just because I have been following his career out of the corner of my eye -- my, my, ain't he a natural! -- but because I've actually been reading his speeches. The one he gave on the role of religion in politics was as smart a speech as I've ever read. It's the sort of thing John F. Kennedy could have given, only his would have been written by someone else, probably Ted Sorensen.

I cheer also because Obama is an African American -- an African father, an American mother. For someone like him to be a presidential candidate -- maybe even president -- says oodles about this country. After eight years of George W. Bush and his narcissistic foreign policy -- me, me, us, us -- it would be great to have a president who presents a different message just by his complexion and who compensates, if anything can, for how Iraq has tarnished America's reputation, particularly in the Third World.

But mostly I want Obama to run because he would come into the race with no baggage on Iraq. Not from him would we hear excuses about how he was misled by the Bush administration into thinking there were weapons of mass destruction there.

Obama not only was against the war when he ran for the Senate but he can claim -- as could the 21 Democratic senators who voted against the war resolution -- that it was possible to accept the "facts" at the time and still see that the war was unnecessary, if not downright stupid. It just makes me wince every time I hear John Kerry or John Edwards or Joe Biden or Chris Dodd or Hillary Clinton say they were misled, fooled, lied to or some other version of seduced and abandoned -- otherwise they would have voted the right way. This is disingenuous.

It can be no coincidence that so many of the Democrats who voted to authorize Bush to go to war had the White House on their minds. It can be no coincidence, either, that with the technical exception of Russ Feingold, none of the Democrats who voted against the resolution are presidential hopefuls. Take, for instance, Carl Levin of Michigan. To read his statements from the time (September and October 2002) is to see someone who accepted that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction but still saw no immediate need for war -- especially not without widespread international support. Levin, in retrospect, had it about right. The others (not to mention myself) did not.

In some respects -- in the Roman way of cursus honorum -- an Obama candidacy would be a joke. He has no executive experience, and I don't know -- neither does he -- if he can make a decision. But if he could sharpen the focus of the other candidates about Iraq, if he could somehow disengage the United States from Iraq -- if he could, in other words, stop wasting American (and other) lives -- then his candidacy would hardly be an insult to the system, as some insist, but a gift.

Treasury Chief Keeps Eyes On The Money, Feet Off The Campaign Trail (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Let's take a look at Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr.'s public calendar for this week:

Oct. 23: Unveiling of Currency with New Signature, Bureau of Engraving and Printing, 14th and C Streets SW.

The end.

That's right: While Republicans pounded the campaign trail, struggling to keep their majority in the Nov. 7 midterm elections, Paulson strolled along a production line at the bureau yesterday, watching $20 bills bearing his signature roll off the presses.

According to a Bloomberg News report yesterday, Paulson, unlike his campaign-friendly predecessor, John W. Snow, aims to stay off the stump and in the office, despite the polls. Bloomberg cites a former Bush administration official and another person involved in recruiting Paulson as saying that the White House agreed he would not have to make campaign speeches.

Paulson, 60, a former chairman of Goldman Sachs, took his post in July. Since then, he has confined his out-of-town visits to the financial centers of Chicago and New York, the Bloomberg report says.

Paulson spokeswoman Brookly McLaughlin confirmed that her boss "believes the Treasury secretary should not participate in partisan political activities."

Typically, the secretaries of state and defense and the attorney general don't take part in political campaigns. Other high-level officials have been known to shimmy out of campaign duty as well, citing the appearance of impropriety. But with Democrats poised to win the 15 seats needed to seize a House majority and, perhaps, even the six needed to control the Senate, some Republicans may find it tough to justify keeping the Treasury secretary off the campaign trail -- especially with the administration trying so hard to tout its economic record to voters. But leave it to a financial guru to hedge against changes in fortune.

Paulson seems set to let that record stand for now.

Ballot Measures Propose Limits On Judicial Authority (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

DOJ_NMG_0085564

DENVER -- Western conservatives are gunning for the judiciary this election year with a half-dozen ballot measures that would rope in the authority of what they describe as activist judges.

Case in point is Colorado, where former state Senate leader John Andrews tried for years to solve the problem of activist judges who he said routinely legislated from the bench, often at the expense of conservatives.

His efforts in the legislature fell short, but Mr. Andrews isn't finished. He is the prime mover behind Amendment 40, a proposed constitutional amendment that would limit state appellate judges to 10-year terms, making Colorado the first state to limit the office of top-tier judges.

"We see a pattern of ideological and political decisions from the bench, and it points to a consistent tendency of appellate judges in Colorado to rewrite the law," said Mr. Andrews, now a fellow with the Claremont Institute, after a press conference yesterday at the state Capitol.

Amendment 40 faces overwhelming opposition of the state's legal and political establishment. It is opposed by virtually every top lawmaker in the state, including Republican Gov. Bill Owens, Republican Attorney General John Suthers, and former Democratic Govs. Richard Lamm and Roy Romer. The state's leading newspapers have also editorialized against the proposal.

They argue that Amendment 40 would force out good judges, create judicial backlogs and empower governors to stack the courts with partisan picks. The measure would result in a one-time retroactive removal of five Supreme Court judges and seven appellate court judges in 2009, which critics say would deprive the courts of decades of experience.

"This is a misguided measure that would be devastating to Colorado courts," Mr. Suthers said. "Because it is retroactive, a majority of Colorado's justices and judges will be kicked off the bench. This will be bad for Colorado citizens and the judiciary."

Mr. Andrews insists the measure is not an extreme solution, noting that most justices leave the state Supreme Court after less than 10 years anyway.

"This is more of a safeguard against those judges who say they can stay around forever, rather than a radical restructuring of the judiciary," Mr. Andrews said. "At the same time, it's partly symbolic. It sends a message that people are fed up with lawmaking from the bench. Such a rebuke would be felt in Colorado but also other states."

A truly radical solution would be Amendment E, the South Dakota proposal that would eliminate judicial immunity and allow citizens to sue judges. Known as "Jail 4 Judges," the measure would clear the path for lawsuits for offenses that include "blocking of a lawful conclusion of a case."

In Montana, voters will decide whether to approve CI-98, a measure that would allow residents to recall justices or judges for "any reason" and says removal from office is "a political question answered solely by ... the recall election." Judges now may be recalled only for reasons such as mental incompetence and official misconduct.

An Oregon amendment would require appellate judges to be elected from newly created geographic districts in an effort to give the state's more conservative rural areas greater representation on the state's liberal-leaning courts.

In Colorado, a local television poll conducted last month found Amendment 40 leading 55 percent to 40 percent, despite the efforts of the better-financed opposition campaign. Mr. Andrews points to a series of court rulings, most recently the state Supreme Court's decision to disqualify a ballot measure that would have denied non-emergency state services to illegal aliens.

Even though he expects to be outspent by at least 3-to-1 in the campaign's final weeks, Mr. Andrews says he is convinced most voters will respond positively to the idea of reining in the judiciary.

"The story with term limits in Colorado has been that the establishment is always against them and the people always support them," he said.

Reducing Uninsured Seen As Top Health-Care Issue, Poll Finds (WSJ)

By Beckey Bright

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

Americans say reducing the percentage of uninsured in the U.S. is a top priority for government to address over the next two years, a WSJ.com/Harris poll shows. But many lack confidence in either party's ability to tackle this and other health-care issues.

The Oct. 8-10 poll, which asked U.S. adults to consider a range of health-care issues, found 42% feel "reducing the percentage of Americans without health insurance," is one of the top two health-care issues. Other health-care issues that ranked high in importance were Medicare reform (28%) and containing out-of-pocket costs for health-care services (26%).

Most Americans contend that health-care issues will be important, but not as important as other issues, in determining how they vote in the November elections, the poll found.

A plurality of those polled believe by a two or three to one margin that the eight health-care issues listed would be handled better by the Democrats than by the Republicans. For example, 37% of respondents said Democrats are likely to do a better job of reducing the percentage of uninsured, while 11% see Republicans as more adept. However, nearly a third of 2,384 adults in the online poll don't believe there's a difference in either party's ability to address this issue and 22% aren't sure.

While most Democrats are confident in their party's ability to do a better job when it comes to health-care issues, most Republicans and Independents lack confidence or are uncertain that either party can do a better job of handling any of these issues.

Here are full results of the poll: "Which of the following statements best describes your views about the Nov. 7 elections?"

Base: All adults

Note: Percentages may not add up to exactly 100% due to rounding. * * * "Which two of these do you think are the most important issues for government to address over the next two years?"

Base: All adults * * * "Which political party do you think is likely to do a better job handling the following components of the U.S. health-care system after the elections on Nov. 7?"

Base: All adults

Note: Percentages may not add up to exactly 100% due to rounding.

Methodology:

Harris Interactive conducted this online survey in the U.S., between Oct. 16 and 18, 2006, among a nationwide cross section of 2,384 adults. Figures for age, gender, race/ethnicity, education, income and region were weighted where necessary to align with population proportions. Propensity score weighting was also used to adjust for respondents' propensity to be online. In theory, with probability samples of this size, one can say with 95% certainty that the overall results have a sampling error of +/- 3 percentage points of what they would be if the entire U.S. adult population had been polled with complete accuracy. This online sample is not a probability sample.

Officer Struck By 2nd Circuit Judge While Directing Traffic Dies (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, October 24, 2006

A New Haven, Conn., police officer died Saturday, four days after being struck by a sport utility vehicle driven by a federal judge, the mayor said.

Officer Dan Picagli, a 17-year veteran of the force, was hit while directing traffic in the rain Tuesday night. He had been wearing a black raincoat and a reflective vest.

The SUV was driven by John M. Walker Jr., a senior judge on the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York, who maintains court chambers in New Haven. He was leaving work when the accident happened, police said.

No charges have been filed.

Police Chief Francisco Ortiz said the accident remained under investigation, but officers did not feel it was necessary to test Walker for drugs or alcohol.

Walker, 65, voluntarily stepped down this month as chief judge of the court. He was appointed to the court in 1989 by President George H.W. Bush, who is a cousin of the judge.

DOJ_NMG_0085566

"Officer Picagli was more than a cop," Mayor John DeStefano said in a statement Saturday. "He was someone who brought people together, who created a sense of community. He was a life enhancer to all with whom he came in contact. More than any memorial, his basic decency will keep his memory vibrant in our city."

Generation Y Gets Involved (USAT)

By Sharon Jayson

USA Today, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — Alex Wells switched shampoos over animal testing. She won't buy clothes produced by child labor. She yells at those who don't recycle. She spent a month in India this summer teaching English to preschoolers. Last year in high school, she helped organize a protest over genocide in the Sudan that raised $13,000 for Darfur relief.

Wells, 18, of Los Gatos, Calif., may be pretty typical of her generation. A growing body of academic and market research suggests millennials — who are in their mid-20s and younger — are civic-minded and socially conscious as individuals, consumers and employees. This generation, also known as Generation Y and Echo Boomers, has been pressed for its vote, sought for its purchasing power and watched closely by sociologists and historians for insight into the way its members will shape the future.

They may be less radical than baby boom activists in the 1960s and 1970s, whose demonstrations for civil rights, women's equality and protecting the environment and protests against the Vietnam War became flashpoints for their times. But thanks in large part to the Internet, this generation is much more aware of the world. And because national tragedies such as the 9/11 terrorist attacks and Hurricane Katrina have scarred their youth and adolescence, experts see signs these young people are creating their own brand of social consciousness.

Among the indicators:

Sixty-one percent of 13- to 25-year-olds feel personally responsible for making a difference in the world, suggests a survey of 1,800 young people to be released today. It says 81% have volunteered in the past year; 69% consider a company's social and environmental commitment when deciding where to shop; and 83% will trust a company more if it is socially and environmentally responsible. The online study — by two Boston-based companies, Cone Inc. and AMP Insights — suggests millennials are "the most socially conscious consumers to date."

•Young people want to help their country by working for the government, suggests another study, also to be released today by the international consulting firm Universum Communications. Based on responses of 10,847 undergraduates at 115 U.S. colleges and universities, it found that among ethnic groups in particular, federal jobs hold great allure. Among Hispanics, the CIA, the State Department and the FBI rank only below Walt Disney (the No. 1 choice) as an ideal employer. Among blacks, the FBI ranked second, the State Department fourth. The CIA rounded out the top 10.

•Volunteerism by college students increased by 20% from 2002 to 2005, says a study released last week by the federal Corporation for National and Community Service.

Some note, though, that many high schools require volunteering, and it has become a must-do for the college résumé.

"Most research on volunteering doesn't translate to political involvement," says Curtis Gans of American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate. Many of their parents don't vote or are "civically illiterate," he says. He adds that measurable declines in civic education, newspaper reading and knowledge of current events are other signs of a devaluing of civic involvement.

Harvard public policy professor Robert Putnam, whose 2000 book Bowling Alone is about the decline of civic engagement and social connection, says volunteering is class-driven. "This whole recent spurt is largely concentrated among kids of the upper middle class. … The have-nots are actually more detached than before. I am hopeful that we may be on the cusp of a new more civically engaged America, but if that is all defined very sharply in terms of social class, then the news is not so good."

A report in September by the National Conference on Citizenship, and based on nationally representative data from 1975 to 2004, echoes Putnam's concerns. It suggests a "large and growing civic divide between those with a college education and those without one."

Voting is another concern. A survey of 650 young people ages 18-30 released last month by the non-partisan Young Voter Strategies, a non-profit project at George Washington University in Washington, D.C., found that 69% said they were likely to vote in November, and 80% said they were registered to vote. But another survey of 1,804 adults released last week by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press, in collaboration with the Associated Press, found that 40% of 18- to 29-year-olds are not registered to vote. That's double the percentage of 30- to 49-year-olds who aren't registered, and nearly three times greater than those 50 or older. Also, only 22% of young voters are regular voters compared with 42% of older voters and 35% of those 30 to 49.

Still, Putnam believes the terrorist attacks appear to have had a much more lasting effect on this generation's attitudes toward service. Though the surge in community-mindedness quickly evaporated for others, "for kids caught in their impressionable years by the events of 9/11, it has not yet gone away. They seem to have been permanently influenced."

Such students are those who come to Washington, D.C., for a semester at American University — dubbed the most politically active school in the Princeton Review's 2006 student survey.

Senior Kirsten Reed, 20, a political science major at the University of Oregon in Eugene, wants to work for the federal government in national security. "I want to do something for the defense of the country," says Reed, of Pleasanton, Calif.

Brant Garda, a senior majoring in political science at Allegheny College in Meadville, Pa., wants to work with his state's struggling steel mining towns. "I want to be around to rejuvenate the area politically, economically or whatever," says Garda, 21, of Washington, Pa.

But not everyone in this generation shares such feelings, says a report released this month by the Center for Information & Research on Civic Learning & Engagement, based at the University of Maryland's School of Public Policy. The study of 1,658 young people, ages 15-25, measured their participation in 19 activities considered civic or political, such as being an active member of at least one group; raising money for charity; signing a paper petition or boycotting.

The study found that 58% of young people were considered "disengaged" because they participated in two or fewer of those 19 activities; 17% did none.

Elise Cochrane, 20, a junior majoring in psychology at the University of Northern Iowa in Cedar Falls, says she voted in the presidential election, but she is conflicted about voting in November. "The advertisements have been bashing each other so bad, none of the candidates seem to fit for me," she says. "I kind of wish I was more interested so I would know more of what was going on, but I'm not seriously interested in being a Republican or Democrat."

Because many millennials say they're not interested in politics, efforts are underway to encourage civic and political involvement.

A 2-year-old group called GenerationEngage is a non-partisan, youth civic engagement initiative aimed at college-age people who aren't students. It organizes events so that hundreds of young people can meet face-to-face and online with leaders and politicians, such as Al Gore and Newt Gingrich.

Those who aren't in school "don't suffer from a lack of interest; they suffer from a lack of access," says co-founder Adrian Talbot, 26.

A voter registration drive for 18- to 30-year-olds just wrapped up, and more than 400,000 young people registered.

The Cone study also found that young people are extending their social consciousness to the workplace. Of the 28% of ages 13 to 25 who are employed full time, 79% said they want to work for a company that cares about how it affects or contributes to society.

"If they're going to work many, many hours, they need to work in a place where they're doing some good," adds Claudia Tattanelli, CEO of Universum, which helps companies attract workers.

Although Wells is just a freshman, she is thinking ahead to her career. She hasn't yet selected a major, but she knows she wants her work to be meaningful.

"I want to major in something in international or humanitarian aid or in the environmental sciences," she says. "I want to do something that helps in a positive way."

First, Rename All The Lawyers (NYT)

By John Fabian Witt

IF a rose would smell as sweet by any other name, will trial lawyers smell better with a new one? That's the question posed by the impending self-reinvention of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America. After Election Day, the 65,000-member outfit whose lawyers brought us multibillion dollar settlements in cigarette cases, millions of asbestos injury claims and lawsuits over McDonald's coffee will change its name to the American Association for Justice.

There's already been much wry snickering about the organization's vaguely Orwellian new banner. But it's not the first time the kings of torts have changed their name, and it probably won't be the last. For a half-century now, trial lawyer identity crises have been exquisitely sensitive barometers of American politics.

In the late 1940's, a cadre of poorly paid and status-starved lawyers representing injured workers (the claimants) in the workers' compensation system banded together to form a lobby dedicated to the advancement of their own and their clients' interests. They called their group the National Association of Claimants' Compensation Attorneys.

That name worked for only a few short years. The problem was that the workers' compensation system was designed to streamline the resolution of worker injury cases by eliminating (or at least minimizing) lawyers' fees. Lawyers in the system therefore had little hope of gaining wealth or prestige. With the assistance of early association leaders like the flamboyant San Francisco lawyer Melvin Belli, the group's lawyers began to extend their expertise to personal injury cases in the courts, where the fees ran much higher and where their Perry Mason-like trial techniques might earn them a measure of respect.

In 1960, the association formalized its new outlook by changing its name to the National Association of Claimants' Counsel of America, a moniker that repositioned the group as one of lawyers for victims not just in the compensation system but also in the courts. Four years later, the organization renamed itself the American Trial Lawyers Association. By then its transformation was complete: the lawyers had left the compensation system behind altogether for the free-wheeling, high-risk and high-return world later made famous by Julia Roberts in "Erin Brockovich" and John Travolta in "A Civil Action."

But the 1964 name stuck for less than a decade. Another lawyer organization — the American College of Trial Lawyers — complained that the names were too similar. The defense lawyers in the college apparently worried that it would be tainted by nominal association with the lowly lawyers' group. In 1972, the American Trial Lawyers Association gave in to the litigation by the college and altered its name to the current (and now soon to be abandoned) Association of Trial Lawyers of America.

The trial lawyers' struggle for identity is a near-perfect parable for the course of American politics since the 1930's. In a political system long dominated by courts and political parties, Franklin Roosevelt and the New Dealers envisioned a new kind of federal government made up of administrative bureaucracies like workers' compensation, which would provide rationalized services to citizens.

After World War II, however, American politics slowly reverted to form: resistant to European-style public bureaucracy, shaped by powerful courts and the legal profession, and highly susceptible to the influence of interest groups and party politics.

As American politics has changed, so have the trial lawyers. They began as cogs in the wheels of the New Deal's bureaucratic machinery. They became legal entrepreneurs, identifying creative ways to produce higher awards for their clients in the courts and line their own pockets in the process. Thanks to mass torts cases arising out of things like cigarettes and asbestos, the association's membership includes some of the wealthiest lawyers in the country. And in the past two decades, the trial lawyers have become a crucial source of financial support for the Democratic Party.

The problem for the lawyers is that the genius of the tort system — its capacity to marshal the entrepreneurial energies of the bar — is also its greatest public relations liability. Indeed, whether trial lawyers are part of a distinctively American regulatory solution or part of a distinctively American problem, the new name seems unlikely to change the way Americans view them.

At KFC (né Kentucky Fried Chicken), the chicken is still fried. At Altria (né Philip Morris), the cigarettes still cause cancer. And at the American Association for Justice, some will say that the trial lawyers are still chasing ambulances.

U.N. Official Says Iran Is Testing New Enrichment Device (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 23 — The head of the International Atomic Energy Agency said Monday that Iran had begun testing new uranium enrichment equipment that could double the capacity of its small research-and-development facilities.

The action appears to be a signal to the United Nations Security Council that Iran would respond to sanctions by speeding ahead with its nuclear program.

Since February, when Iran publicly celebrated its first production of enriched uranium, progress at its main nuclear complex at Natanz has reportedly been slow. Iran has sporadically operated a single "cascade" of 164 centrifuges, the devices that spin at high speed and turn ordinary uranium into a fuel usable for nuclear power plants — or, at higher enrichment levels, nuclear weapons.

Those reports had prompted speculation that Iranian engineers had run into considerable technical difficulties.

But in an interview on Monday, Mohamed ElBaradei, the director general of the I.A.E.A., said that "based on our most recent inspections, the second centrifuge cascade is in place and ready to go." He said that no uranium had yet been entered into the new system, but could be as early as next week.

Even with two cascades running, it would take Iran years to enrich enough uranium to produce a single nuclear weapon.

The United States director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, has said repeatedly that he believes Tehran is 4 to 10 years away from developing a weapon, even though its technology base is far more advanced than that of North Korea, which conducted a nuclear test 15 days ago.

Unlike North Korea, Iran has insisted that it does not intend to build a weapon. Nonetheless, Iran ignored an Aug. 31 deadline, set by the Security Council, to stop enriching uranium.

Since then, European nations, China, Russia and the United States have been debating what sanctions, if any, should be imposed. China and Russia have resisted, and in a speech on Monday at Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service, Dr. ElBaradei made clear that he believes sanctions are unlikely to work.

"Penalizing them is not a solution," he said. "At the end of the day, we have to bite the bullet and talk to North Korea and Iran."

Unlike American officials, he says that he remains unpersuaded that Iran's ultimate goal is to build a weapon, though I.A.E.A. officials say they believe that Iran wants to have all of the major components of a weapon in hand so that it is clear that it could build one in weeks or months.

"The jury is still out on whether they are developing a nuclear weapon," Dr. ElBaradei said at Georgetown, after meeting earlier in the day with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

After the meeting, Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said there was now "widespread agreement, although not total agreement," on elements of an initial sanctions package. He did not speculate about when the sanctions might come to a vote; at the end of the summer, administration officials insisted that the Security Council would act in September.

Mr. McCormack said the Iranians seemed to be moving ahead "inexorably at this point," so that at some point "you will have industrial-scale production."

"You don't want that," he said.

Some European diplomats have expressed concern that, should the Security Council act, the moderates in the Iranian government who have been involved in negotiations over the nuclear program could be shoved aside, and that some combination of military leaders and hard-line mullahs would push the country to speed its nuclear production.

IAEA Head: Iran Close To Enriching Uranium (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

DOJ_NMG_0085570

Iran has taken another step in its ability to enrich uranium, the head of the U.N. atomic energy agency confirmed yesterday, as the Bush administration and European allies failed to reach agreement on sanctions against Tehran's expanding nuclear program.

Mohamed ElBaradei, the director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said that Iranian technicians had pieced together a second line, or cascade, of 164 centrifuges and are days away from using the cascade to enrich uranium.

"It's in place and ready to go," ElBaradei said in a brief interview yesterday.

European officials suggested that the new cascade is a political move by Iranian officials who are hoping to send a defiant message to the U.N. Security Council as it weighs possible sanctions.

It would take many years for the Iranians to produce bomb-grade uranium using the other 164-centrifuge cascade it is currently operating, and U.S. intelligence officials think that Tehran is at least four years away from gaining the technical capability to produce enough nuclear material for a single weapon. Since February, Iran has produced minuscule amounts of low-enriched uranium suitable for the energy program that the government says it wants, and not for bombs. The same cascades, if run longer and more efficiently, can produce bomb-grade uranium.

The Bush administration has dismissed the energy claims and thinks Iran intends to use the program to secretly build nuclear weapons. ElBaradei's inspectors, on their fourth year investigating in Iran, reported earlier this year that they were unable to determine whether the Iranian program is peaceful.

The United States backed a package of European incentives designed to coax Iran into negotiations if it suspended the nuclear program during talks. When Tehran did not respond to the offer, the Security Council stepped in and passed a resolution in August obligating Iran to halt the program and negotiate. The council threatened to impose sanctions if Iran balked.

Iran has since said it wants talks with China, Europe, Russia and the United States but will not suspend its nuclear work in advance, arguing instead that it is exercising its right to peaceful nuclear technology. Iran signed on to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty in the 1960s, forswearing nuclear weapons for sensitive technology that could be used for an energy program.

Yesterday, U.S. diplomats met with British and French negotiators to try to complete a draft resolution on sanctions that the rest of the council members, including China and Russia, would approve. The Bush administration had hoped to reach an agreement last Friday, but European officials said they were not comfortable with some of the tougher measures that the United States sought to impose.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said there was "widespread agreement, although not total agreement," among Britain, France and the United States on sanctions. European officials said privately that the resolution is likely to be limited to a ban on any nuclear or missile trade with Iran, while carving out an exception for a preexisting Iranian-Russian nuclear deal.

Some U.S. officials have been pushing for broader action, including travel bans and financial restrictions on people connected to the nuclear program.

Iran began its program in secret in 1987, with equipment and know-how from Pakistan's top nuclear scientist. The existence of the program, which includes a large facility in the town of Natanz built to house thousands of centrifuges, was made public in 2002 by Iranian exiles who hope to overthrow the country's clerical regime. The Pakistani scientist, Abdul Qadeer Khan, remains under house arrest in Pakistan, but the Pakistani government has refused to let U.S. officials directly question him about Iran's program or other programs he supplied in North Korea and Libya.

A senior Pakistani military official said yesterday that Khan responds to written U.S. requests for information as best he can. The Pakistani official, in Washington to lobby against a U.S. nuclear deal with rival India, said his country had put Khan and his black market network in the past and suggested it is time for the United States to also move beyond the episode.

Diplomats: Iran Expanding Enrichment (AP-Y)

By George Jahn

DOJ_NMG_0085571

Iran is expanding its uranium enrichment program even as the U.N. Security Council focuses on possible sanctions for its defiance of a demand to give up the activity and ease fears it seeks nuclear weapons, diplomats said Monday.

The diplomats, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to divulge the information to media, told The Associated Press that within the past few weeks Iranian nuclear experts had started up a second pilot enrichment facility.

While the 164 centrifuges were not producing enriched uranium, even the decision to "dry test" them showed Iran's defiance of the Security Council. The council had set an Aug. 31 deadline for Tehran to cease all experiments linked to enrichment. It may start full deliberations on sanctions as early as later this week.

Iran produced a small batch of low-enriched uranium — suitable as nuclear fuel but not weapons grade — in February, using its initial cascade of 164 centrifuges at its pilot plant at Natanz. The process of uranium enrichment can be used to generate electricity or to create an atomic weapon, depending on the level of enrichment.

Iran said it plans to install 3,000 centrifuges at its enrichment plant in Natanz, central Iran, by the end of this year. Industrial production of enriched uranium in Natanz would require 54,000 centrifuges.

Although it is nowhere near that goal, successful testing of other "cascades" would indicate that Tehran is slowly mastering the complexities of producing enriched uranium.

A U.N. official said that even a "dry-run" allows Tehran "to develop the technology, to make sure that things work."

Another U.N. official said Iran had the technical means to start the second cascade several months ago, but apparently had decided to wait until the recent collapse of EU attempts to revive negotiations on an enrichment freeze with the Islamic republic.

The International Atomic Energy Agency, which has taken the lead in probing Tehran's nuclear program since the existence of a clandestine enrichment program was revealed more than three years ago, could not be reached for comment and issued no official confirmation.

Ali Ashgar Soltanieh, the chief Iranian envoy to the IAEA, said he had no knowledge of "new developments" at Natanz. But he told the AP that all nuclear activities "are going on as planned."

In Tehran, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said his country's nuclear capability has increased tenfold despite Western pressure to roll back its atomic program, which Iran insists is peaceful.

"The enemies, resorting to propaganda, want to block us from achieving (nuclear technology)," Ahmadinejad told a crowd on the southern outskirts of Tehran. "But they should know that today, the capability of our nation has multiplied tenfold over the same period last year."

Ahmadinejad boasted that "the power of our enemies is less than one-tenth of their power in last year."

He did not elaborate, and the remarks appeared aimed primarily at rallying public support as the U.N. Security Council prepares to consider limited sanctions.

Iran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes. The United States and dozens of other countries fear, however, that it is secretly trying to make nuclear arms.

Ahmadinejad repeated that Iran was ready to negotiate about its nuclear ambitions. But the six nations that have spearheaded the most recent attempts to bring Iran to the negotiating table continue to call on Iran to first suspend enrichment.

The Islamic republic has turned down a package of incentives offered by those six world powers — the United States, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany — on condition that all enrichment activities cease.

The United States and its U.N. Security Council allies, Britain and France, have drafted a text that would impose limited sanctions on Iran for its defiance. But a U.N. diplomat told the AP that the text might have to be softened to enlist the support of Russia and China, which have veto power on the Security Council.

Both Moscow and Beijing are reluctant to impose harsh punishments on Tehran, an economic and strategic partner. They also fear that any sanctions — which for now rule out military action — could still start the process toward consideration of force.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said Monday he was hopeful talks with the Iranians would resume and that there was a "real chance" for a negotiated settlement without sanctions.

However, the European Union's external relations commissioner, Benita Ferrero-Waldner, said that Tehran had not responded positively to the incentives package and that the Security Council may need to explore "another alternative."

Ahmadinejad Does Europe (WSJ)

Whatever Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's other faults, lack of candor isn't one of them. This week the U.N. Security Council is set to begin discussing the imposition of (very) limited sanctions against Iran for refusing to halt uranium enrichment to build a nuclear weapon.

And so, with his usual sense of timing, the Iranian President issued the following public warning to Europe last Friday: "We have advised the Europeans that the Americans are far away, but you are the neighbors of the nations in this region. We inform you that the nations are like an ocean that is welling up, and if a storm begins, the dimensions will not stay limited to Palestine, and you may get hurt. It is in your own interest to distance yourself from these criminals (Israel). . . . This is an ultimatum."

China and Russia are the main opponents of tough sanctions for violating the U.N.'s August 31 enrichment deadline, but the Iranian must be thinking he can also shake the resolve of European leaders with a little fear of the Mahdi. Short of that, he might be hoping he can begin to intimidate European public opinion. Iran's ballistic missiles can already reach much of Europe, and his threat will be very real once those missiles can be armed with nuclear warheads.

The temptation in many quarters in the West is to assume that Crazy Mahmoud can't really mean what he says; he must be acting out for "domestic" political reasons. And even if he does mean what he says about wiping Israel off the map, well, Europeans and Americans don't need to worry about that. Call us conservative, or even neoconservative, but when a leader relentlessly seeking weapons of mass destruction starts issuing apocalyptic ultimatums, our instinct is to believe him.

Iranian Women Should Have More Children, Leader Says (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

TEHRAN, Oct. 23 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, reversing a policy in effect for almost two decades, is encouraging Iranian women to have more children in an effort to increase the country's population.

"They say two children are enough," he told Parliament on Sunday, newspapers reported. "I oppose this. I believe our country has a large capacity. It has a capacity even for 120 million people."

Iran's population is now nearly 70 million.

Mr. Ahmadinejad said his government was willing to reduce the hours women work based on the number of their children.

After the 1979 revolution and the war with Iraq that began in 1980, the government urged families to have more children. United Nations data show that Iran's population grew to 55 million in 1988, from 27 million in 1968.

But the rapid population increase was seen as an obstacle to development after the war ended in 1988, when the country had to deal with surging unemployment and a declining economy. The government set up free clinics around the country where people were offered free birth-control services and men were encouraged to have vasectomies.

Mr. Ahmadinejad said Sunday that he was in favor of women working outside their homes, but that he feared the burden of work would prevent them from "performing their most important duty: raising the children of the next generation."

"Some of our friends mentioned that we live at a sensitive time, but I want to add that humanity is living in a historical stage," he said, elaborating on why he wants to increase the population.

North Korea Said To Be Willing To Talk (AP)

By Jae-soon Chang, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 24, 2006

North Korea is amenable to returning to international nuclear talks if the U.S. shows a willingness to resolve a dispute over the North's alleged counterfeiting and money laundering, a South Korean lawmaker said Monday.

A Japanese legislator, meanwhile, said a top Chinese official who recently visited Pyongyang indicated China was not optimistic that North Korea will end its nuclear program or re-enter disarmament talks soon.

South Korean media reported late last week that North Korean leader Kim Jong Il expressed regret for carrying out the country's underground nuclear test on Oct. 9 and told a Chinese envoy that he didn't plan to carry out any more tests.

Kim also raised the possibility the country would return to arms talks, according to the reports, which cited unnamed diplomatic sources in China.

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice cast doubt on the reports, saying Chinese officials had told her no such thing.

Beijing has remained silent, refusing to release any details on a trip by Chinese diplomats to Pyongyang last week, while North Korea has shown no public signs of being flexible by continuing its bellicose rhetoric aimed at the United States.

The developments demonstrate the uncertainty that has surrounded the nuclear standoff since the North's test, which prompted the U.N. Security Council to impose sanctions against Pyongyang.

The head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog, said the only real option for trying to curb North Korea's nuclear weapons program is to talk to the insular regime.

"I don't think sanctions work as a penalty," Mohamed ElBaradei said after meeting with Rice in Washington. "Penalizing them is not the solution."

In Seoul, Rep. Choi Sung of South Korea's ruling Uri Party said he met with a "key North Korean official" in Beijing for four hours Sunday night. He said the official is well-versed in China-North Korea relations and inter-Korean ties, but declined to identify him further.

After the meeting, Choi suggested the United States present the communist state with evidence of its alleged illicit financial activities so the North can punish those responsible.

He said the North Korean official said his country could then return to the talks "even if the issue is not completely resolved."

The U.S. has sought to cut off the North's access to international banking as punishment for alleged counterfeiting of U.S. dollars and other illicit activity. Pyongyang has denied the charges and boycotted six-nation talks on its nuclear program until the U.S. ends the crackdown.

Choi said the North Korean official told him that Pyongyang sees the financial crackdown as a sign that Washington has no intention of improving relations with the North. He added Washington has never presented evidence of the North's illicit activity.

The U.S. has said the financial restrictions are a separate issue from the nuclear standoff.

Japanese lawmaker Ichiro Aisawa, who visited Beijing on Monday to discuss the nuclear test with Chinese leaders, said he was told by Chinese Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawei that Beijing had asked both Pyongyang and Washington for flexibility in restarting talks.

However, he said Wu told him: "China is not optimistic about the resumption of the six-party talks or that North Korea will abandon its nuclear program," according to Kyodo news agency and public broadcaster NHK.

The Chinese Foreign Ministry could not confirm the reports.

Wu, who is Beijing's top nuclear envoy, accompanied China's State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan and Vice Foreign Minister Dai Bingguo on a special mission to Pyongyang last week to deliver a message to the North Korean leader from China's President Hu Jintao.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao did not discuss the details of the message, but said Kim and Tang had "in-depth discussions" about the nuclear dispute.

Head Of IAEA Urges U.S.-N. Korea Talks (AP-Y)

By Barry Schweid

AP, October 24, 2006

The only real option for trying to curb North Korea's nuclear weapons program is to talk to the insular regime, the head of the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency said Monday.

"I don't think sanctions work as a penalty," Mohamed ElBaradei said after a meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"They feel they are isolated; they feel they are not getting the security they need," said the Egyptian diplomat, who has run the U.N. agency for nearly a decade.

DOJ_NMG_0085574

The U.N. Security Council, largely at the urging of the United States, has imposed controls on trade in dangerous goods with North Korea. Rice returned Sunday from a trip to Asia and Russia designed to encourage enforcement of the sanctions and to offer assurances of U.S. security support to anxious allies.

The export controls imposed by the U.N. Security Council "are not sufficient" to turn North Korea away from building nuclear weapons and other dangerous weapons, he said.

"Penalizing them is not the solution," he said.

ElBaradei's tenure as director general of the IAEA — during which he won the 2005 Nobel Peace Prize — was challenged unsuccessfully two years ago by the Bush administration, which clashed with him over his doubts that prewar Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction and also considers him too soft on Iran.

Rice made no public statement earlier in a picture-taking session with him in her office.

ElBaradei said it did not matter whether the United States talks to North Korea in a six-nation negotiations format that has failed to deter a nuclear test, or one-on-one.

"At the end of the day, we have to bite the bullet and talk to North Korea and Iran," he said at Georgetown University's foreign service school.

The administration counters that it is willing to talk to North Korea in the six-nation framework, saying having other nations — China, Japan, South Korea and Russia — in the negotiations reinforces the anti-nuclear message.

A growing number of members of Congress and former high-level U.S. government officials are urging the Bush administration to open talks with both North Korea and Iran, which also has a nuclear program.

The administration has said it would consider talking to Iran if it suspended enrichment of uranium that the United States and European allies contend is part of a program to develop nuclear weapons. Iran says its programs are designed to increase civilian energy output.

ElBaradei said Iran has the knowledge to make nuclear weapons, but is years away from building them. "The jury is still out on whether they are developing a nuclear weapon," he said.

Meanwhile, in Vienna, Austria, diplomats speaking on condition of anonymity told The Associated Press on Monday that Iran is expanding its uranium enrichment program and that within the past few weeks Iranian nuclear experts had started up a second pilot enrichment facility. Iran had produced a small batch of low-enriched uranium — suitable as nuclear fuel but not weapons grade — in February.

AFP, October 24, 2006

Hong Kong has detained a North Korean cargo vessel for possible safety violations under UN sanctions slapped on the regime after Pyongyang's nuclear weapons test, a media report has said.

The rusting, 2,035-tonne general cargo vessel Kang Nam I was suspected of breaching 25 regulations after entering Hong Kong on Sunday, the South China Morning Post reported.

It said the vessel was not carrying any cargo when it arrived and had come to load up with scrap metal.

The newspaper cited Hong Kong's marine chief Roger Tupper as confirming the detention under the terms of the UN sanctions, which require ports to stop and search any North Korean vessels.

The clampdown was put in place to prevent the hardline Stalinist regime of Kim Jong-il from transferring or importing nuclear technology and to end the trade in contraband, usch as drugs and illicit cigarettes, that is believed to help fund the North's nuclear programme.

The Hong Kong government's Customs Department was yet to confirm the ship's detention.

Tupper was quoted as telling the Post that eight other North Korean ships had been similarly stopped this year.

"Hong Kong is a major hub port and North Korean vessels do sometimes visit," he said. "It is not unreasonable that they are subject to routine Port State Control inspections."

The report said the ship had arrived from Shanghai and was due to return home to Nampo, near Pyongyang, via Taiwan.

DOJ_NMG_0085575

It said the captain, who would not give his name, had told reporters he was unaware of Pyonygang's first ever atom bomb test conducted October 9, nor of the subsequent UN sanctions.

The sanctions are part of a huge global diplomatic effort since the test to persuade North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons programme.

China Steps Up (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

Or does it? Two weeks after North Korea tested a nuclear device, that's still the question now that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has returned from her stop-the-nuclear-blackmail tour of Asian capitals.

As North Korea's biggest trading partner, the source of 80% to 90% of its fuel, and provider of significant food aid, China is the country with potentially the most influence over Kim Jong Il. President Hu Jintao's high-level personal envoy, dispatched to Pyongyang last week, by some accounts took Kim to the woodshed. Beijing is keeping mum about precisely what message State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan delivered to the North Korean leader, but one notable result is that Kim is no longer threatening to conduct a second nuclear test.

"I cannot conceive of even a short time ago China agreeing to call North Korea's behavior a threat to international peace and security," Ms. Rice told reporters after her stopover in Beijing. More to the point, the Journal reported Friday that Chinese banks are moving to halt transactions with North Korea. It cited officials at four commercial banks who said that they were ordered to shut off all business with North Korea. China is North Korea's major conduit for moving money in and out of the isolated country, so the banking cutoff should get Kim's attention.

Meanwhile, in South Korea, the other country with influence over the North, President Roh Moo Hyun's government continues down its appeasement path. The day after Ms. Rice urged officials in Seoul not to exclude the Kaesong industrial park from sanctions authorized by the U.N. Security Council, the chairman of Mr. Roh's Uri Party tripped off to Kaesong and was photographed dancing with a waitress.

Kaesong is home to factories run by 13 South Korean companies and, according to the latest government trade figures, the source of 23% of the South's trade with the North in the first eight months of this year. According to a Commerce Ministry report made public Sunday by a member of the opposition party and reported in the South Korean press, 60% of Kaesong workers' pay goes directly into the pockets of the Communist Korean Workers' Party. After insurance and other costs, workers like the waitress Mr. Roh's buddy was dancing with take home a mere $10 of their average monthly earnings of $57.50.

Both China and South Korea remain reluctant to enforce the U.N. resolution's demand for a halt to the North's trade in illicit materials, including drugs and counterfeit currency, not to mention weapons material and missile parts. China is balking at boarding North Korean ships at sea, and Seoul refuses to take part in the Proliferation Security Initiative, a coalition of about 70 countries that interdicts ships and planes carrying illegal cargo.

South Korea may be a hopeless cause -- at least until next year's presidential elections, when voters have an opportunity to elect a government that understands that Pyongyang is a greater threat to their security than is Washington.

China, however, is another story. There's much more it could do to show it's willing to join the rest of the world in being a "stakeholder" -- to borrow former Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick's useful word -- in promoting world security, but at least it's sounding serious. China's cooperation also shows that the six-party process could yet work. U.S. and Japanese pressure, along with Kim's recklessness, may be causing China to conclude that its self-interest lies with stopping him.

U.S.-South Korea Trade Talks Have Rocky Start (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

SEOGWIPO, South Korea -- The latest effort by the U.S. and South Korea to reach a free-trade agreement got off to a rocky start, with Washington saying talks might not conclude by a year-end target date.

The two sides opened their fourth round of negotiations since June on the southern island of Jeju, where thousands of demonstrators opposing free trade with the U.S. called for the talks to be scrapped.

Since announcing their intention to launch the negotiations in February, both sides have said they want to reach a basic agreement by the end of 2006. Whether that can happen is now in question.

"We are still trying to conclude this agreement by the end of this year or early next year," U.S. Assistant Trade Representative Wendy Cutler told reporters, suggesting the talks, which she acknowledged have been tough, may drag on.

The timetable is important because President Bush's legal authority to "fast track" a deal expires in mid-2007, and both the U.S. Congress and South Korea's National Assembly need time to debate and vote on any deal. Fast-tracking allows U.S. envoys to negotiate an agreement that can be submitted to Congress for a yes-or-no vote without amendments.

Washington is pushing South Korea to allow more access for American pharmaceuticals, automobiles and financial services such as insurance. Seoul wants South Korean goods made at the Kaesong industrial complex in North Korea included in the deal. The U.S. is strongly opposed to that.

Ms. Cutler said the U.S. position on Kaesong has been reinforced by recent developments on the Korean peninsula, referring to Pyongyang's recent claim to have carried out a nuclear test.

She said the U.S. made new offers calling for shorter time frames for tariff reductions covering nearly $1 billion in industrial goods, more than $1.3 billion in textiles, and $135 million in agricultural goods. Her South Korean counterpart, trade diplomat Kim Jong Hoon, said the U.S. offer on industrial products was insufficient.

"While the U.S. presented an improved tariff concession offer on industrial goods, it still fell significantly short of our expectations," he told reporters, according to South Korea's Yonhap news agency.

The negotiations, scheduled through Friday, brought a variety of demonstrators to Jeju. Police estimated about 11,000 people took part in a protest at the island's convention center, about three kilometers from the hotel venue for the talks.

Nuclear Program Oversight Increased (WT)

By David R. Sands

Pakistan has adopted a vast system of checks and balances in its military nuclear program to prevent nonproliferation abuses such as the nuclear black market run by top scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan, a senior Pakistani military official said yesterday.

The official, in an unusually detailed background briefing for reporters at the Pakistani Embassy, also warned that the proposed U.S.-India nuclear-cooperation pact was a "one-sided deal" that could prove "counterproductive for U.S. strategic objectives" in South Asia if Islamabad was not offered a similar deal.

The Pakistani military official, who has extensive familiarity with the country's nuclear bureaucracy, could not be quoted by name under the ground rules of the briefing.

But the session reflected Pakistani concerns that its nuclear-proliferation failings were in the spotlight again after this month's nuclear test by North Korea.

The network run by Mr. Khan, still a revered figure in Pakistan for his role in developing the country's nuclear arsenal, "cast a long shadow over Pakistan's image," the official said. "We have years of baggage to shed."

Mr. Khan, who is under house arrest, traveled to Pyongyang often before his nuclear-smuggling ring was exposed in 2003. His network is thought to have provided North Korea with designs, parts, and working models of centrifuges needed to manufacture nuclear fuel. The Pakistani researcher also provided centrifuges for Iran's clandestine nuclear programs.

Many nonproliferation specialists fear that Pakistan is the world's greatest cause for worry, with the government of President Pervez Musharraf facing challenges from within and without.

But the Pakistani military official said that nearly a decade ago, the country began a thorough revamping of its nuclear bureaucracy, increasing the levels of oversight, implementing new controls on the production and transfer of nuclear materials and establishing "reliability tests" for Pakistani nuclear researchers.

He confirmed that U.S. nuclear specialists had been providing technical advice and some "off-the-shelf" basic equipment to aid Pakistan's nonproliferation efforts, but stressed that Pakistan had total say over what help it accepts.

"We have a good system now down to the grass roots," he insisted.

Islamabad still prevents investigators from the U.S. and the United Nations from directly interviewing Mr. Khan about his nuclear dealings, and the official said Mr. Khan remains "a hero" to Pakistanis.

The official said he saw little hope of derailing the U.S. nuclear deal with rival India.

The accord, strongly backed by the Bush administration and being considered by Congress, would open up major cooperation and trade between the United States and India on civilian nuclear projects, while allowing India to keep its nuclear military programs free from international monitoring. Pakistan and many U.S. critics fear the deal could allow India to bulk up its own nuclear arsenal and overwhelm Pakistan's smaller deterrent.

The official said the United States should make it clear that Pakistan would be eligible for a similar nuclear-cooperation deal in the future.

U.N. Says Human Rights Violators Cite U.S. (WP/AP)

By Nick Wadhams

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 23 -- Several governments around the world have tried to rebut criticism of how they handle detainees by claiming they are only following the U.S. example in fighting terrorism, the U.N. special rapporteur on torture said Monday.

Manfred Nowak said that when he criticizes governments for their questionable treatment of detainees, they respond by telling him that if the United States does something, it must be all right. He would not name any countries except Jordan.

"The United States has been the pioneer . . . of human rights and is a country that has a high reputation in the world," Nowak said at a news conference. "Today, many other governments are kind of saying: 'But why are you criticizing us? We are not doing something different than what the United States is doing.' "

Nowak said that because of its prominence, the United States has a greater responsibility to uphold international standards for its prisoners.

State Department spokesman Kurtis Cooper said Monday night that he had not seen Nowak's comments and had no response.

Nowak has chastised the United States over detainee policy and for maintaining secret prisons.

Nonetheless, he said, the United States had improved its handling of detainees, particularly in Iraq after the Abu Ghraib scandal. Nowak said the big problem in Iraq now is allegations of detainee torture by militias and the country's Interior Ministry.

He said detainees were afraid of being transferred from the control of multinational forces to Iraqi prisons.

"They would prefer, if they are in detention now, to be in the international detention facilities rather than the Iraqi detention facilities," Nowak said.

Press Freedom Erodes In U.S., Report Says (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Some poor countries, such as Mauritania and Haiti, improved their record in a global press freedom index this year, while France, the United States and Japan slipped further down the scale of 168 countries rated, the group Reporters Without Borders said yesterday.

The news media advocacy organization said the most repressive countries in terms of journalistic freedom -- such as North Korea, Cuba, Burma and China -- made no advances at all.

The organization's fifth annual Worldwide Press Freedom Index tracks actions against news media through the end of September. The group noted its concern over the declining rankings of some Western democracies as well as the persistence of other countries in imposing harsh punishments on media that criticize political leaders.

"Unfortunately nothing has changed in the countries that are the worst predators of press freedom, and journalists in North Korea, Eritrea, Turkmenistan, Cuba, Burma and China are still risking their life or imprisonment for trying to keep us informed," the organization said in a news release.

Iran ranks 162nd, between Saudi Arabia and China. The report said conditions in Russia and Belarus have not improved. It said that Russia continued to steadily dismantle the independent media and that the recent slaying of investigative journalist Anna Politkovskaya "is a poor omen for the coming year."

Northern European countries top the index, with no reported censorship, threats, intimidation or physical reprisals, either by officials or the public, in Finland, Ireland, Iceland and the Netherlands. All of those countries were ranked in first place.

Serious threats against the artists and publishers of the Muhammad cartoons, which caricatured the prophet of Islam, caused Denmark, which was also in first place last year, to drop to 19th place. Yemen, at 149th place, slipped four places, mostly because of the arrests of journalists and the closure of newspapers that reprinted the cartoons. Journalists in Algeria, Jordan, Indonesia and India were harassed because of the cartoons as well.

Although it ranked 17th on the first list, published in 2002, the United States now stands at 53, having fallen nine places since last year.

"Relations between the media and the Bush administration sharply deteriorated after the president used the pretext of 'national security' to regard as suspicious any journalist who questioned his 'war on terrorism,' " the group said.

"The zeal of federal courts which, unlike those in 33 U.S. states, refuse to recognize the media's right not to reveal its sources, even threatens journalists whose investigations have no connection at all with terrorism," the group said.

Lucie Morillon, the organization's Washington representative, said the index is based on responses to 50 questions about press freedom asked of journalists, free press organizations, researchers, human rights activists and others.

France, 35th, dropped five places since last year because of searches of media offices and journalists' homes, as well as physical attacks on journalists during a trade union dispute, the group said.

In Lebanon, a series of bomb attacks targeting journalists and publishers in 2005, and Israeli military attacks last summer, contributed to a drop in the country's ranking from 56th to 107th in the past four years.

Israeli Premier Reaches Out To Far Right (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 23 — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel reached a deal on Monday to broaden his shaky coalition by adding a far-right party that seeks to annex parts of the West Bank and to eventually reduce Israel's Arab population.

Mr. Olmert's coalition has been struggling for months, and the latest move was seen as an attempt to stabilize the faltering government. But the new right-wing partner — Israel Beiteinu, or Israel Is Our Home — strongly opposes concessions to the Palestinians.

The prime minister's decision signals that he is now more concerned with internal Israeli politics than with initiatives to deal with the Palestinians.

The prime minister has already indicated that the central theme of his election campaign, a withdrawal from some Jewish settlements in the West Bank, has been put on indefinite hold. The latest development further reinforces that notion.

Also on Monday, Israeli forces killed six Palestinians, at least three of them militants, in clashes in the northern Gaza Strip, Palestinian medical workers said. The area has been the scene of repeated fighting in recent months.

Mr. Olmert overrode opposition from some liberal members of his coalition to bring in Israel Beiteinu, a party led by Avigdor Lieberman, 48, a Soviet immigrant who advocates annexing Jewish settlements in the West Bank and transferring most Arab citizens of Israel to a future Palestinian state.

The prime minister said he planned to make Mr. Lieberman a deputy prime minister responsible for "strategic threats" against Israel, a portfolio that would include monitoring Iran, which Israel regards as its most dangerous enemy.

The alliance agreed to by Mr. Olmert and Mr. Lieberman was expected to be formalized with cabinet and parliamentary approval in the next several days, though it could still face some opposition, particularly from the left-leaning Labor Party. Mr. Lieberman reaffirmed his opposition to territorial concessions, saying that the right has been in power for most of the past three decades in Israel, but, "We were unable to prevent withdrawals."

Mr. Olmert's centrist Kadima Party was elected just seven months ago. His center-left coalition government has not only been reeling since the summer's inconclusive war against Hezbollah in Lebanon, but also cannot point to any significant achievements.

In announcing the deal with Mr. Lieberman, the prime minister noted that since Israel was founded in 1948, it has had 31 governments.

"In other words, the average term of office for an Israeli government has, for a very long time, been less than two years," Mr. Olmert said. "Is this reasonable? Is this evidence of stability? Does it promise continuity?"

While the existing coalition was not in imminent danger of collapse, it would be tested in coming months on issues like the approval of the 2007 budget. Budget deliberations have led to coalition breakups in the past.

Mr. Olmert's coalition has consisted recently of four parties that hold 67 of the 120 seats in Parliament. While this provides a working majority, it would evaporate if any of the coalition partners left, something that happens with regularity in Israel's volatile politics.

Mr. Lieberman's party holds 11 seats, which would give the governing coalition 78 seats, or nearly two-thirds of the Parliament. By bringing a far-right party on board, Mr. Olmert also hopes to neutralize the other right-wing factions that account for much of the opposition in Parliament.

However, the expansion also means that Mr. Olmert's new government would span the ideological spectrum, including liberal, centrist, right-wing and religious parties. With such divergent factions in the government, Mr. Olmert would have little or no chance of building consensus about political solutions to the continuing struggles with the Palestinians.

The left-leaning Labor Party has expressed the strongest opposition to Israel Beiteinu's inclusion in the coalition.

Shelly Yacimovich, a Labor Party legislator, said her party joined the government based on "the desire for a peace process, the desire for a social-democratic agenda and for a friendly and egalitarian relationship with Arab Israelis." Mr. Lieberman, she said, "represents the complete opposite of all these things."

But Isaac Herzog, a Labor lawmaker who serves in the cabinet, told Israel Radio that his party had "no choice but to remain in the government, because you have to allow government stability."

In 2004, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon dismissed Mr. Lieberman from his post as transportation minister because he strongly opposed Mr. Sharon's plan to withdraw Israeli soldiers and settlers from Gaza.

The burly Mr. Lieberman immigrated from Moldova in 1978 and was first elected to Parliament in 1999.

His party draws support from the Soviet immigrants who account for roughly one million of Israel's seven million people, and it made a strong showing in the elections in March.

In recent weeks, Mr. Lieberman has pushed a proposal that would change Israel's government from a parliamentary system to a presidential system, similar to that of the United States.

In the Gaza violence on Monday, Israeli forces waged a gun battle with a group of armed Palestinians and killed six, including a man the Israeli military said was Ata Shinbari, a leader of the Popular Resistance Committees, a group responsible for much of the recent rocket fire out of northern Gaza.

Mr. Shinbari was among five men in his family in their late teens or 20's who were killed in the gun battle, in the town of Beit Hanun, according to Palestinian medical workers. Several Palestinians were also wounded.

At Least Six Palestinians Die In Clashes With Israel (WP)

By Scott Wilson

JERUSALEM, Oct. 23 -- At least six Palestinians died Monday in clashes between Israeli forces and Palestinian gunmen in the Gaza Strip, part of an escalating operation there to stop rocket fire into southern Israel and smuggling across its borders. One of those killed was a high-ranking Palestinian militia commander, Israeli and Palestinian officials said.

Twenty other Palestinians were wounded in fighting that unfolded between the northern Gaza villages of Beit Hanoun and Beit Lahiya, the prime launching ground for crude Palestinian rockets that frequently strike Israeli communities in the south but rarely kill anyone. One of the wounded was close to death, Palestinian hospital officials said.

Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas called the event "a loathsome massacre carried out on, of all days, the first day of Eid al-Fitr," the Muslim feast celebrating the end of the fasting season of Ramadan. Israeli officials have noted that Palestinian rockets fell inside Israel this month during Yom Kippur, the holiest Jewish holiday.

More than 200 Palestinians, many of them civilians, have died in the Israeli military operation in Gaza that began June 25 after the capture of an Israeli soldier by gunmen from several armed groups including the military wing of the governing Hamas movement. Israeli armor and infantry have entered and withdrawn from the strip for months.

But in recent days, tanks and soldiers have taken up and held positions along the southern frontier with Egypt, a prime arms-smuggling route, and in northern Gaza, to combat the near-daily rocket attacks. Israeli political leaders have warned of a broader assault in the weeks ahead.

There were divergent accounts of the circumstances surrounding the fighting Monday and of how many of those who died were armed. One of those killed was Atta al-Shinbari, 35, a senior commander of the radical Popular Resistance Committees responsible for much of the rocket fire into Israel. At least three others were male relatives of Shinbari, including his 40-year-old brother, Khalid. Palestinian witnesses said the men were not affiliated with any armed factions.

One of the other dead was identified as Rami Hamdan, 23, a member of the radical Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

Palestinian witnesses said Shinbari was visiting the home of his sister in Beit Lahiya on the first day of Eid al-Fitr, when it is customary to mourn family members who have died in the previous year. A mourning tent was set up outside the home.

The witnesses said a car carrying Israeli soldiers, apparently disguised as Palestinians, opened fire on Shinbari as he approached the house. The ensuing gunfight lasted for hours.

Israeli military officials said soldiers opened fire only after a group of Palestinian gunmen began shooting at them. Officials said the soldiers reported hitting 10 gunmen in what one of them described as a "heavy exchange of fire."

In another development, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert expanded his governing coalition Monday by adding Israel Is Our Home, a party dominated by immigrants from the former Soviet Union that is one of the most hawkish in Israel's 120-seat parliament, the Knesset.

Down in the polls following the summer war in Lebanon, Olmert is seeking new members for his government in anticipation of a contentious budget season. By adding Israel Is Our Home, Olmert improves his control of the Knesset from 67 to 78 seats, among the broadest in recent times.

The agreement gives a cabinet seat to Avigdor Lieberman, an immigrant from Moldova who worked his way into the highest ranks of Israeli politics from an early job as an El Al Airlines baggage handler. Lieberman, 48, will hold the title of deputy prime minister charged with managing the threat posed to Israel by Iran, which many nations fear is developing nuclear weapons.

Lieberman's signature proposal is to redraw Israel's recognized international border in a way that would place roughly 150,000 Arab citizens of Israel in the West Bank, annexing the largest Jewish settlement blocs there in return. The move, roundly denounced by other Zionist parties, would strengthen the state's Jewish majority by stripping those Arabs of Israeli citizenship.

Lieberman is also pushing legislation to create a U.S.-style presidential system in Israel by allowing direct elections for the prime minister, who is now effectively chosen by parliament. Israel's system is notoriously fractious, leading to governments with little room to maneuver on big issues and short political lives. The bill, narrowly endorsed by Olmert's cabinet this week, has little chance of passing the Knesset. Olmert himself opposes the measure in its current form.

Fallout Of Hamas's Rule Spurs Palestinian Desire To Flee (CSM)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Christian Science Monitor, October 24, 2006

BIRZEIT, WEST BANK

Ahmed Hushiyeh holds degrees in political science and communications, and dreams of becoming a photojournalist. But after a futile search for a job, the young Palestinian works as a janitor at his alma mater, Birzeit University.

He is saving money in the hopes of moving to Europe, enrolling in another university, and finding work. Political paralysis during Hamas's brief tenure leading the Palestinian government and escalating violence between rival security forces has convinced Mr. Hushiyeh that his career path lies abroad.

"I am not optimistic. The situation is only deteriorating. Maybe outside, the opportunities are much better," he says. "Every young man wishes to have a job and have a life. But when he sees what we have here: occupation, siege, a low standard of living, security crisis - all of this creates a desire to leave. I want to get out of this crisis."

Like Hushiyeh, a growing number of Palestinians are openly saying they'd like to leave the West Bank and Gaza if given the chance, raising concern about the possibility of a Palestinian brain drain. The sentiment, which flouts the long-held Palestinian belief that Israeli occupation can only be resisted by staying put, is yet another indication of the deepening despair since Hamas was elected to run the government.

This desire to flee also comes amid ongoing violence in the Gaza Strip. On Monday, Israeli troops killed at least seven Palestinians in one of the deadliest days of fighting following the June 25 capture of an Israeli soldier.

Birzeit University pollster Nader Said, who has monitored emigration attitudes for 12 years, says the percentage of Palestinians willing to relocate once hovered just below 20 percent. When that figure jumped to 32 percent in a September survey, Mr. Said says he was shocked.

The catalyst, the pollster says, has been Palestinian disillusionment following Hamas's half-year in government. "What the Israelis were unable to do - try to push the Palestinian out of the country - the internal strife is achieving," he says.

Even more telling, adds Said, is that the percentage surges to 44 percent among Palestinians in their 20s and 30s. Among young men, it surges beyond 50 percent.

Malik Shawwa, a consultant specializing in obtaining Canadian visas, says his workload has jumped by two-thirds over the past seven months as more Palestinians ask about leaving. "This is the most important subject in the Palestinian territories," he says. "It's not just a matter of a lack of jobs. It's the situation. They're not secure. They don't trust the government."

Among Palestinians, the mere mention of hijra - Arabic for emigration - is enough to stir up painful memories of the 1948 Arab-Israeli war that left hundreds of thousands of Palestinians stranded outside the newly independent Israeli state.

"Emigration means that you are escaping the occupation and that you don't want to liberate your land. It's a shame on you," says Abdel Nasser Najjar, a columnist for the Palestinian daily Al Ayyam. "Now it's different. There are many pressures: economic pressure and psychological pressure. Many people are speaking out."

Riad Malki, the director of Panorama, a Ramallah nonprofit that promotes democracy in the West Bank and Gaza, confesses that he is giving more thought to the idea of relocating. But the broader trend of an exodus by the middle class and young males stirs up fear that Palestinian society may be stripped of its next generation.

"We are going to lose the dynamo of the Palestinian state," he says. "If we lose them how will we set up the offices of Palestine?"

But there are no signs that a critical mass of Palestinians is leaving just yet. The distance between pondering a move and acting on it remains considerable because of the hurdles in establishing residency in a new country. "For the most part, it's a very loud protest statement against the political actors," says Said. "Palestinians have given [Hamas and Fatah] an opportunity to deliver."

And yet, there is evidence that Palestinians are acting on this sentiment. The Ramallah branch of Mr. Shawwa's visa consultancy gets 30 calls a day while the Gaza city office fields 10, he says. Though only a fraction qualify to apply for a Canadian visa, Shawwa says, Palestinians are nonetheless desperate to leave.

"They come to me and cry," he says. "We are doing a much better service for the Palestinian people than the people who are fighting. We are saving a lot of young people from being destroyed."

Back on the Birzeit University campus, a trio of students admitted that the topic of emigration remains sensitive among family and friends. But at the same time they reject the suggestion that moving abroad constitutes any betrayal.

"If I leave then I'll be lucky," says Birzeit law student Masaad Masaad, who hopes to move after graduating and a two-year internship. "The country hasn't provided anything for me. The government has failed ... No attention is given to the citizens."

Three Ways To War In Gaza (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0085582

Wonder where and when the next Middle East war is going to take place? The likeliest answer is the Gaza Strip, perhaps before the year is out. Who will fight it? Now there is an interesting question.

Three sets of circumstances are operating simultaneously in this tiny patch of Palestinian land -- not quite the size of Andorra but 20 times as populous -- each of which has the potential to produce a different kind of violent outcome. First circumstance: the escalating factional fighting, verging on civil war, between Hamas forces loyal to Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh and Fatah forces associated, albeit sometimes loosely, with President Mahmoud Abbas.

On Friday, relatives of a Fatah man recently killed by Hamas opened fire on Mr. Haniyeh's convoy in Gaza; Fatah militiamen have also threatened to assassinate the entire Hamas cabinet. Hamas, for its part, recently assassinated top Fatah militiaman Mohammed Shahadeh and intelligence officer Jad Tayah. Earlier this month, Hamas security forces opened fire on Fatah-affiliated policemen who had raided the Gaza branch of the Bank of Palestine in protest of their unpaid salaries. At least 10 people died; Fatah's Al-Hayat al-Jadeeda newspaper called Hamas's actions "Sedition" in banner headlines. Mr. Abbas is considering dissolving the government and moving to new elections; Hamas Interior Minister Said Siam deems the idea a "coup."

For some time, Israeli policy makers have been looking at the domestic Palestinian situation with a sense of satisfaction -- somewhat akin to the American view of the mutual slaughter of Iraqis and Iranians during the 1980s. But that was before the June kidnapping of Israeli Corporal Gilad Shalit transformed Gaza's domestic crisis into an Israeli one. It was also before the summer's war with Hezbollah, which alerted Israelis that their borders were less secure than previously thought. Hence the second circumstance: the consolidation of Gaza, following Israel's full withdrawal in August 2005, into a terrorist fortress.

Last week, Egyptian police in the Sinai intercepted a shipment of 200 crates of guns and ammunition headed for the town of Rafah, which straddles the seven-mile Egyptian-Palestinian border. Also last week, the Israeli army (IDF) discovered 13 smuggling tunnels running under the border in addition to the 12 discovered since June. Israeli intelligence estimates that in the past year at least 19 tons of explosives have been smuggled through these tunnels into Gaza, plus some 15,000 Kalashnikov rifles, 1,000 RPGs, and quantities of Katyusha rockets, Strella anti-aircraft missiles and Russian-made Kornet and Metis antitank missiles.

All this is in addition to an indigenous Gazan military industry that produced the hundreds of short-range Kassam rockets that have rained continuously on southern Israel for two years. And it explains why Israeli military planners feel they need to deal Gaza a punishing blow sooner rather than later, when the Palestinians might be in a position to bloody Israel the way Hezbollah did last summer. "We are going to make a massive ground operation in Gaza," warns Yuval Steinitz, until recently chairman of the Knesset's Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee, in a recent interview. Underlying the remark is the sense that the IDF will not allow itself to be surprised again by events, much less humiliated twice by ostensibly weaker foes.

Mr. Steinitz points an accusing finger at Egypt, which agreed last year to step up its efforts to stop the weapons smuggling in exchange for Israel abandoning its aggressive border patrols along the so-called Philadelphi Corridor. "The Egyptians are violating and betraying all the agreements," he says. "They are doing to us what Syria is doing to the U.S. in Iraq. . . . Their real policy is to let Israelis and Palestinians bleed together."

Talk to the Egyptians, however, and you get a different story. In public, the Egyptians generally neither acknowledge nor deny that they are letting the smuggling happen: Acknowledgment risks alienating the U.S. while denial risks enraging their own public opinion. In private, however, Egyptians admit that they condone and perhaps even participate in the smuggling, but only to arm and strengthen Fatah. The arms to Hamas are being shipped, supposedly against Egypt's wishes, from Iran via Syria and Hezbollah.

Here, then, is the third circumstance: The rise of Hamas, with ties to Iran and potentially a secure territorial base of its own, is an even greater long-term threat to the brittle regime of Hosni Mubarak than it is to Israel.

Consider the Kabuki dance being played around the fate of Cpl. Shalit. The Egyptians have been negotiating his release for months, probably in good faith: They fear that indefinite detention might lead to a full-scale Israeli invasion of Gaza, which would have spillover effects in the Sinai. At the same time, Mr. Mubarak has been ratcheting up the repression of the Muslim Brotherhood, Hamas's sister organization in Egypt, by canceling elections the Brotherhood seemed likely to win and tinkering with the election law to further shut it out of the political process. Poor 19-year-old Cpl. Shalit is being played by Hamas as a card in two separate games: with the Israelis for the release of Palestinian prisoners and with the Egyptians for political concessions in Cairo.

The political heat between the two sides was noticeably raised last week when Hamas Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar reportedly warned Egypt that if it failed to open its border with Gaza "there will be no border." Equally extraordinary was that the statement was widely reprinted in the Egyptian state media, playing into the broad suspicion that the Brotherhood, as a religious organization, is fundamentally anti-Egypt in the national sense. "Now the line is, 'No more foreign ministry,'" says an Egyptian source, suggesting the Mubarak regime is quickly moving away from diplomacy to more aggressive forms of persuasion with Hamas.

If Egypt or Israel had the luxury of choice they would abandon Gaza to its own miserable devices, or -- even better -- to each other. But that's not how it works in the Middle East. The war for Gaza is coming, no matter who does the fighting. Whoever stays out of it wins.

War In Sudan? Not Where The Oil Wealth Flows (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

KHARTOUM, Sudan, Oct. 20 — To understand Sudan's defiance toward the world, especially the Western world, check out the Ozone Café.

Here young, rich Sudanese, wearing ripped jeans and fancy gym shoes, sit outside licking scoops of ice cream as an outdoor air-conditioning system sprays a cooling veil of mist. Around the corner is a new BMW dealership unloading $165,000 cars.

"I tell people you only live this life once," said Nada Gerais, a saleswoman.

While one of the world's worst humanitarian crises continues some 600 miles away in Darfur, across Khartoum bridges are being built, office towers are popping up, supermarkets are opening and flatbed trucks hauling plasma TV's fight their way through thickening traffic.

Despite the image of Sudan as a land of cracked earth and starving people, the economy is booming, with little help from the West. Oil has turned it into one of the fastest growing economies in Africa — if not the world — emboldening the nation's already belligerent government and giving it the wherewithal to resist Western demands to end the conflict in Darfur.

American sanctions have kept many companies from Europe and the United States out of Sudan, but firms from China, Malaysia, India, Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates are racing in. Direct foreign investment has shot up to $2.3 billion this year, from $128 million in 2000, all while the American government has tried to tighten the screws.

"Khartoum is hot — in all ways," said Hashim Wahir, chairman of Petronas Sudan, a branch of the Malaysian national oil company.

It was 115 degrees outside, but Mr. Wahir was also talking about business.

As long as Asian countries are eager to trade with Sudan, despite its human rights record, the American embargo seems to have minimal effect. The country's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, keeps demonstrating his disdain for the West by refusing to allow United Nations peacekeepers into Darfur, despite continued bloodshed and pressure from the United States to let the peacekeepers in.

"The government knows it doesn't need America," said Abda Yahia el-Mahdi, a former finance minister, now in private consulting. "The only people who are being hurt by the sanctions are the Americans, who are missing out on this huge boom."

The wealth is hardly evenly shared, and much of Sudan, like Darfur, remains desperately poor. Indeed, the nation's per capita income was only $640 in 2005, at market exchange rates, according to the World Bank.

But the country's G.D.P. grew 8 percent in 2005, according to the International Monetary Fund, and is predicted to increase by 12 percent this year. Cotton and other agricultural products have traditionally been the engines of the economy here, but the new growth comes largely because Sudan has substantially increased its crude oil production to 512,000 barrels a day — a drop compared with Saudi Arabia's or Iran's, but enough to bring billions of dollars to a country that until recently was one of the poorest on earth.

"Oil and real estate investment, primarily in urban areas, is really what's driving the economy," said Michael Kevane, an associate professor of economics at Santa Clara University. "There's no doubt about that."

The boom is also strengthening the government's hand at home. Over the past few years, Mr. Bashir has been on an infrastructure binge, pouring hundreds of millions of dollars into roads, bridges, power plants, hospitals and schools, projects that tend to boost any government's popularity. Mr. Bashir seems to desperately need it, with many people across the country, not just in Darfur, openly rebelling against his rule.

Mr. Bashir, an army general, seized power in 1989 through a military coup, and among the biggest beneficiaries of these boom times have been his troops. Ms. Mahdi said more than 70 percent of the government's share of oil profits is spent on defense. A government priority is to manufacture guns and ammunition domestically, in case external supplies are cut off.

Despite all the new materialism, Sudan still marches to a martial tune. Army officers enjoy special status, foreign visitors must register with the police and schoolchildren are required to wear camouflage uniforms to class. But the boom is changing much about society, from the careers people pursue, to the music they listen to, even what they eat.

The traditional meal of ful, a bean stew eaten for breakfast and lunch, is giving way to kebabs, yogurt, hamburgers and hot dogs.

"We even have Pringles," said Mohammed Abdelwahab Salih, a 26-year-old entrepreneur who recently started a business in Khartoum designing Web sites.

Mr. Salih remembers the days, not so long ago, when he used to have to wait in line for hours for a single loaf of bread.

"And it wasn't even good bread," he said. "When we got home, we had to pick out the flies."

For years, the Sudanese economy was a disaster, with triple-digit inflation, moribund industries and war. Ever since Sudan's independence in 1956, Christian and animist tribes in the south have rebelled against Muslim rulers in the north.

Oil had been discovered here by Chevron in the 1970's, but the oil fields straddled the north-south divide and were essentially unworkable while the fighting was going on.

The American government imposed a trade embargo in 1997, freezing Sudanese government assets in the United States and cutting off its exports to and imports from Sudan, with a few exceptions. The reason: human rights abuses connected to the north-south war and Sudan's links to terrorists. Osama bin Laden lived in Khartoum in the 1990's.

But by 1999, when the first trickle of oil began to flow out of Port Sudan, on the Red Sea, Sudan's economy was turning around. A small cadre of Western-educated technocrats had followed the I.M.F.'s reform programs to the letter — cutting spending, privatizing state-owned businesses, lowering inflation and pushing infrastructure.

"It was classic, conservative economic policies," said Safwat Fanous, chairman of the political science department at the University of Khartoum. "And it worked."

Even World Bank economists have been impressed.

"These are very good people managing the economy and would rate among the best anywhere in Africa," said Asif Faiz, country manager for the World Bank in Sudan.

But, he added, they need to do more to spread the wealth to rural areas and focus on the poor.

Sudanese living abroad began to drift back, drawn by new opportunities — and other realities.

"If you want to open a bank account in America these days, it's not difficult, it's impossible," said Ahmed Amin Abdellatif, a 33-year-old Cambridge-educated businessman who drives a Porsche SUV through the dusty streets of Khartoum and runs an empire of electronics shops. He argued that antiterrorism laws in the West had made it very difficult for him as a Sudanese citizen to do business. "Why go through the headache?" he added. "Why not put your money somewhere where it's welcome?"

In 2002, Sudanese investors opened a new Coca-Cola factory, with Coke syrup legally exported to Sudan under an exemption for food and medicine. The $140-million plant churns out 100,000 bottles of Coke, Sprite and Fanta per hour, and factory owners have even adopted liberal employment policies, giving jobs to deaf women along the assembly line.

All this new investment is literally redrawing Khartoum's skyline. Four years ago, the Libyan government began building a 24-story, five-star hotel on the banks of the Nile. The hotel is nearly finished and boasts a level of luxury unknown in Sudan until now — it has an indoor pool, squash courts, an espresso bar and spa.

In 2004, the first proper mall arrived in Khartoum, brought by a Turkish company, complete with a Wal-Mart-size megastore called the Hypermarket. It is place where men in white robes and women covered in black head to toe pluck toilet paper, dates and Pepsi from the shelves as Sudanese elevator music plays in the background.

In 2005, many people here hoped the American sanctions would be lifted and the economy would hit warp speed after Sudan's leaders, coaxed by American mediators, made peace with southern rebels. But by that point the conflict in Darfur was raging, and relations with the United States only turned frostier.

"We felt like the Americans betrayed us," said the Sudanese foreign minister, Lam Akol.

Still, Sudan had already learned to rely on the East, and because of oil exports, the economy had gained a stable momentum of its own. Inflation is now 6 percent; investment and development are reaching beyond downtown Khartoum to Sudan's central agricultural belt and to Juba, the main city in the south.

But Sudan is a huge country, Africa's largest, at nearly a million square miles. Enormous swaths of territory are still neglected, and growing class differences could sow the seeds of further unrest. Rebel groups in Darfur and other areas, eager for their share of oil profits and power, pose another problem.

Business leaders say the biggest danger would be if the United States succeeded in persuading Sudan's Asian and Middle Eastern trading partners to join the boycott.

"The Americans are not a threat, but if the international community lines up against us, ahh, that is a different issue," said Osama Daoud Abdellatif, chairman of the DAL Group, a conglomerate that owns the Coke factory, the Ozone Café and a number of other businesses. "Everything has been going so well, but Darfur could spoil the party."

Russia Ends Some Suspensions Of Foreign Agencies (NYT)

By C.J. Chivers

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 23 — The Russian government said Monday that it had begun registering private foreign organizations whose operations in Russia were suspended last week, and that it was rushing to review the amended applications of at least 65 other organizations, which remained idled.

Among the groups granted permission to resume work were some that Russian officials had sharply criticized, saying they were encouraging revolutions or meddling in Russia's domestic affairs. They included the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs and the International Republican Institute.

Both groups, whose work includes offering training for domestic political parties and movements, had been suspended last week under a new Russian law that limits the work of foreign groups. Both confirmed that they had been notified in writing that they could resume work.

"We're functioning as we normally would as of today," Lisa Gates, a spokeswoman for the International Republican Institute, said by telephone from the group's office in Washington.

The new law has drawn international criticism as a veiled effort to muzzle critics of the Kremlin and groups that promote social activism, political parties, rule of law, news media freedom and anticorruption awareness.

The new law sets stringent reporting requirements, including the deadline last week for each group to submit details about its origins, history, goals and organization. The detail is fine enough to require such facts as the passport numbers of each of a group's founders, no matter how long ago the group was formed, and whether the founder remains part of the group, or is even alive.

The deadline was seen as the first test of whether Russia would use the law to restrict a group's activities. And when it passed, many groups found they had been temporarily suspended, including dozens of American organizations, prompting Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to inquire about the law when she visited Moscow over the weekend.

The Russian government insisted the suspensions had resulted from the failure of the groups to fill out the forms properly, but many groups noted that the suspensions included those most critical of the Kremlin or most active in grass-roots politics here, including Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International.

Both of those groups were still suspended Monday, according to the latest Russian list. But Russian officials said that of about 190 organizations seeking registration, only 65 to 68 remained suspended, and that all of their applications would be reviewed in less than 30 days.

"No political issues are involved in the decision-making," said Galina A. Fokina, acting head of the office in the Ministry of Justice that is responsible for the registration. "All issues are based on legal issues dealing with filling out the forms."

Three more groups were approved Monday, pending only a signature by the office's director, Ms. Fokina said. She declined to provide the group's names, but said she expected that they would be made public on Tuesday once the director signed the forms.

Interviews with organizations that remain suspended showed how strict the ministry's reading of law had been.

The American Bar Association's program in Russia, the Central Europe and Eurasian Law Initiative, remained suspended Monday, it was told, because its filing submission had not listed the program's name in exactly the same way on each form.

On some papers, the name ended with the word "Incorporated," the group's office manager said, and on others with the abbreviation "Inc."

The manager, Olga G. Lapunova, said the group had resubmitted all of its filings with "Incorporated" and hoped to be registered next week. "There has been nothing dramatic so far," she said. "They are technical, minor changes."

Other groups noted that even if they were approved, other requirements could still undermine their ability to work, including a full annual plan that must be submitted by next week. The groups said the requirements for the plan were at once vast and vague, leaving them unsure what to submit, and worried that any submission the government did not like could be ground for future suspensions.

Clashes Disrupt Hungary's Celebration Of Anti-Soviet Revolt (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

WARSAW, Oct. 23 — Violent clashes in Budapest on Monday as the police tried to contain a month-old antigovernment protest movement marred the 50th anniversary of Hungary's uprising against Soviet domination.

The police used rubber bullets, tear gas and a water cannon to disperse thousands of protesters who had gathered for a rally after a group of them took control of a Soviet-era T-34 tank that was on display for the commemorations and drove it toward the police. About two dozen people were injured, none seriously.

The rally was one of several held over the past month calling for the resignation of the Socialist prime minister, Ferenc Gyurcsany, after the leak of a tape recording in which he told fellow party members that he had lied about the economy to win national elections in April.

Mr. Gyurcsany, whose party governs in a coalition with the Free Democrat Party, won a vote of confidence this month.

The leaders of the rally wanted to take advantage of the anniversary to press for Mr. Gyurcsany's resignation.

But the clashes bore little resemblance to the 1956 uprising, which ended when Soviet tanks entered the city and opened fire. Thousands of Hungarians were killed in the fighting then, and hundreds more were later executed or imprisoned.

"Despite the often justified disappointment and discontent, the majority of Hungarians believe that parliamentary democracy is the most suited to express people's will and to create law and give a program to a free Hungary," the prime minister said Monday in a speech in Parliament commemorating the 1956 uprising.

Hungary held its first free elections in 1990 and joined the European Union in 2004. But its democratic and capitalistic transition has come with complications.

The country, which had liberalized its economy ahead of others in Central Europe, quickly became a magnet for foreign investment. But government spending and inflation have crept steadily higher, causing concern among foreign investors, who have called for painful economic reforms.

Mr. Gyurcsany, who promised tax cuts during his party's campaign, has since raised taxes and cut benefits in order to control the ballooning budget deficit, now about 10 percent of overall economic output.

In the recording that gave rise to the protests against his government, he admitted to having lied about the economy. But he has contended that the comments were made in the context of a call for his party to be more serious about reforms.

Near Heroes' Square, a few miles away from the clashes, Mr. Gyurcsany briefly attended the unveiling of a monument commemorating 1956 but left as several hundred people mocked him by chanting phrases from his speech back at him and shouted, "Gyurcsany, go away!"

Many people on the streets called him a dictator and complained that political life continued to be dominated by people from the Communist era. Mr. Gyurcsany began his political career as an official of the Young Communist Organization. The Socialist Party is a successor to the Communist Hungarian Socialist Workers Party, which ruled the country until 1989.

"We should learn from the spirit of '56," said a university student who would give his name only as Marci. "We should finish off what began in 1956, because in 1989 there wasn't really a complete change."

Violence associated with the current protests has been limited to vandalism by fringe groups, and Mr. Gyurcsany's government has not tried to stop the protests or interfered with protesters camped in front of Parliament. Those protesters were moved away from the building early Sunday in order to clear the way for Monday's ceremonies, but their tents remained and they were expected to resume their vigil on Tuesday.

The clashes on Monday occurred as the police tried to keep the rally of tens of thousands of people, stretching from Astoria Junction to Deak Square, from moving back toward Parliament. The violence began when some demonstrators managed to commandeer the tank on display at Deak Square.

"The whole crowd started cheering" as the protesters started to drive the tank, [a news agency] quoted its cameraman, Fedja Grulovic, as saying. "The police started firing teargas, then the tank stopped."

Some protesters responded by throwing stones. Mounted police officers with rubber batons and a water cannon were brought in to clear the area.

Beijing Hosts Big Africa Summit As West Watches (WSJ)

By Shai Oster

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

BEIJING -- China will strike a number of agreements on trade, investment, aid and debt forgiveness when it hosts the heads of 48 African countries next month in what is being billed as the biggest summit China has held in modern history, according to the Chinese official heading the effort.

"The main objective of this summit is to establish a new type of partnership between China and African countries against changing circumstances," Assistant Foreign Minister Zhai Jun said yesterday in an interview.

The gathering in Beijing, dubbed the Forum on China-Africa Cooperation, is set for Nov. 3 to 5. It comes as many African leaders seek help to repair their strife-torn countries and China looks for new resources to meet its growing energy needs, as well as new markets for its own emerging domestic companies. It caps growing ties between the two regions over the past several years that have sparked some ire in the West.

Mr. Zhai defended China's human-rights record in Africa and said China isn't interested merely in striking sweetheart deals to tap into Africa's deep oil reserves. Rather, he said, China is eager to raise living standards in the world's poorest continent, and feels it can share lessons and opportunities from its own development.

"Africa is rich in resources and has a big market. We are pursuing our relations by seeking mutual benefits, in an open and transparent manner. China has nothing to hide," Mr. Zhai said.

Last year, China imported 38.4 million tons of oil from Africa, or about 771,000 barrels a day. Mr. Zhai pointed out that is less than one-third of the amount some big Western nations receive from Africa. The U.S., for example, imports about 2.4 million barrels a day from Africa, more than it gets from the Middle East.

Western oil companies fear their Chinese competitors are able to use government backing for aid deals and loans to secure preferential treatment. China says that in terms of business, its deals are purely commercial and transparent. So far, China's companies have a much smaller presence than other international players, but they are looking to expand to feed China's fast-growing needs for fuel.

Mr. Zhai said there would be further cooperation on energy. "For many African countries, energy is a pillar industry. Many nations want to transform their oil into a strength through our cooperation. We are helping them meet such a goal," Mr. Zhai said.

Agreements in several key areas are expected to be announced by China's President Hu Jintao and signed during the meeting. To encourage more imports from Africa, an expansion of the number of African goods that would be subject to zero-percent tariffs in China is likely to be included in the pacts. Currently, some 190 goods, from 28 African countries, are exempt from tariffs. There will also be pledges for more aid, including training in everything from medicine to agriculture, and investment in Africa. Mr. Zhai said the government is actively encouraging Chinese companies to expand their business in Africa.

While he didn't disclose how much in loans African countries owe China, he said China would announce another round of debt cancellation. He said China's loans were a small proportion of the $284 billion in debt Africa owes globally. China has already forgiven some $10 billion of debt in yuan-denominated loans, mostly from infrastructure projects, he said.

Last year, the Paris Club of big Western lenders forgave roughly $50 billion of African debt. Some critics are worried that China is giving fresh loans to regimes that still don't have the ability to spend the money responsibly or fight corruption, and that such waste will only send those nations back into a cycle of carrying loans they can't pay off. Increasingly, Western nations are seeking to tie aid with specific guarantees from governments on fiscal and social policy -- a policy China rejects.

"We don't want the development models, ideologies and values of other countries foisted on our country," Mr. Zhai said. "Likewise we don't impose our development mode, ideology and values on other countries -- not least on African countries. So, it has been the consistent position of the Chinese government when conducting aid with African countries that we do not attach conditions."

The summit marks 50 years since China first established diplomatic ties with Egypt, the first African nation to reject the island of Taiwan's claim as the sovereign over mainland China, then a deeply ideological, but poor, Communist state. China aggressively wooed African states with help and aid to convince them to switch sides.

Now, only five African countries, including Swaziland and Malawi, recognize Taiwan. Meanwhile, China has emerged as one of the biggest economies in the world with its own brand of capitalist authoritarianism that has transformed the relationship with Africa from a largely political one into a mostly commercial one.

Beijing will pull out all the stops to impress the delegations with its rapid economic growth, arranging trips to the Great Wall, and showing off the signs of its modern wealth, such as the commercial capital Shanghai. It will coordinate some 1,500 delegates and another 1,030 journalists from Africa, China and elsewhere. "Perhaps they will bring some lessons home when they have seen the changes that have taken place in China," Mr. Zhai said.

This comes as some in the U.S. and elsewhere are casting an increasingly wary eye at China's growing involvement in Africa, most recently in Sudan, where China has large oil interests. Mr. Zhai rejected allegations that China isn't doing enough to stem the violence in Darfur. "I believe the Darfur issue and China's economic and energy cooperation and trade are two separate issues. It is not the case that because of the good relationship and cooperation with the Sudanese government that we're turning a blind eye to the situation in Darfur."

He criticized U.S. policy. "The United States has unilateral sanctions -- has it been useful?" he asked.

EU To Get Tougher On China Trade (WSJ)

By John W. Miller

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

BRUSSELS -- The European Union is due to unveil a plan today that charts a tougher approach to China as its trade deficit with the Asian giant soars.

The change in strategy is driven by the desire to quell protectionist sentiment at home and strengthen Europe's hand when it renegotiates a trade agreement with China, European officials say.

Until now, Europe has opened its markets to Chinese imports but made few modifications to a trade relationship last outlined in a deal with Beijing struck more than 20 years ago.

The plan, to be announced today by the European Commission, the EU's executive body, is aimed at persuading Beijing to open more markets, crack down on technology theft and allow its currency to strengthen. If Beijing doesn't comply, the EU would take action to protect its own interests, including the imposition of new antidumping duties, according to EU documents that summarize the commission's plan. The EU already has punitive antidumping tariffs on imports of Chinese shoes and more than 30 other goods.

"China needs to demonstrate its commitment to open markets, fair competition and responsible leadership," the documents say. The EU will increase pressure on Beijing to let its currency appreciate, according to the documents. That could help reduce the size of the trade deficit by making Chinese imports more expensive to buy in the EU.

The EU's trade deficit with China ballooned to €106.8 billion ($134.77 billion) last year from €48.6 billion in 2000. That is starting to approach the scale of the U.S. trade deficit with China, which in 2005 was above $200 billion. The scale of Chinese imports to the EU and the perceived threat to EU jobs have until recent years been much smaller than in the U.S., where fears about China's manufacturing strength have driven U.S. policy for years. The EU's plan of tougher language toward China mirrors that of the U.S.

Chinese officials say the EU would be making a mistake to try to penalize it over the trade deficit. "China's been making a lot of efforts" in areas such as tackling counterfeiting and intellectual-copyright theft, said Shaoxin Wang, spokesman for the Chinese mission to the EU.

EU officials say trade with China has helped the EU by tempering inflation and boosting the profits of European companies, such as retail titans Carrefour SA and Tesco PLC, which rely on cheap Chinese imports to boost sales. But the rise of imports has begun to stir protectionist fears in EU countries with high labor costs.

A surge in imports of manufactured goods such as shoes, laptops and cellphones is behind the EU's trade deficit with China. EU imports of Chinese shoes have more than doubled since 2000, to €4.8 billion from €2 billion, hurting shoe producers in countries like Italy. Imports of electronic goods have risen to €37.3 billion from €15.9 billion over the same period.

The commission hopes the strategy will eventually lead to a reciprocal relationship by creating opportunities in China, most likely in service industries such as insurance, consulting, law and banking.

The EU is due next year to renegotiate its 1985 partnership agreement with China, which includes trade. If the stalled talks on a global trade deal, known as the Doha round, fail to revive, EU officials say they may seek an additional trade accord with China.

"There is a bargain to be struck in which Europe commits to maintaining its own openness even in the face of the toughest competition, and China acts to ensure that that competition is fair and that EU businesses get a fair shot in the Chinese market," the EU background papers say.

European business lobbies such as Unice, which represents 2.2 million businesses, complain they don't get a fair deal with China. For example, car companies aren't allowed to own their own subsidiaries in China, and must partner with a Chinese company. Car makers say they are forced by high customs duties to buy parts from local suppliers, rather than import their own. The EU, the U.S. and Canada have a joint case pending at the World Trade Organization demanding China cut the tariffs.

The EU today also will ask about progress on China's commitment to fully liberalize its banking sector by the end of this year. Because of regulatory restrictions, Unice says, European banks get just 2% of the market for Chinese banking services, despite having strong competitive advantages.

Analysts say the EU should move carefully on any threats to bring more antidumping cases if China doesn't cooperate. "Getting tough with China is a dangerous game," says David Kernohan of the Centre for European Policy Studies in Brussels, adding that China could freeze the EU out of its markets and strike deals with other players instead.

Chinese Checks (WSJ)

By Harry Harding

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

China's economy has proved a seductress that's hard for investors to resist. From encouraging foreign direct investment to signing up with the WTO, Beijing has embraced foreign capital and know-how. Foreigners, in large part, have been rewarded with double-digit growth rates and cheap labor. But this happy affair is running into problems: Over the last few months, there is a growing perception that foreign companies have done too well from their investments. The Party leadership has publicly accused a few of capturing "excessive" market shares, acquiring too many stakes in China's strategic industries, and buying state assets at bargain prices. Above all, there seems to be a concern that overseas investors own too much of the technology crucial to China's economic development.

These sentiments aren't only murmured in private. Li Deshui, a former economic official, was quoted in March as criticizing "malicious acquisitions aimed at establishing monopolies." He cited beer, soft drinks and skin-care products as areas where foreign companies had done too well at the expense of their local counterparts.

Beijing's defensive economic nationalism is not primarily about restricting imports, although there has been some of this. For instance, China's high tariffs on imported automobile parts are currently the target of a case being brought before the WTO by the U.S. and the European Union.

The main focus is on making it more difficult for foreign companies to operate in China. Take foreign ownership of local companies operating in "strategic sectors," such as banking and brokerage houses. The most prominent example so far has been Beijing's rejection of Citigroup's attempt to buy 45% of Guangdong Development Bank last year, as part of a consortium that would have taken majority control. Despite the state-owned lender's heavy losses, Beijing refused to waive the 20% cap on the stake any single foreign investor can take in a Chinese bank. As a result, Citigroup was forced to scale down its bid, as were other foreign banks interested in buying Guangdong Development Bank. The deal has yet to be completed.

China's regulators are even designating automobile and machine-tool companies as sensitive sectors, making foreign acquisitions in these areas subject to particularly stringent scrutiny. Earlier this year, Hangzhou Advanced Gearbox Group halted three years of talks on a joint venture with Germany's ZF Group, saying it would be a mistake to give the foreign automotive-supplier company greater access to the Chinese market. Last week, private-equity fund Carlyle Group agreed to buy 50% of Xugong Group Construction Machinery Co. -- hardly the 85% it had originally intended to purchase. This followed a high-profile campaign against the deal by Sany Heavy Industries Co., one of Xugong's main domestic competitors.

Beijing is also placing new obstacles in the way of foreign companies that seek to establish independent, wholly owned operations in the mainland. Beijing has officially complied with its commitment to open up the domestic construction market, as part of the agreement on China's accession to the WTO in 2001. But it has placed formidable obstacles in the way of foreign companies trying to take advantage of this opportunity. Under regulations issued in December 2003, these companies are required to employ at least 200 staff in China before being allowed to sign any contracts in the country. Foreign companies wanting to compete for infrastructure projects must also have at least $36 million in registered capital in China.

Beijing's regulators are now codifying further protectionist language into law. In September, six ministries enacted regulations that give the Ministry of Commerce expanded power to block foreign purchases of local companies. The law's language is vague; a purchase that disturbs "the social or economic order or harm the public interest," for instance, could be reviewed. Foreign investors are also fretting about the country's new antimonopoly law, which has been drafted but not yet enacted.

China is also attempting to build "national champions" that can compete with foreign companies in the global marketplace. Beijing is well aware that, despite the country's integration into the global economy, it currently occupies a narrow slice of the value chain. China serves mainly as an assembly platform for manufactured goods, albeit of increasing sophistication. While that role brings in considerable revenue, it only represents a small fraction of the total value of the country's export goods. Other links in that value chain earn far more, such as research and development, product design, branding, marketing and distribution. The best-known examples of this trend are Lenovo's acquisition of IBM's personal computing division, and the creation of a Chinese-controlled joint venture between TCL and Thomson to produce television sets. The purchases help Beijing pursue its goal of boasting 50 of the world's 500 largest companies within the next decade.

This goal is laudable, taken on its own. The problem for foreign companies is that Beijing is willing to use tactics which give their Chinese counterparts an unfair advantage. These measures include state subsidies through politically motivated bank lending at below-market rates. For instance, Cnooc Ltd.'s abortive bid for Unocal Corp. last year was backed by several billion dollars in cheap loans from its government-owned parent company. It's also possible in future that Beijing will challenge patents and cap domestic retail prices to reduce the royalties paid to foreign patent and copyright holders.

China's economic nationalism is a marginal adjustment to, rather than a fundamental repudiation of, Beijing's broader embrace of globalization. As China's Commerce Minister Bo Xilai has argued, Beijing will not abandon the foreign economic policies that have served it so well. There's also no shortage of critics of economic nationalism within China, both among economists committed to free-market models, and among local companies who fear their own competitiveness may be compromised by state interference in the economy.

Nonetheless, the protectionist backlash is unlikely to go away anytime soon. Other "China risk" factors may receive far more publicity -- from the threat of a financial crisis to a political collapse, or even a conflict with the U.S. over Taiwan. But for companies doing business with China, it is the new surge in economic nationalism that poses, by far, the biggest threat for the foreseeable future.

Mr. Harding, director of research and analysis at Eurasia Group, chaired the firm's task force on the risks associated with developments in China over the next 10 years.

China Sees Religion As Stabilizing Force (WT/AP)

By Joe Mcdonald

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

BEIJING -- Chinese officials have expressed interest in the role of religion in improving society, the archbishop of Canterbury said yesterday at the end of the first trip to China in 12 years by a leader of the Church of England.

The Anglican Communion will expand efforts to help the state-sanctioned Protestant church train clergy, as communist leaders look to religion to help stabilize society during a time of wrenching change and explosive growth in Christianity in China, Archbishop Rowan Williams said.

His two-week visit also highlighted Anglicans' limited but longtime ties to China, in contrast to the Roman Catholic Church's lack of relations with Beijing.

Chinese officials discussed the role of religion in "building a harmonious society," said Archbishop Williams, referring to the Communist Party phrase for efforts to spread prosperity and ease tensions over the gap between China's rich and poor.

One senior official talked about "the potential significance of Christian Sunday schools in backing up the growth of a mature and stable public morality," Archbishop Williams said at a press conference.

The Church of England and China's Protestant church agreed to work toward having Anglican theologians teach in China and Chinese seminarians study abroad, said Archbishop Williams. He said they discussed foreign help to expand Chinese seminary libraries and to train religious scholars.

Archbishop Williams avoided open criticism of Beijing's controls on religious activity, but said the government could explain its rules more clearly so the faithful know what is permitted.

"I think there is a remarkable amount of freedom of initiative for a number of religious groups," he said. "We're content to work with a church which we see to be lively and active and capable of taking initiative."

Archbishop Williams said he asked Chinese officials about six Protestant and Catholic church members who he said were jailed or harassed for religious activity. He said the officials asked him to submit more details and had not replied.

Christian Solidarity Worldwide (CSW), a religious-freedom group that monitors the detention of priests and members of unregistered churches in China, said the archbishop did not meet the real church.

Greener Pastures To Stop Dust Bowl, Mongolia Builds 'Great Wall' Of Trees (WSJ)

By Patrick Barta

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

DALANZADGAD, Mongolia -- The great Gobi Desert has camels with two humps, a rare breed of desert bear, and some of Asia's last remaining nomads. One thing it doesn't have is shade.

Batchuluun Doorov is trying to change that. Each morning, he travels by motorcycle to a remote desert outpost, rouses his assistants, and begins watering thousands of scraggly trees rising up from the sand. Workers planted the trees months ago, and now they form a thin green line across the horizon in one of the most barren places on earth.

"In the future, when this becomes like a forest, I will be proud," Mr. Batchuluun said one recent morning as he ambled between saplings and fished a cigarette from his pocket. Dry winds howled around him. A few hundred yards away, bleached bones baked in the sun.

More than 2,000 years ago, China began to build the Great Wall. Today, Mongolia is building its own seemingly implausible version: a zigzagging line of pines, willows, oleasters, junipers, hawthorns, aspens and other trees it hopes will someday stretch more than 2,000 miles across the desert. The so-called "Green Wall" is expected to take 30 years to complete and cost some $150 million or more.

The wall is necessary, Mongolia says, to protect itself and the wider world from an increasingly serious problem: Gobi dust, kicked up by Central Asian storms strong enough to rip the paint off Mongolian cars and then carried eastward across Asia and beyond.

Dust storms from the Gobi, which spans southern Mongolia and northern China and is almost twice the size of Texas, have darkened the skies of China and Korea in recent years, closing airports and triggering widespread respiratory illnesses. A whirlwind this spring dumped an estimated 300,000 tons of sand and grit on Beijing, burying cars, houses and trees in a thick layer of sand.

According to Chinese records, big sandstorms reached Beijing only once or twice every seven years in the 1950s, and only every two or three years in the 1970s. Now they are an annual problem, with many arriving from beyond Chinese borders. While the storms usually happen in spring, many in China worry the Gobi gusts could cake the 2008 Beijing summer Olympics in sand, eclipsing the nation's moment in the global sun.

Gobi storms have even made their way to the U.S., where weather officials blame Mongolian soil for dust storms up and down the West Coast, including one that clouded Utah skies in 2001. Scientists have found traces of the Gobi as far away as Kansas.

The amount of Mongolia's land that is suffering from desertification -- land that either has no vegetation at all or is slowly losing it -- could be as much as 50,000 square miles, an area the size of New York state, according to a leading Mongolian environmental group called Sain Uils, which means "good will" in Mongolian. Mongolia's Ministry of Nature and Environment says 683 rivers have dried up in recent years due to encroaching desert.

Mongolia's government and scientists say global warming is partly to blame. Average temperatures in Mongolia have climbed nearly 3.6 degrees Fahrenheit since the 1940s, according to the Ministry of Nature and Environment. At the same time, it says there is about 10% less rainfall in the Gobi itself now versus the 1940s -- fewer than three inches a year in parts of the desert.

Changes in human behavior are also playing a role. Herdsmen have added more goats to their herds in recent years to boost production of cashmere, a valuable commodity in Mongolia's landlocked economy. Unfortunately, the omnivorous goats do more damage to the soil than other livestock because they eat plant roots, too, contributing to desertification.

The question is whether planting thousands of saplings can actually help keep the soil in place.

Some countries have done it successfully. In the U.S., for instance, Franklin D. Roosevelt's administration planted "shelter belts" of trees to block wind as part of its successful effort to rehabilitate the American Dust Bowl in the 1930s.

But those efforts included other programs to boost their effectiveness, such as money for farmers who agreed to change their behavior to promote soil conservation. In the case of Mongolia, many international experts think officials are taking the wrong approach, in part because the country doesn't have enough money to ensure a broad-based solution.

It's not an easy problem to solve. Not much grows in the Gobi, which unlike the sandy dunes of the Sahara is mostly a barren expanse of gravellike plains, mountains and valleys. Winter temperatures can drop to minus 40 degrees Fahrenheit, followed by highs above 110 degrees in the summer.

Another problem is that the Gobi has fewer than three people per square mile. That means there aren't many folks around to care for the trees, including protecting them from wandering nomads who might topple them for fuel -- or for fun. It also means watching out for other threats to saplings like rabbits and cows.

"I can think of a million reasons why there is just no reason this is going to work," says Jayne Belnap, a research ecologist for the U.S. Geological Survey in Utah, who has studied Mongolian soil extensively. "If you talk to any scientist, they will start laughing."

Difficult Changes

Ms. Belnap and others think Mongolia should focus on reducing the number of animals in nomads' herds. But doing so could require difficult social changes in Mongolia, where some 40% of the country's 2.8 million residents work in rural endeavors such as herding.

For much of the 20th century, Mongolia was a communist state supported by the Soviet Union, which propped up the local economy. Central planners regulated the size of herds, which helped to prevent overgrazing.

When the Soviet Union collapsed in the early 1990s, so did Mongolia's economy, forcing many urban residents to flee to the countryside as herders.

The result: too many animals. Many of the animals stayed thin and unproductive, which in turn encouraged herders to add more. Today, Mongolia has as many as 30 million head of livestock -- more than 10 times its human population. The introduction of more goats for cashmere only added to the problem.

Foreign agricultural experts urge Mongolia to promote deeper changes, including adopting feedlot practices now common in the U.S. and other nations. The U.S. once had similarly wide-open spaces where animals roamed across big stretches of land, but those animals were eventually cordoned off into fattening lots and corporate farms. That process used less land and boosted productivity.

Doing that, though, could ultimately mean the end of the road for many of Mongolia's nomads. Much of the country's rural population lives in small family units that have their own herds and move around in search of forage. The nomadic herder culture is critical to Mongolia's identity, much like the cowboy once was to the American West.

Mongolian officials are plowing ahead with tree-planting instead. The Green Wall project allows them to respond to foreign governments and local constituents clamoring for action on the dust problem. Mongolian officials also hope the idea will help attract money from foreign donors, and create jobs in rural areas caring for the trees.

Mongolia has declared the project a national priority and obtained support from a handful of sources, including Rotary Club chapters in Mongolia and South Korea. The government and volunteers together have planted more than 360,000 trees at various sites over the past two years, with the Rotary Club running some of its own tree-planting operations. Some volunteers sing Rotary Club songs as they work.

But many foreign donors, including the United Nations, declined to contribute because they doubt the project's efficacy.

Avirmed Auyrzana, head of the Green Wall National Program at the Ministry of Nature and Environment, acknowledges that between 20% and 50% of the newly planted Gobi trees die and that the project is underfunded. He has just five employees and works from a 10-foot-wide cubbyhole in an old Soviet-style office block overlooking a parking lot in the Mongolian capital of Ulaanbaatar.

"If people do not have any agricultural experience, of course they will be skeptical," he says. But he adds that he is certain the project will work.

Down in the Gobi, enthusiasm runs high. This is especially true in Dalanzadgad, a desolate town of 15,000 people a few hours north of the Chinese border. Dalanzadgad could use some green. Wild dogs roam in packs, and dust regularly blows across city streets. A massive trash dump sits outside of town -- a repository for everything from old tires to the discarded rib cages of livestock. And then the Gobi takes over, spreading out in all directions.

Rotary Club officials in Mongolia hired a 38-year-old former Mongolian stockbroker named Jambaldagva Yondonjunai to monitor their operations on the ground. Mr. Jambaldagva patrols town in a gray Russian van emblazoned with the words, "Keep Mongolia Green." During a recent visit, he complained of stomach pains from eating bad marmot, a groundhoglike creature common in these parts.

"When I drive by, all the people recognize me," he said. "People say, you're doing a good thing -- you're doing something for the motherland."

Part of Mr. Jambaldagva's job involves driving across the rocky landscape to visit the trees and crews who water and watch over them. After three years, the saplings should be strong enough to survive on their own, project supporters say.

Sometimes the trees don't make it. At Moltsog Els, a collection of golden dunes an hour or so from Dalanzadgad, workers trucked in hundreds of stones to pin down the sand and then planted trees between the rocks. Then a freak desert rainstorm struck, uprooting or drowning the trees. Now, stones lie scattered across the dunes with brown twigs poking upward from the sand.

Other sites are considered a huge success, like one near Bulgan, a town two hours west of Dalanzadgad. Workers planted several thousand trees there, and about 90% have survived.

It has taken a lot of work. A half-dozen locals, including two watchmen, must water the trees daily with a hose fed by an underground aquifer.

"Sometimes it's hard holding the hoses," says 33-year-old Iderzaya Orgoi, a former nomad who gave away her herd to look for other kinds of work, and landed a job caring for the trees. Still, "I'm very sure" the project will work, she says.

Another Hurdle

Ms. Belnap, the U.S.-based soil expert, says she doesn't doubt the trees will grow for a while, and that some of the trees may thrive. But she sees another potential hurdle: salt. Many of Mongolia's underground water sources contain water that's high in salinity, she says. As that water is tapped to nurse trees, it will accumulate in the soil and eventually poison the same trees it sustains.

Work is proceeding anyway, with a variety of additional tree-planting schemes sprouting around the area. In Dalanzadgad, one local woman enthusiastically reports that the government has offered to pay her the local equivalent of $2.57 a tree if she nurses 10 of them to maturity over three years.

Then there's the patch of green headed up by Mr. Batchuluun, near a place called Juulchin Gobi, a tourist tent camp some 40 minutes overland from Dalanzadgad. Workers planted saplings for a stretch of two miles or longer.

Using nearby wells and irrigation channels, Mr. Batchuluun and his team walked up and down the rows daily during the summer, watering each tree at least two times a week. Standing shirtless with a safari hat on his head on a recent day, Mr. Batchuluun said that about 80% of his trees have lived. Some are so tall, he added, that he sometimes can't see other workers when they wander out into the foliage.

While a few miles of trees isn't much in the vast desert, Mr. Batchuluun thinks enough trees will flourish to make a difference.

"The children will be very proud," he said. "They [will] look back and think: This was the beginning of everything."

Britain Is Turning On The U.S. — At Its Own Peril (USAT)

By Melanie Phillips

Everyone knows that Europe is a continent stuffed with craven, terror-appeasing fromages who loathe America. Britain, by contrast, led by the lion-hearted Tony Blair, is full of stalwarts who stand shoulder to shoulder with the United States in the defense of the West. Right?

Wrong. Fury at Prime Minister Blair for being President Bush's “poodle” has reached such a pitch that the most successful Labor prime minister in memory is being forced out of office because of his support for U.S. policy in Iraq and Israel. Labor's members of Parliament say his refusal to break with America by calling for an earlier cease-fire in Lebanon was the last straw. The disturbing fact is that Britain is consumed by a rampant anti-Americanism and an allied hostility toward Israel, which are driving public debate into irrationality, prejudice and appeasement.

In a Populus poll last month in The Times of London, 62% said the government should change its policy by distancing itself from the United States, being more critical of Israel and declaring a timetable for withdrawing from Iraq. An August YouGov poll in The Spectator magazine revealed that while 53% wanted a tougher anti-terrorism policy, 45% wanted to be allied more closely with the European Union than with America. Only 14% supported closer U.S. ties.

As a result, the prospects for the alliance between Britain and the United States in the post-Blair era do not look promising. Despite being an instinctive Atlanticist, Gordon Brown, the most likely successor as Labor prime minister, is thought to be only a reluctant backer of the war in Iraq, according to a new autobiography by former Labor minister David Blunkett.

Meanwhile David Cameron, the new young leader of the opposition Conservative Party, made a speech last month distancing himself from U.S. foreign policy and blaming America for fanning the flames of anti-Americanism. The outcome might be that Britain increasingly snuggles up to the EU over foreign policy while an irritated America, bereft of its principal advocate in Europe, moves toward isolationism.

Much of Britain's anti-Americanism is driven by the usual suspects, such as far-left lawmaker George Galloway or newspapers such as the ultra-left Guardian. Galloway, for instance, said during an interview with GQ magazine earlier this year that the assassination of Blair by a suicide bomber would be "morally justified."

Left-wing discourse, now staple fare on the BBC and applauded even by conservatively minded audiences in panel discussions, proclaims that the United States is the fount of Third World oppression and the greatest threat to world peace.

But British animosity toward the U.K.'s most important and historic ally is wider and deeper. Partly it derives from simple snobbery, the long-standing British belief that Americans are vulgar upstarts who lack the gravitas that Britain has accrued from a thousand years of history.

Probe further, however, and you discover anguish at the progressive junking of that history. Schools, for example, no longer teach the history or values of the British nation on the grounds that national identity based on a majority culture is viewed as "racist." Instead, they promote multiculturalism, the doctrine that minority value must have equal status to those of the majority. Loss of confidence in Britain's role in the world has demoralized its governing class so badly that it has come to believe that the nation state is the principal source of all ills from prejudice to war, and that legitimacy resides instead in supranational institutions.

So no international action can be taken without sanctification by that holy of holies, the United Nations. As a result, the British regard Bush's "unilateral" foreign policy with undiluted horror. This is made worse by disdain for Bush himself, regarded as a tongue-tied cowboy who actually believes in God — to the post-religious British, the nearest thing to a certificate of lunacy.

The biggest single cause of British anti-Americanism, however, is Israel. Despite being the target for more than half a century of genocidal Arab and Muslim aggression, Israel is widely perceived in Britain as the regional bully, and its acts of self-defense are viewed as the principal motor behind both the Middle East impasse and Islamic grievance because of its supposed refusal to allow the Palestinians to have a state of their own.

Thus John Denham, chairman of the parliamentary Home Affairs Select Committee, wrote that Israel's policies were making Britain a target for terror. America brought the 9/11 attacks upon itself, goes this type of thinking, because of its support for Israel — and the only reason Britain is now threatened by Islamic terror is because of Blair's support for the United States.

This has opened a Pandora's box of anti-Jewish prejudice in Britain.

A recent report by the Parliamentary Committee Against Antisemitism found that since 2000, anti-Semitism is on the rise in Britain. It is now common to read in the news media, for example, that the Jews are engaged in a global conspiracy that has subverted U.S. foreign policy to serve the interests of Israel and put the rest of the world at risk. In April, for instance, The Independent newspaper illustrated an interview on the subject of the "Israel lobby" in America with a picture of the American flag in which the stars of the union were replaced with the Stars of David. The headline: "The United States of Israel." Thus the prejudice against America is inextricably conflated with prejudice against Jews and the Jewish state.

The dismaying truth is that, even after the suicide bombings in London, America's defense of the free world against Islamic terror is widely viewed in Britain as the cause of that terror. The paranoid bigotry that drives the jihad — that the United States and its Jewish puppet masters make up a giant conspiracy of evil — is being increasingly echoed within Britain's non-Muslim population.

The very idea that weakening the alliance with the United States would be in Britain's interests is madness. But in a country that has lost its way, rationality is a commodity in short supply.

Veiled Insult (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Quite a long time ago, having briefly joined the herd of 20-something backpackers that eternally roams Southeast Asia, I found myself in Bali. Like all of the other 20-somethings, I carefully read the Lonely Planet backpacker's guide to Indonesia and learned, among other things, that it was considered improper for women to wear shorts or trousers when entering Balinese temples. I dutifully purchased a Balinese sarong and, looking awkward and foreign, wore it while visiting temples. I didn't want to cause offense.

I thought of that long-ago incident during a visit last week to London, where a full-fledged shouting match has broken out over Muslim women who choose to wear the veil. This particular argument had begun because a teaching assistant in Yorkshire refused to remove her veil -- a niqab , which covers the whole body except for the eyes -- in the presence of male teachers, which was much of the time. She was fired; she went to court -- and a clutch of senior British politicians entered the fray.

Jack Straw, the former foreign secretary, called the full-face veil "a visible statement of separation and of difference." Tony Blair, the prime minister, added that he could "see the reason" for the teaching assistant to be suspended.

What followed was predictable: accusations of racism, charges of discrimination and disagreement about whether the veil was even a valid topic of discussion. If Blair and Straw were really concerned about Muslim women, shouldn't they be more interested in underage marriages, or wife beating, or something more important?

The short answer is, yes, probably. But the curious fact is that the veil, as a political issue, won't go away. The French have banned not only the full veil but head scarves in state schools. Some German regions have banned the head scarf for civil servants too, and they are not permitted in Turkish universities at all. Slowly, the issue is coming to the United States: Just this month a Michigan judge dismissed a small-claims court case filed by a Muslim woman because she refused to remove her full-face veil while testifying.

Critics call the veil a symbol of female oppression or rejection of Western values. Defenders say that it is a symbol of religious faith and that it allows women to be "free" in a different sense -- free from cosmetics, from fashion and from unwanted male attention. Debate about the veil inevitably leads to discussions of female emancipation, religious freedom and the assimilation, or lack thereof, of Muslim communities in the West.

And yet, at a much simpler level, surely it is also true that the full-faced veil -- the niqab, burqa or chador -- causes such deep reactions in the West not so much because of its political or religious symbolism but because it is extremely impolite. Just as it is considered rude to enter a Balinese temple wearing shorts, so, too, is it considered rude, in a Western country, to hide one's face. We wear masks when we want to frighten, when we are in mourning or when we want to conceal our identities. To a Western child -- or even an adult -- a woman clad from head to toe in black looks like a ghost. Thieves and actors hide their faces in the West; honest people look you straight in the eye.

Given that polite behavior is required in other facets of their jobs, it doesn't seem to me in the least offensive to require schoolteachers or civil servants to show their faces when dealing with children or the public. If Western tourists can wear sarongs in Balinese temples to show respect for the locals, so too can religious Muslim women show respect for the children they teach and the customers they serve by leaving their head scarves on, but removing their full-faced veils.

It would, of course, be outrageous if Tony Blair or the French government were to ban veils altogether -- just as it is outrageous that Saudi Arabia bans churches and even forbids priests from entering the country. But just because authorities persecute Christians and Jews in some parts of the Muslim world, that doesn't mean we need to emulate them. In their private lives, Muslim women living in the West should be free to use veils or head scarves as they wish. But freedom to practice religion in the West shouldn't imply freedom to hold jobs that impinge on that practice. An Orthodox Jew should not have an absolute right to work in a restaurant that is open only on Saturdays. A Quaker cannot join the Army and then state that his religion prohibits him from fighting. By the same token, a Muslim woman who wants to cover her face has no absolute right to work in a school or an office where face-to-face conversations are part of the job.

It isn't religious discrimination or anti-Muslim bias to tell her that she must be polite to the natives, respect the local customs, try to speak some of the local patois -- and uncover her face.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Praises New U.S. Military Law (UPI)

United Press International, October 24, 2006

LAKE BUENA VISTA, Fla., Oct. 23 (UPI) -- U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Monday praised the new Military Commissions Act, saying prisoners now have more rights than they did before.

Gonzales was speaking to a leadership convention of U.S. Judge Advocates General in Lake Buena Vista Fla., and echoed U.S. President George Bush's call for better tools to combat terrorists, whose cause, he said "is nothing less than a return to the Dark Ages."

He said the act, signed into law this month by Bush, gives individuals detained as enemy combatants at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, "greater legal rights than are provided to lawful prisoners of war under the Geneva Conventions.

"Although our enemy shows nothing but contempt for the law of war and the standards of civilized nations, we provide him with these protections because they are consistent with the values of the United States. These values are among the many hallmarks of civilization that separate us from them," Gonzales said.

BATTLE OVER TERROR LAW BEGINS (ABAJ)

By MOLLY McDONOUGH

ABA Journal, October 20, 2006

Detainees Challenge Measure Barring Habeas Petitions

Not long after the ink dried on President Bush's signature enacting the Military Commissions Act of 2006 on Oct. 17, lawyers for Guantanamo detainees filed notice of plans to challenge the legislation.

As Bush signed the act, he said it is "one of the most important pieces of legislation in the war on terror." Among other things, it grants the president the authority to establish military commissions to try detainees who have been designated enemy combatants and defines the policies and procedures of the commissions.

Speaking from the East Room at the White House, Bush said the "military commissions will provide a fair trial in which the accused are presumed innocent, have access to an attorney, and can hear all the evidence against them."

"These military commissions are lawful, they are fair, and they are necessary," he said.

But the detainees dispute the fairness and lawfulness of the act. Specifically, they challenge section 7, which strips the federal courts of jurisdiction to hear habeas petitions from those who are designated as enemy combatants or are awaiting such determinations.

Other critics have raised similar objections, including ABA President Karen J. Mathis, who outlined the ABA's concerns in a September letter.

Miami lawyer Neal R. Sonnett says, "The signing formalizes what is one of the worst pieces of legislation in decades. It sets back the rule of law substantially, especially the court-stripping provisions which the ABA will continue to fight." Sonnett chairs the ABA's Task Force on Treatment of Enemy Combatants.

It's no surprise to Sonnett that the habeas provisions are the first issues to surface in the courts because, he says, "there is no precedent to the wholesale stripping of rights that are in" the act.

Sonnett says the ABA, following on the heels of several other organizations, will be asking the government to allow time for the public to comment on the rules that are developed for the military commission trials.

A detainee whose case has already been to the U.S. Supreme Court has filed a motion asking for an opportunity to brief the issue. Salim Ahmed Hamdan filed the request in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, which was assigned to hear his claims challenging his detention for more than five years at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The Supreme Court ruled in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 126 S. Ct. 2749, earlier this year that the previous structure of the military commissions was unconstitutional, and it remanded his case to the D.C. court. (See "High Court Blocks Tribunals," ABA Journal eReport, June 30.)

Hamdan's motion argues "section 7 of the [act] is unconstitutional on multiple grounds" and doesn't strip the district court of jurisdiction to consider his detention claims. "The Constitution provides a right to habeas relief independent of statutory authorization, a privilege that has not been validly suspended."

Another group of detainees also filed a motion to file supplemental briefs on the court-stripping provisions in their cases, now before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. Their cases are pending under the captions Boumediene v. Bush, No. 05-5062, consolidated with No. 05-5063, and Al Odah v. United States, No. 05-5064, consolidated with Nos. 05-5095-05-5516.

In addition to wanting to argue about habeas protections, the detainees in the appellate group want a chance to explore whether the act "unconstitutionally nullifies the ability of the petitioners to pursue their claims under the Geneva Conventions" and whether it "unconstitutionally delegates to the executive powers reserved to the judicial branch."

But the government, in a letter filed with the court Oct. 17, objected to any more briefing in the Boumediene and Al Odah cases, saying the jurisdiction issue had already been argued and briefed. In the letter, Catherine Y. Hancock, an appellate attorney in the Justice Department's civil division, argued the Military Commissions Act "unambiguously eliminates district court jurisdiction over petitioners' claims."

"The court should therefore decide that issue and the merits of these appeals forthwith, based on the existing briefing," Hancock concluded.

Italy's Top Spy Is Expected To Be Indicted In Abduction Case (NYT)

By Ian Fisher And Elisabetta Povoledo

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

ROME, Oct. 23 — Italy's top spy is expected to be replaced in the coming days, as prosecutors seek his indictment on charges connected to the abduction of a militant Egyptian cleric in Milan by American intelligence agents in 2003.

The expected indictment of the spy, Nicolò Pollari, is part of a sprawling investigation here, the first in which government officials have essentially been charged with cooperating with Washington to violate the laws of their own government. If Mr. Pollari is indicted, he would be by far the most prominent official charged in relation to the scores of abductions of suspected terrorists around the world since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The case's practical impact on the program of transferring terrorism suspects to another country for questioning, known as rendition, is not clear. Some experts say the program was already languishing, after revelations last year that some abductees ended up in secret prisons.

But any trial, especially one involving a prominent official like Mr. Pollari, could shed uncomfortable light on how American allies cooperated in one of the most controversial tactics in the Bush administration's fight against terrorism.

Twenty-five operatives for the Central Intelligence Agency are named in the case, and documents filed by prosecutors here are full of specific information: phone and credit card numbers, tapped phone calls and surveillance photographs.

Perhaps most difficult for Italy, a trial would raise the possibility of showing collusion at the highest levels of government under the prime minister at the time, Silvio Berlusconi. Intelligence experts say it is highly unlikely that Italy did not give explicit approval of the operation, especially since the kidnapping took place right before the invasion of Iraq — and Italy was one of only a few European governments to support the war.

"The idea that either the director of central intelligence or the White House — and this would have had to go to the president — would have agreed to conduct the operation unless they were absolutely sure the Italian government was behind it is laughable," Michael Scheuer, a former senior American intelligence analyst, said in an interview. "It's not even in the realm of possibility."

Earlier this month, Armando Spataro, one of the chief prosecutors in the case, told members of the European Parliament in a briefing that "at this point" he had "no evidence" of anyone higher than Mr. Pollari being involved. Mr. Berlusconi and other top officials of his government have repeatedly denied any knowledge of the kidnapping.

Prosecutors made their case public last year, and officially closed the investigation earlier this month. Lawyers for the defendants have at least until the end of the month to examine the evidence. After that, the prosecutors said they intended to ask for indictments.

Mr. Pollari has consistently denied any role in the kidnapping, and his lawyers say he has been unable to defend himself fully because of Italian secrecy laws, though prosecutors contend they do not apply.

One of his lawyers, Titta Madia, said that Mr. Pollari's actions must be seen within a "larger picture" in which he must maintain secrecy. "It's a delicate theme because it pertains to international relations and national security in a tragic political moment," he said.

In February 2003, the Egyptian cleric, Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, known as Abu Omar, disappeared from a street in Milan. While the Italian news media reported it as a kidnapping, the case was officially unsolved.

But in June 2005, prosecutors in Milan ordered the arrest of 13 C.I.A. operatives. Since then, the case has slowly expanded to include other American operatives in Italy at the time — all have since left the country — and top Italian intelligence officers, including Mr. Pollari himself, who has been the head of military intelligence since 2001.

Prosecutors allege that Mr. Pollari, one of 39 defendants, cooperated with the C.I.A. in "promoting and organizing" the abduction by issuing orders to an Italian intelligence agent to assist in the planning of the kidnapping. In his briefing to the European Parliament, Mr. Spataro said he was not alleging that Italian intelligence agents took part in the actual kidnapping. All 39, many of them Americans, are subject to indictment.

The prosecution's evidence rests in some 28 closely held boxes of material, much of it detailing interrogations of suspects, telephone records and transcripts of intercepted telephone conversations. In one of the most potentially damaging transcripts, made in June, two of the nation's top spies — one of them dying of cancer, the other secretly recording the conversation to absolve himself — discussed whether it was the C.I.A. or Mr. Pollari who had given one of them a list of names of people, including Abu Omar, who were to be "taken away."

"The director, the director," said one of the spies, Gen. Gustavo Pignero, referring to Mr. Pollari. "The director gave me the envelope." Mr. Pignero, who died in September, was one of Mr. Pollari's top deputies.

But in the court documents, Mr. Pollari comes off as unhappy about any possible abductions. According to testimony General Pignero gave to prosecutors, the C.I.A.'s former station chief in Italy gave Mr. Pollari a list of people, including Abu Omar, whom he said the C.I.A. was interested in abducting.

"It was clear it was a project of aggressive search, which foresaw the capture of the terrorists and Abu Omar in particular, with procedures which were outside the law," General Pignero testified in July.

"Pollari agreed with me that we could not certainly enter into the kidnapping plot," he testified. "He said we could find a point of balance consistent with carrying out the verifications to track down" Abu Omar "and tell the Americans without being involved in the operation."

Prosecutors allege that Mr. Pollari and others knew that the C.I.A. planned to abduct Abu Omar and that they had been asked to track him down in Milan, an action that would violate Italian law by abetting a kidnapping.

The case also has implications for Italy's long and generally friendly relations with the United States. Prosecutors are asking for the extradition of 26 Americans charged in the case, though neither Mr. Berlusconi's government nor that of the current prime minister, Romano Prodi, have done so.

Some experts also see implications for Europe's cooperation with Americans in possible terrorist cases, at a time when many Europeans are wary about abductions and secret prisons as violations not only of law but also of human rights.

"I think that the leaders of European governments should cooperate with the United States, but within the law," Terry Davis, the secretary general of the Council of Europe, said in an interview. "There is no small print in the European Convention on Human Rights to the effect that human rights do not apply if you are cooperating with the United States of America."

The Refugee Mess (WP)

THE BUSH administration planned to admit 70,000 refugees this past fiscal year; Congress provided funding for 54,000. In the event, the United States admitted fewer than 42,000 -- a figure significantly lower than in either of the previous two years. The main reason for the shortfall in this crucial humanitarian program, according to recent State Department testimony before Congress, is the irrationally broad definitions in current law regarding terrorism, terrorist groups and material support for terrorism -- definitions that end up excluding as terrorists people who should be protected.

The law bars as refugees people who have been members or supporters of any group with "two or more individuals, whether organized or not, [which] engages in, or has a subgroup which engages in" activities as broad as using an "explosive, firearm or other weapon or dangerous device." The result has kept out the sort of people America's traditionally generous refugee policy was designed to help.

The law gives the administration some waiver flexibility, which it rightly has begun using recently on behalf of many ethnic Karen and Chin victims of the Burmese military junta. But that is only a partial fix, for the administration does not have the power to admit refugees who were members of groups that bore arms -- even those allied with this country. So the law continues to keep out what Ellen Sauerbrey, assistant secretary of state in charge of refugees, recently described to a Senate subcommittee as "other meritorious cases, such as Cuban anti-Castro freedom fighters, Vietnamese Montagnards who fought alongside of U.S. forces and Karen who participated in resistance against brutal attacks on their families and friends by the Burmese regime."

The administration seems newly open to the idea of fixing the law to give itself flexibility concerning members of groups that meet the absurdly broad definition of terrorist. That would be a breakthrough. A country's willingness to welcome victims of repressive governments and war zones is a measure of its values, and this country has traditionally led the world in refugee resettlement. Not every armed group is a terrorist organization; American policy should not treat victims of the worst sort of violence like perpetrators of it.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Times Is Ordered To Reveal Columnist's Sources (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 23 — A federal magistrate judge has ordered The New York Times to disclose the identities of three confidential sources used by one of its columnists, Nicholas Kristof, for pieces he wrote about the investigation of the deadly anthrax mailings of 2001.

The order, issued Friday by Magistrate Judge Liam O'Grady, requires the newspaper to disclose the identities of the three sources to lawyers for Dr. Steven J. Hatfill, who has brought a defamation suit against The Times. The order was disclosed Monday.

Catherine Mathis, a spokeswoman for The Times, said the newspaper would appeal the ruling.

Dr. Hatfill, a germ warfare specialist who formerly worked in the Army laboratories at Fort Detrick, Md., has asserted that a series of columns by Mr. Kristof about the slow pace of the anthrax investigation defamed him because they suggested he was responsible for the attacks.

Five people died in the attacks. Although the federal authorities identified Dr. Hatfill as a "person of interest" in the case, they have not charged him with any crimes.

At a deposition on July 13, Mr. Kristof declined to name five of his sources for the columns, but two have subsequently agreed to release him from his pledge of confidentiality. Judge O'Grady's ruling identifies the remaining unnamed sources as two Federal Bureau of Investigation agents and a former colleague or friend of Dr. Hatfill at Fort Detrick.

The judge ruled that the laws of Virginia applied and that under that state's law, reporters have only a qualified privilege to decline to name their sources that may be outweighed by other factors.

He wrote that for Mr. Hatfill to have a chance of meeting his burden of demonstrating that he was defamed by the columns, he "needs an opportunity to question the confidential sources and determine if Mr. Kristof accurately reported information the sources provided."

Mr. Kristof wrote about a government scientist he initially referred to as "Mr. Z," saying he had become the overwhelming focus of the investigation. In August 2002, he wrote that Dr. Hatfill had acknowledged he was Mr. Z. at a news conference in which he said he had been mistreated by the news media.

The lawsuit was originally dismissed by a federal judge in Virginia in 2004. A divided three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in Richmond reinstated the case and the full appeals court, by a 6-to-6 vote, declined to overturn that ruling. The Supreme Court declined to intervene last March.

Judge O'Grady wrote: "The court understands the need for a reporter to be able to credibly pledge confidentiality to his sources. Confidential sources have been an important part of journalism, which is presumably why Virginia recognizes a qualified reporter's privilege in the first place."

He said Virginia law required the use of a three-part balancing test as to whether there is a compelling need for the information, whether the information is relevant and whether it may not be obtained any other way.

New York Times Ordered To Disclose Sources In Anthrax Libel Suit (NSDY/AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, October 24, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. -- A federal judge ordered The New York Times to disclose a columnist's confidential sources as part of a libel lawsuit filed over the newspaper's coverage of the 2001 anthrax attacks.

Former Army scientist Steven Hatfill, once identified by authorities as a person of interest in the anthrax mailings that killed five people in late 2001, is suing the Times for libel for a series of articles written by columnist Nicholas Kristof.

The order issued Friday by U.S. Magistrate Judge Liam O'Grady requires the newspaper to disclose the identities of three of Kristof's sources, including two FBI sources who allegedly provided some of the most incriminating information in Kristof's columns. The order was made public Monday.

The judge said Virginia law gives reporters only limited immunity from disclosing sources and privilege is outweighed by Hatfill's right to proceed with his lawsuit.

The court "understands the need for a reporter to be able to credibly pledge confidentiality to his sources," O'Grady wrote. "But that privilege must be balanced against the rights of a plaintiff."

Times spokeswoman Catherine Mathis said the paper would appeal the ruling.

Hatfill's lawyers said they need to question the sources to see if Kristof's reporting was accurate. The FBI sources told the Times that Hatfill was one of a limited number of people with the access and technical expertise to manufacture the anthrax and that he failed several lie-detector tests.

The FBI agents "are the only sources who would have the type of inside information on which the columns claim to rely," said Charles Kimmett, one of Hatfill's lawyers.

Hatfill was a a physician and bioterrorism expert who worked at the Army's infectious disease laboratory at Fort Detrick, Md., in the late 1990s.

The Department of Justice refuses to discuss Hatfill but has recently acknowledged that the strain of anthrax used in the attacks was accessible to a much wider circle of people than initially reported.

New York Times Columnist Must Reveal Sources, Judge Rules (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

A federal judge has ordered the New York Times Co. to disclose the confidential sources used by Nicholas D. Kristof in columns that explored whether a former Army scientist was responsible for the deadly 2001 anthrax attacks.

The ruling, made public yesterday, came in a lawsuit filed by the former scientist, Steven J. Hatfill, contending that the paper defamed him in a series of Kristof columns in 2002 that identified him as a "likely culprit." Hatfill has been identified by authorities as a "person of interest" in the anthrax-spore mailings that killed five people and sickened 17. No one has been charged in the attacks.

Hatfill's attorneys are seeking to compel Kristof to reveal his sources, arguing that questioning them is vital to their case. Kristof has refused. U.S. Magistrate Judge Liam O'Grady in Alexandria sided with Hatfill and ordered the journalist to disclose the identity of the three sources by tomorrow.

"The court understands the need for a reporter to be able to credibly pledge confidentiality to his sources," O'Grady wrote in his ruling Friday. But the judge said Hatfill "needs an opportunity to question the confidential sources and determine if Mr. Kristof accurately reported information the sources provided."

The Times said yesterday that it plans to appeal, and Kristof vowed to continue protecting his sources. "We were disappointed with the decision because we believe that confidential sources are sometimes very important in covering government investigations," Kristof said in an interview. "And I'm passionate about protecting the confidentiality of my sources."

The ruling is the latest in a series of court defeats for journalists trying to shield news-gathering activities from the legal process. Judges have ordered reporters covering issues ranging from baseball's steroid scandal to the investigation into the leak of CIA officer Valerie Plame's identity to disclose confidential sources. In the Plame case, former New York Times reporter Judith Miller spent 85 days in jail for refusing to comply.

But those were criminal cases; Hatfill's is a civil lawsuit. Legal experts said it is relatively common for judges to order journalists to reveal confidential sources in a libel lawsuit, but the journalist is rarely jailed for resisting.

If the journalist does refuse, a judge often strips him or her of the defense that the information was based on sources, which can expose media companies to significant liability, said Rodney A. Smolla, dean of the University of Richmond Law School and an expert on First Amendment law. "The journalist is being told you cannot have your cake and eat it, too," Smolla said. "You can't rely on the existence of this source but not let the jury and the court and the plaintiff explore the nature of the source."

In a series of columns in 2002, Kristof criticized the FBI for failing to aggressively pursue a scientist he initially called "Mr. Z." He wrote that the biodefense community had called Mr. Z a "likely culprit," partly because the scientist was familiar with anthrax.

Kristof later acknowledged that Hatfill was Mr. Z. He also wrote that Hatfill deserved the "presumption of innocence."

Hatfill, a former researcher at the Army's infectious disease research laboratory at Fort Detrick in Frederick, has been trying to clear his name ever since then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft publicly called him a person of interest in 2002. An attorney for Hatfill did not return telephone calls late yesterday.

Hatfill's lawsuit against the Times Co., filed in 2004 in U.S. District Court in Alexandria, was dismissed by a federal judge but then reinstated and sent back to Alexandria last year by a federal appeals court.

When Kristof was deposed in July, two of his sources were identified -- although not by name -- as FBI employees involved in the anthrax investigation, court papers said. A third was a colleague or friend of Hatfill's. Two other sources agreed to release Kristof from his pledge of confidentiality and reveal their identities, the papers said.

Federal Judge Orders New York Times To Identify Confidential Sources (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, October 24, 2006

A federal magistrate in Virginia has ordered the New York Times to identify three confidential sources used by one of its columnists, Nicholas Kristof, in articles he wrote about the FBI's investigation into anthrax-laden mailings that killed at least five people in 2001.

The order came Friday in a libel suit filed by a former Army scientist who was eventually described by the Justice Department as a "person of interest" in the anthrax probe, Steven Hatfill. He contends that his reputation was besmirched unfairly by Mr. Kristof's columns, which castigated the FBI for not doing more to investigate Mr. Hatfill.

Mr. Hatfill has vehemently denied any involvement in the mailings. No one was ever charged in connection with the case.

Magistrate Liam O'Grady ruled that Mr. Hatfill was entitled to know the identities of Mr. Kristof's sources in order to pursue the libel claim.

"In order for plaintiff to meet its burden in the defamation case and offer evidence as to the reporter's state of mind, plaintiff needs an opportunity to questions the confidential sources and determine if Mr. Kristof accurately reported information the sources provided," Magistrate O'Grady wrote.

The magistrate ordered the Times to identify the sources by tomorrow, but the newspaper filed an emergency motion yesterday asking to stay the deadline while the judge overseeing the case, Claude Hilton, reviews the ruling.

If Judge Hilton upholds the order and the Times refuses to comply, the judge could fine the newspaper, take some punitive measure if the libel suit goes to trial, or jail an employee or officer of the Times for contempt.

"These days it seems courts kind of like the monetary sanction," a professor of press law at the University of Minnesota, Jane Kirtley, said. "Jail is possible, although in my experience that's pretty rare in libel cases."

Ms. Kirtley said the judge could instruct jurors to assume the sources in question did not exist, a finding that she said "essentially means" the Times would lose the suit.

Magistrate O'Grady said one reason testimony from the sources was needed is that discrepancies have arisen between sources Mr. Hatfill's legal team has been able to identify and Mr. Kristof's accounts of his conversations with those sources. According to Mr. Hatfill's lawyers, a SUNY Purchase biologist who served as a source for the columnist, Barbara Rosenberg, denied Mr. Kristof's claim that she said Mr. Hatfill was certain to have the ability to make "first-rate anthrax."

Ms. Rosenberg also initially denied having asked for confidentiality, as the Times asserted, but she later said she might have.

A spokeswoman for the Times, Catherine Mathis, said in a statement that Mr. Kristof "clearly recalls" getting information on condition of anonymity from Ms. Rosenberg. The spokeswoman also said Mr. Kristof's promise "was consistent with Times policy."

Lawyers for the Times argued that Mr. Kristof's sources were entitled to protection under so-called reporters' shield laws on the books in New York and Maryland, but Magistrate O'Grady ruled that Virginia law applied and offered no quarter to the newspaper.

The Times also argued unsuccessfully that any order to disclose sources be delayed until the court determines whether Mr. Hatfill should be considered a public figure.

Only the last of the five columns at issue in the suit actually identified Mr. Hatfill by name. The other four described him in a way he contends allowed friends and acquaintances to recognize him.

In 2004, Judge Hilton dismissed the libel case, ruling that Mr. Kristof's columns did not accuse Mr. Hatfill of being the anthrax mailer. However, last year, a panel of the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals voted, 2–1, to reinstate the suit. "A reasonable reader of Kristof's columns likely would conclude that Hatfill was responsible for the anthrax mailings," Judge Dennis Shedd wrote for the majority.

The Times sought a review by the full bench of the 4th Circuit and by the Supreme Court, but both declined to take up the case.

Mr. Hatfill, who claims to have been rendered unemployable by the anthrax-related publicity, is also pursuing a Privacy Act lawsuit against the federal government and a separate libel suit over Vanity Fair and Readers Digest about the anthrax mystery.

Amerithrax Demand (RC)

Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) formally demanded a briefing by the FBI before Thanksgiving on the status of its five-year investigation into the fall 2001 anthrax attacks.

In a pointed, five-page letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, dated today, Grassley attacked the FBI's "blanket prohibition" on briefing Capitol Hill about the attacks, which included two letters directed at sitting Senators and left five people dead and more than a dozen injured. Roll Call reported the three-year-old ban on anthrax briefings Oct. 12, with the bureau saying it was necessitated by Congressional leaks.

"If some individual did act inappropriately by speaking to the media about an FBI briefing, stiff-arming Congress on all future requests is an unacceptable over-reaction. The FBI doesn't become exempt from scrutiny just because there may have been an inappropriate disclosure by someone on Capitol Hill," wrote Grassley, a senior member of the Judiciary Committee and FBI critic for more than two decades.

Grassley raised the specter that the lack of briefings may instead have been prompted by an investigation that "has little in the way of results to show for its work."

He asked Gonzales to force an FBI briefing by Nov. 21, the anniversary of the last death traced to the anthrax letters.

Eye Spy. Google Earth, the search giant's global mapping initiative, is getting into the swing of the midterms.

Over the weekend, Google Earth added an election guide that allows users to superimpose Congressional boundaries over satellite images of the United States and then scroll across the map to gather real-time information about races. Clicking on a star placed over each district brings up a list of candidates and also links to news about them and information about their campaign finances.

Google Earth product manager Chikai Ohazama said his team of programmers worked overtime to assemble the feature, gathering information district by district. "The target audience is really people across the country who want to learn more about their candidates and haven't in the past," a company spokeswoman said.

Roughly 100 million people have downloaded Google Earth in less than a year since its launch, company officials say. Ohazama said he expects the election guide to stay up for the next two weeks and come down shortly after Election Day. The company plans to resurrect the feature around future election seasons.

It is simply unacceptable, as a matter of proper respect between the legislative and executive branches of government, that the FBI is not informing Congress of its progress, or lack of it, in tracking down those who killed five people with anthrax in 2001 and, but for luck, might have killed many more on Capitol Hill.

As Roll Call reported on Oct. 12, the FBI is claiming that it halted regular briefings on the anthrax case in late 2003 "after sensitive information about the investigation citing Congressional sources was reported in the media."

Admittedly, there is an unfortunate history of Congressional leaks of classified information, and there is an equally unfortunate history of failure to find and punish those responsible for sensitive leaks. Still, it is Congress' responsibility to fund and oversee the activities of the federal government, and to do its job, Congress should demand access to information about the anthrax attacks.

This isn't just because Congress itself was the target of anthrax-laced envelopes addressed to then-Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) and Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), an attack that resulted in 28 Congressional employees testing positive for exposure to a deadly strain of anthrax and a shutdown of the Hart Building for a lengthy decontamination. Hill staffers had been briefed on the danger of an anthrax attack, and the powder was spotted when it spilled out of an envelope opened by an aide to Daschle.

The letters contained the message, "Are you afraid? Death to America. Death to Israel. Allah is great," though the attack may not have been the work of Islamic terrorists. Regardless, Congress has a responsibility to know how well the FBI and other federal agencies are faring in the global war on terrorism. Congress needs to know whether the FBI has a clue about whether the anthrax attack was part of the war on terror.

The FBI Web site's "Amerithrax" page discloses that the agency has 19 special agents working on the case and that they've conducted 9,100 interviews, issued more than 6,000 subpoenas and carried out 67 searches around the globe. An FBI spokeswoman told Roll Call that "we've made progress, and it's an incredibly active and productive investigation."

Oh? In 2002, the Justice Department publicly fingered a former U.S. military germ expert, Steven Hatfill, as "a person of interest" in the case. But he was never arrested or charged, conjuring up memories of the FBI's false accusations against Richard Jewell as the perpetrator of the Atlanta Olympics bombing in 1996.

Hatfill has sued the Justice Department and the FBI, charging that government leaks ruined his career. Is the FBI keeping Congress in the dark to protect a "productive" investigation, or to prevent embarrassment in court? Congress has a right to know. Indeed, it has a solemn responsibility.

Man Pleads Guilty To JetBlue Bomb Threat (KCAL)

KCAL-TV, October 24, 2006

(CBS) LOS ANGELES A Miami Beach man, 21, pleaded guilty Monday to a federal felony charge for calling in a bomb threat for a JetBlue flight at Long Beach Airport after he arrived too late to board the plane.

Yechezkel Wells entered his plea to a charge of conveying false information of a threat targeting an airplane. He could be sentenced to probation under a plea deal with prosecutors, although U.S. District Judge Florence-Marie Cooper will have the final say on sentencing when Wells returns to court Jan. 29.

Wells, who came to town with several friends to attend a wedding, apparently was upset when he arrived late for an evening flight to Fort Lauderdale on Aug. 26 and wasn't allowed to board, according to authorities.

The Florida resident, described by his lawyer as a college student, was quickly detained by FBI agents, along with three friends who were released after questioning.

Well's lawyer, Donald Etra, said outside court that his client "apologizes to the passengers of JetBlue" who were delayed for about one hour while bomb-sniffing dogs were used to search the plane.

"This was a momentary gross lapse in judgment," Etra said. The prosecutor in the case, Assistant U.S. Attorney Donald Gaffney, said outside court that although Wells may not be sentenced to time behind bars, he now has a felony on his record.

"That's something we want people to realize, that we take this very seriously," Gaffney said.

According to an affidavit signed by FBI Agent David Gates, Wells admitted making a 911 call from an airport pay phone sometime after 9:10 p.m., after a JetBlue supervisor refused to issue him a boarding pass for Flight 243 because he was late.

In his plea agreement, Wells acknowledged that he made the hoax call to try to keep the plane from leaving.

Wells remains free on bond.

Man Pleads Guilty To Calling In Bomb Threat To SoCal Airport (SLOT)

San Luis Obispo Tribune, October 24, 2006

LOS ANGELES - A Florida man pleaded guilty Monday to calling in a bomb threat to the Long Beach Airport after he arrived too late to board his flight, authorities said.

Yechezkel Wells, 21, of Miami Beach, entered his plea in U.S. District Court to a felony count of conveying false information of a threat targeting an airplane. Wells, who remains free on bond, is scheduled to be sentenced Jan. 29. He faces probation to five years in prison.

Wells, a college student with dual citizenship in the U.S. and Israel, was arrested Aug. 26 shortly after he called 911 from a pay phone and said there was a bomb on a JetBlue flight from Long Beach to Fort Lauderdale, Fla. In his plea agreement, Wells acknowledged he made the call to try to keep the plane from leaving.

Court documents said Wells did not have a bomb and was upset that an airline employee wouldn't allow him to board because of federal rules that require airlines to close a flight 30 minutes before takeoff.

He told investigators he had hoped the threat would delay the flight and possibly allow him to board, authorities said.

Wells' lawyer, Donald Etra, said outside court that his client "apologizes to the passengers of JetBlue" who were delayed for about one hour while bomb-sniffing dogs searched the plane.

"This was a momentary gross lapse in judgment," Etra said.

Medical Views Of 9/11's Dust Show Big Gaps (NYT)

By Anthony Depalma

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

In 2004, Kenneth R. Feinberg, special master of the federal Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund, awarded $2.6 million to the family of a downtown office worker who died from a rare lung disease five months after fleeing from the dust cloud released when the twin towers fell. That decision made the worker, Felicia Dunn-Jones, a 42-year-old lawyer, the first official fatality of the dust, and one of only two deaths to be formally linked to the toxic air at ground zero.

The New York City medical examiner's office, however, has refused to put her on its official list of 9/11 victims, saying that by its standards there was insufficient medical evidence to link her death to the dust.

Mrs. Dunn-Jones's case shows how difficult it can be to prove a causal connection with any scientific certainty — and how even government agencies can disagree. With thousands of people now seeking compensation and treatment for dust exposure, the debate about the relationship between the toxic particles and disease will be a central issue in the flood of Sept. 11-related lawsuits. Health experts are starting to document the connections, but any firm conclusion is still years away.

Most of the suits involve workers who spent weeks and months on the pile at ground zero and say the city and other agencies failed to protect them from the toxic dust. Others involve residents who say they were made sick by dust that settled in their homes. Mrs. Dunn-Jones was among those downtown office workers caught in the initial fallout.

The question that arises in all these cases is straightforward: Can a link between the dust and disease be proved with scientific certainty? The answer is anything but simple.

"Certainty is a word we always dance around," said Joseph Graziano, associate dean for research at the Mailman School of Public Health at Columbia University. For him, searching for the cause of disease is like developing film. "At first you see a faint image of what the real picture is," Dr. Graziano said, "and then, over time, you see it with much more clarity. In these relatively early times, the image is still faint."

It can take decades to approach any degree of certainty. For instance, only after years of observation did doctors agree that there was a strong link between asbestos and diseases like asbestosis and mesothelioma.

In legal cases, "a reasonable degree of medical certainty" is considered the gold standard in making a causal connection. Last week, a federal judge cleared the way for thousands of workers' lawsuits to go to trial. When the cases are heard, any proof that does not meet that legal standard is likely to be challenged.

But outside the courtroom, scientists say, even a less rigorous link could be sufficient to warrant expanding the range of illnesses covered by treatment programs, and to serve as the basis for issuing cautions to people in high-risk groups. When the health effects are too new or the evidence is too vague for a strong link, lesser indicators like the concurrence of different studies have to be relied on.

For example, nearly every ground zero study shows that workers and residents exposed to the dust in the hours after the collapse have suffered the worst health problems. The consistency in that data has helped doctors monitor and treat people since Sept. 11.

And it may also help explain why Mrs. Dunn-Jones, a dynamic civil rights lawyer with the United States Department of Education, became so sick so quickly. As she was swallowed by a whirling dust plume filled with asbestos, benzene, dioxin and other hazards when the first tower fell, all she could do was cover her nose and mouth as she fled from her office one block north of the World Trade Center.

It was night by the time she got home to Staten Island. "She was in a state of shock," her husband, Joseph Jones, recalled. Her clothes were still dusty, but he didn't pay much attention. "I was just so happy to see her," he said.

For the next few months, life returned to normal, until Mrs. Dunn-Jones developed a cough. In January 2002, the cough grew worse. On Feb. 10, she suddenly stopped breathing and died.

Mr. Jones, 54, an assistant manager at a Brooklyn pharmacy, was stunned. Then, when he received the official death certificate months later, he was shocked to see an unfamiliar word — sarcoidosis.

"Even though I was in the medical field, I had never heard of it," he said.

After reading several medical reports on sarcoidosis — including one by Dr. David J. Prezant, deputy chief medical officer of the New York Fire Department — Mr. Jones and his lawyer, Richard H. Bennett, wondered if Mrs. Dunn-Jones's mysterious death could be linked to 9/11 dust because sarcoidosis, which produces microscopic lumps called granulomas, on vital organs, is often associated with exposure to environmental hazards.

They took the case to Mr. Feinberg and the victim compensation fund, which gave $7 billion to the families of those killed or injured on 9/11.

Mr. Feinberg initially expressed doubts about the claim and demanded to see definitive medical evidence linking Mrs. Dunn-Jones's sarcoidosis to the dust.

Dr. Prezant, who declined to be interviewed for this article, was one of two experts who testified at a hearing conducted by Mr. Feinberg. In the first four years after 9/11, he found 20 cases of sarcoidosis in the Fire Department, a rate of 80 per 100,000 in the first year (with treatment, all are now stable), compared with a national rate of fewer than 6 per 100,000, according to the American Thoracic Society.

The other expert was Dr. Alan M. Fein, a clinical professor of medicine at the New York University School of Medicine. He, too, was skeptical at first, but he said he changed his mind after reviewing Mrs. Dunn-Jones's medical record, including the autopsy report. "I'm comfortable saying her death was caused by exposure to the dust," Dr. Fein said in an interview.

In March 2004, Mr. Feinberg agreed, making Mrs. Dunn-Jones's death the only dust-related fatality recognized by the fund. Only one other death has been formally linked to the dust: In April, a New Jersey coroner determined that James Zadroga, 34, a New York City police detective, had died of a disease similar to sarcoidosis, also caused by his exposure to ground zero dust.

Mr. Jones welcomed the settlement from the victim compensation fund, and believes that his wife was a 9/11 victim as surely as if she had died in the towers. He sent Mr. Feinberg's decision to the city's chief medical examiner, Dr. Charles S. Hirsch, and asked that his wife be put on the official list so that her name could be read on Sept. 11. Dr. Hirsch refused, a spokeswoman said, because the available evidence did not prove the connection "with a reasonable degree of medical certainty"— the highest medical standard generally used in legal cases.

Mr. Feinberg's decision had been based on a different standard: a preponderance of medical evidence.

That was proof enough for the Staten Island Memorial Commission, which has engraved Mrs. Dunn-Jones's name on the bone-white memorial on the island's north shore.

Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, who has fought to get medical care for 9/11 victims, said the contradictory conclusions about Mrs. Dunn-Jones's death underscored the importance of deciding who has the final say on causal links. "They should be medical decisions, not political ones," she said, suggesting that city officials may have a conflict of interest in making such determinations since the city is a defendant in the ground zero workers' lawsuits.

She has introduced a bill to reopen the federal compensation fund to people whose illnesses became known after the original eligibility period ended in 2003.

In the effort to collect definitive data, Dr. John Howard, the federal government's 9/11 health coordinator, recently circulated a draft set of autopsy protocols that directs pathologists to use a standard of proof that establishes both biological plausibility and unequivocal evidence of a causal connection to the dust. But doctors and elected officials have said those standards are so restrictive that almost no death could be linked to the dust for years to come. A spokesman for Dr. Howard said the guidelines were being refined.

In another effort, the Mount Sinai Medical Center, which has screened thousands of ground zero workers, has begun a long-term study of the incidence of diseases to identify any rates that exceed national averages.

"Right now we're in the process of confirming every case of interstitial lung disease, every cancer, every sarcoidosis that has been reported to us by responders in their visits," said Dr. Jeanne M. Stellman, director of the public health program at Columbia University, is leading the data collection project.

"We are actively trying to determine whether Detective Zadroga and Mrs. Dunn-Jones are alone," she said. "And we are trying to find a way to do this that is scientifically correct while also being responsive to the needs and fears of the communities involved."

WAR NEWS:

Bush's New Tack Steers Clear Of 'Stay The Course' (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

President Bush and his aides are annoyed that people keep misinterpreting his Iraq policy as "stay the course." A complete distortion, they say. "That is not a stay-the-course policy," White House press secretary Tony Snow declared yesterday.

Where would anyone have gotten that idea? Well, maybe from Bush.

"We will stay the course. We will help this young Iraqi democracy succeed," he said in Salt Lake City in August.

"We will win in Iraq so long as we stay the course," he said in Milwaukee in July.

"I saw people wondering whether the United States would have the nerve to stay the course and help them succeed," he said after returning from Baghdad in June.

But the White House is cutting and running from "stay the course." A phrase meant to connote steely resolve instead has become a symbol for being out of touch and rigid in the face of a war that seems to grow worse by the week, Republican strategists say. Democrats have now turned "stay the course" into an attack line in campaign commercials, and the Bush team is busy explaining that "stay the course" does not actually mean stay the course.

Instead, they have been emphasizing in recent weeks how adaptable the president's Iraq policy actually is. Bush remains steadfast about remaining in Iraq, they say, but constantly shifts tactics and methods in response to an adjusting enemy. "What you have is not 'stay the course' but in fact a study in constant motion by the administration," Snow said yesterday.

Political rhetoric, of course, is often in constant motion as well. But with midterm elections two weeks away, the Bush team is searching for a formula to address public opposition to the war, struggling to appear consistent and flexible at the same time. That was underscored by the reaction to a New York Times report that the administration is drafting a timetable for the Iraqi government to disarm militias and assume a larger security role. The White House initially called the story "inaccurate." But then

White House counselor Dan Bartlett went on CNN yesterday morning to call it "a little bit overwritten" because in fact it was something the administration had been doing for months.

The president has shifted language on Iraq before. At a news conference in August, he returned to his prewar argument that Saddam Hussein harbored terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. Hussein "had relations with Zarqawi," Bush said. Weeks later, the Senate intelligence committee concluded that Hussein "did not have a relationship, harbor or turn a blind eye to Zarqawi" and that the U.S. government knew that before the invasion. At his next news conference, Bush was asked about that. "I never said there was an operational relationship," he said.

Bush used "stay the course" until recent weeks when it became clear that it was becoming a political problem. "The characterization of, you know, 'it's stay the course' is about a quarter right," Bush complained at an Oct. 11 news conference. " 'Stay the course' means keep doing what you're doing. My attitude is: Don't do what you're doing if it's not working -- change. 'Stay the course' also means don't leave before the job is done."

By last week, it was no longer a quarter right. "Listen, we've never been stay the course, George," he told George Stephanopoulos of ABC News. "We have been -- we will complete the mission, we will do our job and help achieve the goal, but we're constantly adjusting the tactics. Constantly."

Snow said Bush dropped the phrase "because it left the wrong impression about what was going on. And it allowed critics to say, 'Well, here's an administration that's just embarked upon a policy and not looking at what the situation is,' when, in fact, it's just the opposite."

Republican strategists were glad to see him reject the language, if not the policy. "They're acknowledging that it's not sending the message they want to send," said Steve Hinkson, political director at Luntz Research Cos., a GOP public opinion firm. The phrase suggested "burying your head in the sand," Hinkson said, adding that it was no longer useful signaling determination. "The problem is that as the number of people who agree with remaining resolute dwindles, that sort of language doesn't strike a chord as much as it once did."

If anything, it is striking a Democratic chord, party strategists say. A commercial by Democratic Senate candidate James Webb in Virginia shows a clip of Bush saying "We'll stay the course in Iraq," followed by a clip of Republican Sen. George Allen, saying "I very much agree with the president. . . . And we need to stay the course." A caption on the screen says "Civil War; No End in Sight; We Need a New Course."

An ad for Democratic Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. in Tennessee shows Republican Bob Corker saying "I think we should stay the course," then rewinds and repeats "we should stay the course." Ford then comes onto the screen. "I support our troops, and I voted for the war," he says. "But we shouldn't stay the course as Mr. Corker wants. . . . America should always be strong. But we should be smart and honest, too. We need a new direction."

Juxtaposed against "stay the course," "new direction" has become the Democrats' poll-tested mantra, even if they don't define precisely what that new direction would be. "There's a reason why every Democratic candidate in the country is talking now about change in direction," said Democratic National Committee pollster Cornell Belcher. "When you ask 'change in direction' versus Bush's direction, you get solid majorities of 60 percent or so for change."

So now even some Republican candidates are changing direction, at least in terms of their language. "We can't continue to keep doing the same things and expect different results," Allen said last week. "We must adapt. We must adjust our tactics." Corker now says on his campaign Web site: "We need to fix our strategy in Iraq so we can get the job done and bring our troops home."

Facing Dissent, Bush Jettisons 'Stay The Course' (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And David S. Cloud

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 23 — The White House said Monday that President Bush was no longer using the phrase "stay the course" when speaking about the Iraq war, in a new effort to emphasize flexibility in the face of some of the bloodiest violence there since the 2003 invasion.

"He stopped using it," said Tony Snow, the White House press secretary. "It left the wrong impression about what was going on and it allowed critics to say, 'Well, here's an administration that's just embarked upon a policy and not looking at what the situation is,' when, in fact, it is the opposite."

Mr. Bush used the slogan in a stump speech on Aug. 31, but has not repeated it for some time. Still, Mr. Snow's pronouncement was a stark example of the complicated line the White House is walking this election year in trying to tag Democrats as wanting to "cut and run" from Iraq, without itself appearing wedded to unsuccessful tactics there.

Democrats have increasingly pressed a case this fall contending that Republicans are stubbornly proposing to "stay the course" in a failing effort to stanch violence in Iraq — an approach that strategists in both parties consider to have been fairly successful, especially as violence has continued to mount in Baghdad.

In the last few weeks a number of Republican lawmakers and party elders have also come forward to express doubts about whether the administration's approach to stabilizing Iraq is succeeding and to suggest new strategies.

Mr. Bush and his aides have met those complaints with a renewed emphasis on adaptability for the United States' war plan. Mr. Bush has stressed — as he did in an interview with ABC News on Sunday — that he is "not patient forever" and expects the Iraqis to take more responsibility in securing their own country.

In the same vein, administration officials are heightening the emphasis on setting milestones for Iraq to take over responsibility for ensuring security while disbanding sectarian militia groups.

Bush administration officials on Monday provided new details of their efforts to devise benchmarks for measuring the Baghdad government's progress in the coming months toward assuming a larger role in securing the country.

Mr. Snow said the issue of benchmarks had come up cursorily during recent discussions with Mr. Bush; Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld; Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top American commander in the Middle East; Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; and Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador to Iraq.

He added that the Bush administration was not presenting any ultimatums to Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Malaki's government or tying goals to United States troop commitments.

Mr. Snow was commenting on a report in The New York Times on Sunday that said the Bush administration was drafting a timetable with Iraqi officials for dealing with the militias and achieving other political, economic and military benchmarks aimed at stabilizing the country.

The Times article quoted several senior officials anonymously as saying the Bush administration would consider changes in military strategy and other steps if Iraq balked at the benchmarks or failed to meet the most critical timetables.

Mr. Rumsfeld said Monday that the benchmarks under discussion included projections on when Iraq might be able to take control of more of the country's 18 provinces. Only two provinces are under full Iraqi security administration, though officials say they hope the number will rise to six or seven by the end of the year.

Speaking to reporters at the Pentagon, Mr. Rumsfeld said the goal of the discussions was to produce a "way ahead" so that "their government can have a set of tasks that they need to do to get prepared to assume the responsibility for governing their country and providing security for their country."

The goal, he added, was for both sides to agree on what he called "projections" for when Iraq might be able to take on these tasks.

"My guess is that you might find that in no case will you find a specific date" for assuming a particular task, he said. But, he added, "You might find a month, or you might find a spread of two or three months, a period where they think they might be able to do it."

Mr. Bush, in discussing at a news conference on Oct. 11 the meaning of the phrase "stay the course," also refused to be pinned down.

"Stay the course means keep doing what you're doing," he said. "My attitude is, don't do what you're doing if it's not working; change."

He added: "Stay the course also means don't leave before the job is done. And that's — we're going to get the job done in Iraq. And it's important that we do get the job done in Iraq."

Bush Buries 'Stay The Course' Slogan For Iraq (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 24, 2006

US President George W. Bush has retired his "stay the course" slogan for Iraq, worried about its use as a weapon against his Republican Party in November elections, the White House said.

"He's stopped using it," said spokesman Tony Snow. "It allowed critics to say, well, here's an administration that's just embarked upon a policy and not looking at what the situation is, when, in fact, it's just the opposite."

Opposition Democrats, hoping the unpopular conflict will help them take control of the US Congress in the November 7 legislative elections, have used the refrain in political advertisements accusing Republicans of sticking by a failed policy for waging the war.

Bush appears to have last used the expression on August 30, when he vowed: "We will stay the course, we will help this young Iraqi democracy succeed, and victory in Iraq will be a major ideological triumph" in the war on terrorism.

"The president is determined not to leave Iraq short of victory. But he also understands that it's important to capture the dynamism of the efforts that have been ongoing to try to make Iraq more secure," said Snow.

DOJ_NMG_0085612

Earlier, senior Bush adviser Dan Bartlett flatly declared that, when it comes to Iraq, "it's never been a stay-the-course strategy."

"What we aren't doing is sitting there with our heads in the sand. We're completely changing and making tactical changes on a week-by-week basis as we respond to the enemy's reactions to our strategies," he told CBS television.

But Bush and Snow have repeatedly used the "stay the course" formulation over the past year, often to counter what the White House still calls the Democrats' "cut and run" push for withdrawing US forces from Iraq.

Clamor Rises For A US Shift On Iraq (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON

With violence surging in Baghdad and midterm elections two weeks away, the Bush administration faces pressure as never before to change its approach in Iraq.

The ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, said Monday that US strategy needs "radical change." The Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Sen. John Warner of Virginia, in a broadcast interview, added that the US needs to crack down on Iraqi private militias - and that a change in course may be necessary if things don't improve soon.

The White House insists the US needs to stay the course. But it also hints it might be flexible, at least on military tactics. And it is sounding increasingly exasperated with perceived inaction on the part of the current Iraqi government.

"They're asking, 'What are these guys doing well and not so well, and what do we need to get them to do?' " says William Martel, associate professor of international security studies at the Fletcher School at Tufts University. "It's entirely appropriate."

The heart of the problem is the bloodshed in Iraq's capital. Insurgent attacks are up more than 40 percent since midsummer, despite a concerted push by American military commanders to hold some of the city's worst neighborhoods.

Iraqi forces are a partner in this effort as the name "Together Forward II" implies. But the performance of some Iraqi units remains suspect. The police, for instance, appear to be riddled with infiltrators linked to Shiite death squads.

Meanwhile, more intense combat has resulted in a spike in US casualties. As of Sunday, the US military had suffered 78 combat deaths in Iraq this month, its highest fatality rate in almost two years.

Many Democrats long have called for a timetable for the withdrawal of US troops. Some party leaders now insist that Iraq has developed into a full-blown civil war. Senator Biden said Sunday that the US public will not long tolerate American money and troops "being poured down a rathole."

With a bipartisan Iraq Study Group headed by former Secretary of State James Baker III set to release recommendations for a new strategy in the coming months, and with a public referendum in the form of a midterm election two weeks away, the White House appears to have been at pains to show it is not deaf to the current clamor.

In an interview this weekend President Bush told ABC News that while he is patient he is not "patient forever." He added that neither is he "patient with dawdling," an apparent veiled reference to the reluctance of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to crack down on Shiite militias.

The fledgling Iraqi government must take more responsibility for Iraq's security, administration officials added Monday.

White House officials discounted a New York Times report that the US was developing a plan that would set a specific timetable for Iraqi militias to disarm. "Are we issuing ultimatums? No," said presidential spokesman Tony Snow.

But Mr. Snow added that the US was working with the Iraqis to lay out specific goals for the weeks and months ahead. "We're working collaboratively with them to figure out how best to do it," he said.

Tension between the US and Iraqi governments may have been developing for weeks. Mr. Bush reportedly had to reassure Mr. Maliki in a phone call that the US was not pressing for his ouster. Barham Saleh, Iraqi deputy prime minister, said after a meeting with British Prime Minister Tony Blair on Monday that international forces must not abandon Iraq while the situation there remains volatile.

"We must not give in to panic," said Mr. Saleh.

Given the buzz saw that the insurgency has proven to be, it is perfectly natural that the US should now reexamine its strategy, says Mr. Martel of the Fletcher School.

The problem in Iraqi, says Martel, author of the upcoming book "Victory in War," is that the administration initially framed its goal in grand strategic terms.

Now that the democratic transformation of Iraq seems more difficult than anticipated, settling for a political or military victory such as what characterized the first Gulf War seems a comedown.

DOJ_NMG_0085613

With the debate in the US, "what we're seeing is the classic response of a society where military strategy is not producing the effect we had hoped," says Martel.

That said, US choices now are not pretty, writes Anthony Cordesman, a strategic expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, in a new analysis titled "US Options in Iraq: The Almost Good, the Bad, and the Ugly."

Iraq is already in a serious civil war, according to Mr. Cordesman, and current efforts are simply buying time. He writes that the US must avoid unilateral action and instead should seek to negotiate a new game plan with the Iraqi government and surrounding powers, in such a setting as a conciliation conference of all Iraqi factions.

White House Says Iraqis Can Be Pushed Only So Far (USAT)

By David Jackson And Jim Michaels

USA Today, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — The White House said Monday that it is working with the Iraqi leadership to end religious violence — but it cautioned against pushing too hard on the fragile government.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said it would be counterproductive to threaten to withdraw U.S. forces if goals aren't reached. “We're not in the business of issuing ultimatums,” Snow said.

Snow made the remarks as Iraq's government tries to reach a political consensus that would disarm private militias blamed for much of the violence.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has said he will disarm the militias this year or early next. U.S. soldiers have stepped up security efforts in Baghdad, where religious violence has increased. October has become the deadliest month for U.S. troops since November 2004. At least 87 U.S. servicemembers have died in Iraq this month.

President Bush has said that he'll consider any option to prevent violence in Iraq and that setting a timetable for withdrawal would be a victory for terrorists. White House officials said Monday that setting benchmarks for improvement isn't the same as a timetable.

“Working on trying to put together benchmarks is an important way of focusing and combining efforts so that everybody is playing off the same playbook, looking at the same goals and working together,” Snow said.

Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, and Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander there, are to appear at a news conference in Baghdad today to discuss efforts to improve security.

National Security Council spokesman Frederick Jones said Casey and Khalilzad will highlight progress in Iraq, including the training of Iraqi security forces and the U.S. military's successes in neutralizing the improvised bombs that are a major weapon of insurgents. “There is slow but sustained progress,” Jones said.

Al-Maliki's government is weak and pushing too hard could destabilize it, said Judith Yaphe, a researcher at the National Defense University in Washington. The prime minister has little political support, she said.

Part of that support comes from Muqtada al-Sadr, the anti-American cleric behind the Mahdi Army, a large militia in Baghdad. “To ask him now to get rid of the Mahdi Army — that might be difficult for him to do even if he wanted to do it,” Yaphe said. “What if you try and fail? Then you're discredited.”

Al-Maliki's government is trying for a political deal to disarm militias at the same time U.S. and Iraqi troops are trying to calm the streets. The government has said only a political consensus will lead to permanent peace.

In measuring progress, the administration looks at factors including Iraqi troops' readiness and government capabilities.

Security for as many as nine of Iraq's 18 provinces could be handed to the government by the end of this year, according to a Defense Department report to Congress.

“There's no doubt in my mind but that some of those projections we won't make; it will be later, or even earlier in some instances,” Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said Friday.

Analysis: Republicans Fear War Fallout (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum

AP, October 24, 2006

Republicans worried about losing Congress are challenging President Bush on Iraq, eroding his base of support for the unpopular war just two weeks before midterm elections.

Increasing calls from restive Republicans for new ideas to extricate the U.S. come as the White House itself seems to struggle for a better course, or at least a better way to describe the current course.

Republican Sen. John Warner of Virginia, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, seemed to open the floodgates to GOP criticism this month when he warned after a trip to Iraq that the war was "drifting sideways" and a course correction might soon be warranted.

DOJ_NMG_0085614

In recent days:

· Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, said she would not have supported the invasion had she known there were no weapons of mass destruction, and she has proposed splitting Iraq into three parts.

· Virginia Republican Sen. George Allen, in a difficult re-election battle with Democratic challenger James Webb, dropped his stay-the-course mantra to assert, "We cannot continue doing the same things and expect different results. We have to adapt our operations, adapt our tactics."

· Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., said in a debate last week with Democratic challenger Jon Tester that he agreed with Warner's call for a change in strategy — and believed Bush already had a plan to win the war but for now was keeping it quiet. That remark drew ridicule from Democrats who likened it to Richard Nixon's "secret plan" to end the war in Vietnam.

Also challenging Bush's Iraq policy have been former Secretary of State Colin Powell, Republican Sens. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe of Maine, and several House Republicans.

More and more, the issue is dominating election campaigns and altering the political landscape. That, and the historic pattern of midterm losses for the party holding the White House, has cast a heavy gloom over rank-and-file Republicans, particularly those on the ballot.

The GOP doubts, coupled with widespread Democratic opposition to Bush's strategy, put intense pressure on the White House to do something differently, and momentum for that will build if Republicans lose the House or Senate. Bush has stopped saying he is staying the course because that suggested he was locked into a losing policy. Now Bush asserts that he is constantly switching tactics.

Sen. James A Baker III, a former secretary of state who has a long history of loyalty to the Bush family, has said the Iraq Study Group — which he leads with former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana — will wait until after the Nov. 7 elections to present its recommendations.

But he has suggested the panel will present Bush with options somewhere between the extremes of "stay the course" and "cut and run."

Michael O'Hanlon, a foreign policy scholar at the Brookings Institution who is part of the Baker-Hamilton study group, deemed it unlikely that Baker would lend his support to a phased withdrawal such as some Democrats have advocated. "Baker's not a political novice," O'Hanlon said.

Still, he said, the Iraq government could be told that "you've got to make some big changes" and that U.S. military backing was not forever. Might Bush announce a change in strategy before the election? "Who knows? I wouldn't rule it out," said O'Hanlon.

Bush could portray it to the world "as being not about the election but about the failed Baghdad security plan, and give his party a little boost before the midterms," O'Hanlon said.

Mindful of the political ramifications, the White House sought on Monday to tamp down the growing GOP criticism by portraying the president as engaged — and flexible.

He met over the weekend with his generals, and on Monday with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

White House officials said U.S. and Iraqi leaders had established "milestones" and "benchmarks" to gauge security, economic and political improvements — but that the U.S. had not issued ultimatums nor withdrawal targets.

"What we aren't doing is sitting there with our heads in the ground," said White House counselor Dan Bartlett as he made the rounds of five morning television news shows. He said that the administration was "making tactical changes on a week-by-week basis as we respond to the enemy's reactions to our strategies."

Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, the senior Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, told reporters that two Republicans — whom he declined to name — had told him they would demand a new policy on Iraq after the election. He said the GOP lawmakers were told not to make waves before then because it could cost the party seats.

Biden predicted many GOP defections on Iraq if Democrats win control of one or more chambers of Congress. Polls suggest there is a likelihood Democrats could take at least the House.

As to Bush's oft-repeated statement that U.S. troops will stand down as Iraqi ones stand up, Biden said, "The reason we cannot stand down is that they aren't standing together. They're killing each other."

"I don't see a big surprise with respect to Iraq that turns it around, and that's the only thing that would help the Republicans," said James Thurber, an American University political scientist. "I think it just keeps getting worse and worse, and that is not good news for the president and the incumbent party in the House and the Senate."

Bush Admin. Won't Shift Iraq Strategy (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 24, 2006

Under election-year pressure to change course in Iraq, the Bush administration said Monday there are no plans for dramatic shifts in policy or for ultimatums to Baghdad to force progress.

Just two weeks before the Nov. 7 elections that will determine whether Republicans retain control of Congress, the White House tried to calm political anxieties about deteriorating security in Iraq. Both Democratic and Republican lawmakers are calling on President Bush to change his war plan.

"We're on the verge of chaos, and the current plan is not working," Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., said in an Associated Press interview. U.S. and Iraqi officials should be held accountable for the lack of progress, said Graham, a Republican who is a frequent critic of the administration's policies.

Asked who in particular should be held accountable — Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, perhaps, or the generals leading the war — Graham said: "All of them. It's their job to come up with a game plan" to end the violence.

Bush, in a CNBC interview, said, "Well, I've been talking about a change in tactics ever since I — ever since we went in, because the role of the commander in chief is to say to our generals, `You adjust to the enemy on the battlefield.'"

Rumsfeld, in remarks at the Pentagon, said U.S. government and military officials were working with Iraq to set broad time frames for when Iraqis can take over 16 provinces that are still under the control of U.S. troops. He said officials were not talking about penalizing the Iraqis if they don't hit certain benchmarks.

The Iraqis have taken control of two southern provinces but have been slow to take the lead in others, particularly those around Baghdad and in the volatile regions north and west of the capital city. Rumsfeld said specific target dates probably will not be set. Instead, he said there might be a broader time frame — such as a one- to three-month window — for the Iraqis to take control of certain provinces.

Rumsfeld visited the White House early Monday with Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Rumsfeld said the United States was looking at when the Iraqis would move close to setting up a reconciliation process to help quell worsening sectarian violence between Sunnis and Shiites.

Frustration with the war is eroding support in Republican as well as Democratic camps.

Joseph Biden, the top Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said two Republicans have told him they will demand a new policy in Iraq after the election. Biden declined to name the GOP lawmakers. He said Republicans have been told not to make waves before the election because it could cost the party seats. Yet some prominent GOP lawmakers have expressed doubts about Bush's policy.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said the United States was continually adjusting its strategy in Iraq.

"In that sense there are new things going on. But are there dramatic shifts in policy? The answer is no," Snow said.

"There is still a very large to-do list before Iraq is in a position to sustain, govern and defend itself," he said.

"Are we issuing ultimatums? No."

He acknowledged, however, that Bush no longer is saying that the United States will "stay the course" in Iraq.

"He stopped using it," Snow said of that phrase, adding that it left the impression that the administration was not adjusting its strategy to realities in Baghdad.

Showing progress in Iraq is critical with the approaching elections, which are widely viewed as a referendum on public support of the war. In Baghdad on Tuesday, Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, and Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander there, are scheduled to hold a rare joint news conference.

Facing growing impatience with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's failure to stem the carnage, Deputy Prime Minister Barham Saleh said international forces must not abandon Iraq while the situation there remains volatile.

"I do believe there is no option for the international community to cut and run," he told reporters after meeting Prime Minister Tony Blair in London. He said Iraqis and the international community need to be realistic, "but not defeatist."

"We need to understand that there is a need of utmost urgency to deal with many of the problems of Iraq but we must not give in to panic," he said.

Bipartisan Redeployment (WSJ)

By Joseph R. Biden Jr. And Leslie H. Gelb

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

Because the current course in Iraq is a losing course, we have to prepare ourselves to make the toughest decisions since the end of the Cold War. Neither Democrats nor Republicans alone will make them: No one wants to be blamed for what might happen next in Iraq. Thus, President Bush continues on autopilot with no end in sight, while some Democrats call for fixed withdrawal deadlines that no president would ever adopt.

The only way to carve out a new path is through bipartisanship. With a united voice we can speak with strength to Iraqis on the need to put their house in order, and find political protection here at home. Political leaders in our country must choose to hang together rather than hang separately. They have every incentive to do so. It is flatly against the security interests of the U.S. to stay the current course. It is also against the political interests of both parties. Republicans don't want to run for the presidency in 2008 with Iraq around their necks. Democrats do not want to assume the presidency in 2009 saddled with a losing war.

Serious members of both parties are prepared to seek a solution. It was in that spirit that Congress urged the creation of the "Iraq Study Group" to explore policy options, led by James A. Baker III, former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, former chairman of the House International Relations Committee -- a Republican and a Democrat both known for bipartisanship. The other eight members of their commission have stature in their parties to kickstart a bipartisan policy. They understand their responsibility to help our nation find a reasonable path out of Iraq's plunge toward civil war and the untenable situation for our troops.

The commission is expected to present its views publicly after the November elections. We believe that the group could cohere around three basic principles which we have advanced for some time and which are explained in detail at www.planforiraq.com1:

· First, there can be no military success in Iraq without a political settlement -- a power-sharing arrangement that gives its major groups incentives to pursue their interests peacefully instead of falling into a cycle of sectarian revenge. Mr. Bush's drive to establish a central government of national unity hasn't worked and won't work. The major parties in Iraq don't have the common interests, the trust in each other, or the capacity at this point to make it viable.

What could work is a federalized Iraq, with three or more largely autonomous regional governments to suit the separate interests of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds. A central government would administer common concerns, such as defending Iraq's borders and managing its energy infrastructure. The constitution already provides for this approach and Iraq's parliament last week passed a law to implement its articles on federalism. But for federalism to work, the constitution must be amended to guarantee Sunnis 20% of oil revenues to be administered by the central government. Only with such revenues could a Sunni region become economically and politically sustainable.

The final decisions will be up to the Iraqis. But without us helping them arrange the necessary compromises, as we have at every critical juncture, nothing will get done. With 140,000 Americans at risk, we have a right and a responsibility to make our views known.

· Second, we must have a plan prepared by our military for the redeployment and withdrawal of most U.S. troops over the next 18 months. Both Americans and Iraqis have to see that we are not blindly committing ourselves to civil war. And we have to recognize that keeping this level of forces in Iraq indefinitely is counterproductive for our mission and a growing challenge to the well-being of our volunteer military.

The redeployment plan has to prevent insurgent control of strategic areas; vet and train Iraqi forces; create strong incentives for Iraqis to assume battlefield and police responsibilities; and allow for a residual American force to keep Iraqis and their neighbors honest. There's no fixed or artificial timetable here to bind a president unreasonably. But we must unambiguously say to Iraqis, "Here is your last, best chance to escape a disastrous civil war with our help, and it is up to you, now."

· Third, we have to ignite the most vigorous regional diplomacy to back up the power-sharing deal among Iraqis and avoid neighbors warring over an Iraqi vacuum. Some of Iraq's neighbors have no desire to do us any favors -- but like us, they can see the abyss opening up before them, and like us, they all have powerful interests in preventing a full-blown civil war that becomes a regional war. We have to bring them together now to begin shaping and supporting a political settlement in Iraq -- or, if necessary, to contain the fallout from chaos inside Iraq.

Given the deterioration of the situation, no approach is an odds-on winner. But these three principles can unite our political parties. Nothing in them runs counter to the basic beliefs of either party. And unlike the present policy, they have a chance of working.

The Baker-Hamilton commission has a unique opportunity to generate a bipartisan way forward in Iraq. If it comes up with a better plan than the one we propose, we will embrace it. But whatever it does, it cannot kick the can down the road. It must come up with a strategy that allows us to leave Iraq without leaving chaos behind -- which is not being done in Washington now.

Mr. Biden is a Democratic senator from Delaware and ranking member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Mr. Gelb is president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations.

Three Choices, Mr. President (WP)

By Richard Holbrooke

DOJ_NMG_0085617

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Dear Mr. President:

As soon as the midterm elections are over -- and regardless of their outcome -- you will have to make the most consequential decision of your presidency, probably the most complicated any president has had to make since Lyndon Johnson decided to escalate in Vietnam in 1965, and far more difficult than your decisions after Sept. 11, 2001. Then, you rallied a nation in shock, overthrew the Taliban in Afghanistan and Saddam Hussein in Iraq, and confronted Iran and North Korea over their nuclear programs -- acting in all cases with self-confidence and overwhelming national approval.

Now all four projects are in peril. With far less public support, and time running out on your presidency, you must reverse the recent decline in Afghanistan, get North Korea back to the six-party talks, isolate a cocky, dangerous Iran that thinks events are going its way and, above all, figure out what to do with Iraq. So allow me to offer some very unsolicited suggestions on that war.

Broadly speaking, you have three choices: "Stay the course," escalate or start to disengage from Iraq while pressing hard for a political settlement. I will argue for the third course, not because it is perfect but because it is the least bad option.

In your radio address last week, you said that "our goal in Iraq is clear and unchanging: . . . victory." You added that the only thing changing "are the tactics. . . . Commanders on the ground are constantly adjusting their approach to stay ahead of the enemy, particularly in Baghdad." One can only hope that you do not mean those words literally -- or believe them. "Stay the course" is not a strategy; it is a slogan, useful in domestic politics but meaningless in the field.

Your real choice comes down to escalation or disengagement. If victory -- however defined -- is truly your goal, you should have sent more troops long ago. You and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld say that the commanders in Iraq keep telling you they don't need more troops, but, frankly, even if technically accurate, this is baffling. Plain and simple, there are not, and never have been, enough troops in Iraq to accomplish the mission.

But where would more troops come from? The Pentagon says the all-volunteer Army is stretched to the breaking point; it is now recruiting 42-year-olds and lowering entry standards. Afghanistan also needs more troops. And suppose additional troops do not turn the tide? Does the United States then send still more? Even advocates aren't sure escalation will produce a turnaround.

The last option is the most difficult for an embattled wartime president: Change your goals, disengage from the civil war already underway, focus maximum effort on seeking a political power-sharing agreement, and try to limit further damage in the region and the world.

Even your strongest critics understand that disengagement is fraught with risk. You have warned of the bloody consequences that might follow a U.S. withdrawal. Preventing such a tragedy must be your first priority. For this and other reasons, I do not favor a fixed timetable for withdrawal, since it would give away any remaining American flexibility and leverage. But the kind of killing that you predict would follow an American departure is in fact already underway, and nothing we have done has prevented it from increasing rapidly. At the current pace, there will be well over 40,000 murders a year in Iraq. A recent University of Maryland poll found that 78 percent of Iraqis surveyed believe the American presence is now "provoking more conflict than it is preventing," and 71 percent support a U.S. withdrawal within one year.

I urge you to lay out realistic goals, redeploy our troops and focus on the search for a political solution. We owe that to the Iraqis who welcomed the overthrow of Saddam Hussein and put their trust in us, only to find their lives in danger as a result. By a political solution, I mean something far more ambitious than current U.S. efforts aimed at improving the position of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki by changing ministers or setting timelines for progress. Sen. Joe Biden and Les Gelb have advocated what they call, in a reference to the negotiations that ended the war in Bosnia in 1995, a "Dayton-like" solution to the political situation -- by which they mean a looser federal structure with plenty of autonomy for each of the three main groups, and an agreement on sharing oil revenue. Your administration has dismissed these proposals out of hand, and the time lost since Gelb first presented them more than two years ago has made them far more difficult to achieve.

Yet only two weeks ago, the Iraqi parliament took a big step toward creating more powerful regions, with an interesting proviso to delay implementation for 18 months. You could use this legislation as leverage to negotiate a peaceful arrangement for sharing power and oil revenue, while redeploying and reducing our forces in Iraq. If such an effort fails, nothing has been lost by trying.

Those who say this is a proposal to partition Iraq into three countries (which it is not) and would trigger all-out civil war are misrepresenting the idea, while offering nothing in its place. Whatever else you do, Mr. President, you should send American troops to northern Iraq (Kurdistan), which is still safe but increasingly tense, to reduce the very real risk of a Turkish-Kurdish war. Both the Turks and the Kurds would welcome this U.S. presence, but it would have to be accompanied by a cessation of Kurdish terrorist raids into Turkey. This would allow Special Forces troops to move rapidly into other parts of Iraq if a terrorist target appeared, and it would show the world that you were not withdrawing from America's commitment to Iraq.

In recent years, almost any advocate of a change in policy has been accused of wanting to "cut and run." Such rhetoric works against the bipartisanship that this crisis requires. But if you were to decide to draw down American troops -- without a fixed timetable -- and seek a political compromise, the responsible leadership of the Democratic Party would surely work with you, especially if the Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by James Baker and Lee Hamilton, recommends significant changes in policy, which you could use as a starting point for rebuilding a bipartisan national consensus.

This crisis is far too acute for recrimination. If we are still at war during the 2008 campaign, as seems likely if you do not change course, it will benefit neither party but will leave your successor with the same choices you now face, but under far worse circumstances.

Trying To Contain The Iraq Disaster (NYT)

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

No matter what President Bush says, the question is not whether America can win in Iraq. The only question is whether the United States can extricate itself without leaving behind an unending civil war that will spread more chaos and suffering throughout the Middle East, while spawning terrorism across the globe.

The prospect of what happens after an American pullout haunts the debate on Iraq. The administration, for all its hints about new strategies and timetables, is obviously hoping to slog along for two more years and dump the problem on Mr. Bush's successor. This fall's election debates have educated very few voters because neither side is prepared to be honest about the terrible consequences of military withdrawal and the very long odds against success if American troops remain.

This page opposed a needlessly hurried and unilateral invasion, even before it became apparent that the Bush administration was unprepared to do the job properly. But after it happened, we believed that America should stay and try to clean up the mess it had made — as long as there was any conceivable road to success.

That road is vanishing. Today we want to describe a strategy for containing the disaster as much as humanly possible. It is hardly a recipe for triumph. Americans can only look back in wonder on the days when the Bush administration believed that success would turn Iraq into a stable, wealthy democracy — a model to strike fear into the region's autocrats while inspiring a new generation of democrats. Even last fall, the White House was dividing its strategy into a series of victorious outcomes, with the short-term goal of an Iraq "making steady progress in fighting terrorists." The medium term had Iraq taking the lead in "providing its own security" and "on its way to achieving its economic potential," with the ultimate outcome being a "peaceful, united, stable and secure" nation.

If an American military occupation could ever have achieved those goals, that opportunity is gone. It is very clear that even with the best American effort, Iraq will remain at war with itself for years to come, its government weak and deeply divided, and its economy battered and still dependent on outside aid. The most the United States can do now is to try to build up Iraq's security forces so they can contain the fighting — so it neither devours Iraqi society nor spills over to Iraq's neighbors — and give Iraq's leaders a start toward the political framework they would need if they chose to try to keep their country whole.

The tragedy is that even this marginal sort of outcome seems nearly unachievable now. But if America is to make one last push, there are steps that might lessen the chance of all-out chaos after the troops withdraw:

Start at Home

For all the talk of timetables for Iraq, there has been little discussion of the timetable that must be handed to George W. Bush. The president cannot leave office with American troops still dying in an Iraq that staggers along just short of civil war, on behalf of no concrete objective other than "get the job done," which is now Mr. Bush's rhetorical substitute for "stay the course." The administration's current vague talk about behind-the-scenes agreements with Iraqi politicians is next to meaningless. Americans, Iraqis and the rest of the world need clear, public signs of progress.

Mr. Bush can make the first one by firing Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld. There is no chance of switching strategy as long as he is in control of the Pentagon. The administration's plans have gone woefully wrong, and while the president is unlikely to admit that, he can send a message by removing Mr. Rumsfeld. It would also be a signal to the military commanders in the field that the administration now wants to hear the truth about what they need, what can be salvaged out of this mess, and what cannot.

The president should also make it clear, once and for all, that the United States will not keep permanent bases in Iraq. The people in Iraq and across the Middle East need a strong sign that the troops are not there to further any American imperial agenda.

Demand Reconciliation Talks

Iraq's prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, has indefinitely postponed reconciliation talks among the nation's top politicians. He must receive an immediate deadline to start the process. Tomorrow would not be too soon; the end of the year would be too late.

Whatever decisions Iraqi leaders reached over the past few years were achieved by pushing aside all the critical questions that were hardest to address. The Bush administration must demand not only that new talks start, but that they continue until some agreement is reached on protecting minority rights, dividing up Iraq's oil revenues, the role of religion in the state, providing an amnesty for insurgents willing to put down their weapons, and demobilizing and disarming the militias.

More outside aid could increase their incentive to talk. Even then, the threat of an American withdrawal may be the only way to extract real concessions. In parallel with the reconciliation talks, the United States should begin its own negotiations with the Iraqi leadership about a timetable for withdrawing American troops — making clear that America's willingness to stay longer will depend on the Iraqis' willingness to make real compromises. Iraqi politicians have to know that they have even more to lose if their country plunges into complete civil war.

We are skeptical of calls to divide the country into three ethnically controlled regions, using the model that finally ended the Bosnian war. Most Iraqis, except for the Kurds, show little enthusiasm for the idea. Clear ethnic boundaries could not be drawn without driving many people from their homes — though an intolerable level of ethnic cleansing is already pushing things in that direction. Any effort at reconciliation will almost certainly require a transfer of power and resources to provincial and local governments. But it must be up to the Iraqis to decide the ultimate shape of their country.

Stabilize Baghdad

Most Iraqis have forgotten what security is — or if they remember, it is an idealized vision of Saddam Hussein's dictatorship. Since neither the government nor the American occupation is able to provide basic services or safety, it is little wonder that Iraqis have turned to the militias for protection. In such a world, retribution will always take precedence over the uncertainties of political compromise.

American commanders have launched a series of supposedly make-or-break campaigns to take back the streets of Baghdad. The problem is not one of military strategy; their idea of "clearing" out insurgents, "holding" neighborhoods and quickly rebuilding infrastructure is probably the only thing that could work. The problem is that commanders in Baghdad have been given only a fraction of the troops — American and Iraqi — they need.

There have never been enough troops, the result of Mr. Rumsfeld's negligent decision to use Iraq as a proving ground for his pet military theories, rather than listen to his generals. And since the Army and Marines are already strained to the breaking point, the only hope of restoring even limited sanity to Baghdad would require the transfer of thousands of American troops to the capital from elsewhere in the country. That likely means moving personnel out of the Sunni-dominated west, and more mayhem in a place like Anbar.

But Iraqis need a clear demonstration that security and rebuilding is possible. So long as Baghdad is in chaos they will have no reason to believe in anything but sectarian militias and vigilante justice. Once Washington is making a credible effort to stabilize Baghdad, Iraqi politicians will have more of an incentive to show up for reconciliation talks. No one wants to be a rejectionist if it looks like the tide might be turning.

Convene the Neighbors

America's closest allies in the region are furious about America's gross mismanagement of the war. But even Iran and Syria, which are eager to see America bloodied, have a great deal to lose if all-out civil war erupts in Iraq, driving refugees toward their borders. That self-interest could be the start of a discussion about how Iraq's neighbors might help pressure their clients inside Iraq to step back from the brink. Saudi Arabia and other oil-rich neighbors — whose own stability could be threatened by an Iraqi collapse — need to be pressed into providing major financing to underwrite jobs programs and reconstruction.

Enlightened self-interest is a rarity in the Middle East. The Bush administration will most likely have to go further to elicit real help, showing a serious willingness to expand its dialogue with Damascus and Tehran beyond the issue of Iraq and to be a genuine broker for Middle East peace. That should be the easiest part of the strategy — only this White House regards the willingness to talk to another country as a major concession.

Acknowledge Reality

While the strategy described above seems the best bet to us, the odds are still very much against it working. At this point, all plans to avoid disaster involve the equivalent of a Hail Mary pass. In America, almost no one — even the administration's harshest critics — wants to tell people the bitter truth about how few options remain on the table, and about the mayhem that will almost certainly follow an American withdrawal unless more is done.

Truth will only take us so far, but it is the right way to begin. Americans will probably spend the next generation debating whether the Iraq invasion would have worked under a competent administration. Right now, the best place to express bitterness about what may become the worst foreign policy debacle in American history is at the polls. But anger at a president is not a plan for what happens next.

When it comes to Iraq the choices in the immediate future are scant and ugly. But there are still a few options to pursue, and the alternatives are so horrible that it is worth trying once again — as long as everyone understands that there is little time left and the odds are very long.

Iraq Invasion May Be 'disaster' (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Steve Negus

Financial Times, October 24, 2006

The invasion of Iraq could eventually be judged to have been a disaster, Margaret Beckett, foreign secretary, indicated on Monday.

Speaking against a backdrop of increased speculation about a pull-out of western forces from the country, Ms Beckett sought to reduce expectations of a rapid withdrawal but also steered well clear of claiming that the mission would succeed.

Ms Beckett was asked in an interview on the BBC's World at One whether historians would judge the invasion to be a foreign policy disaster. She responded: "Yes, they may. Then again, they may not."

She also warned against "rash predictions" of a military pull-out. Kim Howells, UK Foreign Office minister of state, said at the weekend that there would be "adequately trained Iraqi soldiers and security forces" to take over from coalition troops in about a year.

The foreign secretary added, when asked whether there would eventually be a partition of the country: "That is very much a matter for the Iraqis."

Ms Beckett was speaking during a visit to London by a senior Iraqi politician, who also warned that the growing debate about the US and British deployments should not "panic" the coalition into withdrawing troops too soon.

"I'm obviously concerned about the debate both in the US and Europe, I have to say, because there's too much of a pessimistic tone in this debate, even in certain circles a defeatist tone," Barham Saleh, Iraqi deputy prime minister, told the BBC. "We must not give in to panic. This is too serious a situation to be dealt with in that way."

Mr Saleh said: "By the end of this year, nearly seven or eight provinces of Iraq out of 18 provinces will be under direct Iraqi security control."

British military officials say a reduced coalition presence would remain in the country after such a handover. This month Gen Sir Richard Dannatt, chief of the British army, said he was putting together force "packages" into 2008.

Yet violence late last week between rival Shia groups in Amara, the capital of the southern province of Maysan, raised questions about the pace of any withdrawal of coalition troops. British troops withdrew from Amara, handing responsibility over to Iraqi security forces, only in August.

Militiamen on Friday attacked several police stations in the city and streetfighting left at least 24 dead. On Monday, a stand-off between Iraqi police and the radical Mahdi Army continued in the city.

A British military spokesman said there had been no clashes for 24 hours, with 3,000 Iraqi army troops keeping order in the streets and a 600-strong British force standing by as back-up. But he said violence "could well erupt at a moment's notice again".

Des Browne, the UK defence secretary, said on Sunday: "The events over the weekend in Maysan suggest that the Iraqi security forces in [Amara] able to deal with their own security."

In a continuing sign that the mission in Iraq is being questioned, a former head of Britain's armed forces, Lord Inge, said last week: "I don't believe we have a clear strategy in either Afghanistan or Iraq. I sense we've lost ability to think strategically."

British officials emphasised that Mr Saleh's visit dealt primarily with the economic reconstruction of Iraq and a new international compact that would rebuild the country's relations with its neighbours.

Bush Doctrine Must Survive Iraq War (FT)

By Lawrence Kaplan

Financial Times, October 24, 2006

In this US election season, the political argument against the Iraq war has evolved and broadened into something quite familiar. What began as a critique of an ineptly conceived and executed war has, on the stump at least, hardened into a denunciation of every facet of the Bush administration's foreign policy. But does telling evidence brought against a war necessarily repudiate the doctrine in whose name it was fought?

Bush doctrine critics might do well to cast a glance backward, for this is hardly the first time critics have extrapolated from the particulars of a controversial war and gone too far. Two years of war in Korea convinced many Republicans that President Harry Truman's containment doctrine was a dead letter. Even as John Foster Dulles took to the pages of Life Magazine to condemn the young doctrine, the 1952 Republican platform was attacking the "negative, futile and immoral policy of 'containment'". Republicans, though, would soon enshrine in official policy the same doctrine they had spent years assailing.

Two decades later, the Democratic party learned a similar lesson. With Vietnam still fresh in the American imagination, President Jimmy Carter insisted on transcending the belief "that Soviet expansion was almost inevitable but that it must be contained". But if Americans were not interested in the dialectic, to paraphrase a founding father of Soviet communism, the dialectic was still interested in them. Duly chastened by the world around him, Mr Carter came to realise that a doctrine's misapplication in Vietnam had not invalidated the doctrine itself.

Similarly, when critics advertise the Iraq war as the decisive repudiation of a broader doctrine, they may be jettisoning the good with the bad. While Commentary magazine has pronounced the Bush doctrine alive and well, Time magazine has declared it dead and buried in Iraq. But the essential question is whether it should be. True, Iraq is where the Bush doctrine has been most visible and most visibly put to the test. It is equally true that it has failed that test. But is it really necessary to point out that the doctrine's signatures – democracy promotion, pre-emption and unilateral action – have relevance beyond Iraq?

As to the first of these Iraq has led the likes of John Kerry, Democratic senator, to conclude that democracy ought to take a back seat to "stability" and Pat Roberts, Republican senator, to caution that America must not pretend "it is both entitled and obligated to promote democracy".

There is, of course, ample room for disagreement on the question of how to promote democracy, particularly in Iraq, where Washington applied a cartoon version of democratisation that equated the absence of oppression with the existence of democracy. What is being debated after Iraq, however, is not the mechanics of democracy promotion but its very desirability. Yet Iraq does not disprove the fact that democracies have a taboo about launching wars against one another, their thin history of exporting terrorism or their congeniality toward the US. For these reasons alone exporting democracy still falls squarely in the realm of America's grand strategy.

If democratic idealism is one element of the Bush doctrine that needs to be rescued from Iraq, North Korea's nuclear test suggests the idea of preventive war may be another. A Time cover story has revealed that Iraq might "not only be the first but also the last laboratory for preventive war". Never mind that the principle has been an essential tool of American statecraft for more than a century. Never mind, too, that a more recent Time cover story – "What War With Iran Would Look Like" – suggests that, in this era of proliferation and unhinged brinkmanship, it may be premature to banish preventive war from the lexicon of American military affairs. Seeking to do just that, Dick Durbin, the Democrat senator and leading Darfur campaigner, claims America must be a "defensive nation". But a defensive nation cannot rescue Darfur or Kosovo or Bosnia or any other place that requires America to act without direct provocation. Nor, for that matter, could an America that forfeits its right to act unilaterally.

Notwithstanding critics who insist Iraq proves the folly of thwarting the will of the United Nations, the Bush doctrine's reservations about "submitting to the objections of a few" hardly set it apart from its predecessors. Every US president since the UN's establishment has acted at one time or another without its approval. Given the institution's congenital indecision, every future president will do so as well. Being little more than the sum of its parts, even today the UN quietly tolerates Iran and Sudan's flouting of its own resolutions.

That the lessons of Iraq should be heeded in policy deliberations makes sense. But such lessons, by themselves, provide no adequate response to a menacing international scene. Rather than offer a lucid analysis of the mismatch between the Bush doctrine's objectives and accomplishments – refining or discarding its most controversial elements – critics on the campaign trail have offered a formula for virtual -disarmament.

Niall Ferguson: America's Brittle Empire (LAT)

Niall Ferguson

The Los Angeles Times, October 24, 2006

The U.S. doesn't have the necessary military manpower or fiscal solvency of its imperial predecessors in Iraq.

YOU WOULD HAVE thought 300 million Americans would be enough to rule the world — or at least a couple of medium-sized failed states. The population of Iraq is 27 million, that of Afghanistan 31 million. Yet the same week that the U.S. population officially passed the 300-million mark, we heard two startling admissions that testify to the scale of crisis facing Washington's unspoken empire.

Asked Sunday on ABC's "This Week" program whether the situation in Iraq was comparable to that in Vietnam at the time of the 1968 Tet Offensive — an event popularly (though wrongly) perceived as the beginning of the end for the U.S. defense of South Vietnam — the president conceded the comparison "could be right." And on Thursday, the spokesman for the U.S. military command in Iraq confessed that the Army's latest effort to quell the escalating civil war in central Iraq "has not met our overall expectations of sustaining a reduction in the levels of violence" — military-speak for "has totally failed." A year ago, these admissions would have been headline news. Today, people just shrug. That Iraq is Washington's new "quagmire" has become conventional wisdom.

But why should this be so? Less than a century ago, before World War I, the population of Britain was 46 million, barely 2.5% of humanity. And yet the British were able to govern a vast empire that encompassed an additional 375 million people, more than a fifth of the world's population. Why can't 300 million Americans control fewer than 30 million Iraqis? Three years ago, as the United States swept into Iraq, I wrote a book titled "Colossus," which offered a somber prediction, summed up in its subtitle, "The Rise and Fall of the American Empire." My argument was that the United States was unlikely to be as successful or as enduring an imperial power as its British predecessor for three reasons: its financial deficit, its attention deficit and, perhaps most surprisingly, its manpower deficit. Rather cruelly, I compared the American empire to a "strategic couch-potato … consuming on credit, reluctant to go to the front line [and] inclined to lose interest in protracted undertakings."

I wish I'd been proved wrong. Sadly, events in Iraq have borne out that analysis. No Marshall Plan for the Middle East materialized to revive the Iraqi economy. And domestic support for the enterprise proved short-lived. I have spent much of the last month on the road, talking to readers in bookstores and lecture halls from downtown Manhattan to Pasadena to rural Arizona. Practically everyone I have talked to — including many a Republican — yearns for their country to get out of Iraq.

Lack of funds. Ephemeral support. These problems were not hard to predict because they had characterized previous U.S. incursions into foreign lands (the postwar occupations of West Germany and Japan remain the only exceptions that prove the rule). The manpower deficit, however, remains puzzling. Just why is the world's third-most -populous country so short of boots on the ground? The obvious answer is that, considering the size of the U.S. population and the Pentagon's vast budget, the American military is a remarkably small outfit. In 2004, the number of Department of Defense personnel on active duty was 1,427,000, substantially fewer than the country's 2-million-strong prison population. Of those on active duty, barely a fifth were overseas, of whom 171,000 were in Iraq. That works out to 0.06% of the total U.S. population.

The number of troops currently in Iraq is less than 140,000. That's roughly as many soldiers as Britain sent to the same country to defeat an insurgency in 1920 — at a time when the population of Iraq was a 10th of what it is today. The low level of military participation in the United States is, admittedly, something of a national tradition. A hundred years ago, the armed forces accounted for 1.6% of the French population, 1.1% of the German population and 0.9% of the British population — but only 0.1% of the American population. The difference is that today the U.S. is trying to play the kind of role that the European powers played back then. It's an empire, to put it bluntly, with too few legions.

To make matters worse, the Department of Defense has been run since 2001 by a man who fervently believes that less is more. It was Donald Rumsfeld, we now know, who repeatedly dismissed expert advice that several hundred thousand troops would be needed to ensure the stability of postwar Iraq.

In 2003, I argued that this kind of error could be corrected if only U.S. leaders would learn some history. That was naive. Policy about Iraq has never been based on a rational assessment of that country's needs. Rumsfeld's paramount concern appears to have been to win the turf wars between the Defense Department, the Joint Chiefs and the State Department — just as Vice President Dick Cheney's was to satisfy the appetites of the GOP base for big tax cuts and cheap victories. Writing in the 1920s, German historian Eckart Kehr argued that the foreign policy of the Kaiser's Germany was the defective product of the "primacy of domestic politics."

I have come to see that U.S. foreign policy suffers from a similar pathology. The primacy of domestic politics — in the form of bureaucratic infighting and electoral manipulation — explains why the Iraq enterprise has, from the outset, been so chronically short-staffed.

The personnel deficit is not just about politics, however. "We're an empire now," a presidential aide told the journalist Ron Suskind in a moment of hubris in 2004, "and when we act, we create our own reality." But maybe the reality is that the U.S. is demographically incapable of acting as a traditional empire. After all, empire is partly about the export of people; about colonists and settlers. The United States, by contrast, is about the import of people, to the tune of roughly 1.5 million newcomers a year; the country expands by importing, not exporting, people.

In short, we seem doomed by domestic politics and demography to re-enact Vietnam in Iraq. The only question is what age the 300-millionth American will be when the last American is airlifted out.

Seriously Misspoken (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Okay, now they're just making stuff up. George W. Bush went on television Sunday and claimed that on Iraq war policy, "We've never been 'stay the course' " -- as if no record survived of all the times he has used those very words. Maybe he was trying to outdo Dick Cheney, who went on the radio last week and proclaimed that the beleaguered Iraqi government is doing "remarkably well."

Cheney's well-hidden sense of humor must be tremendously subtle. I can only assume that "remarkably well" was his version of the old joke about the man who falls off a 20-story building and, as he passes each floor on the way down, is heard to call out, "So far, so good!"

I'm fairly sure that the president and the vice president of the United States haven't completely lost touch with reality. I can't believe that Bush has forgotten making "stay the course" a Republican midterm election mantra, the counterpoint to the "cut and run" label he is trying to hang on the Democrats. And someone must have summoned the courage to tell Cheney that more than 85 American troops have been killed in Iraq so far in October, making it the deadliest month for U.S. forces in a year.

If Bush and Cheney were being sincere, then they're lying to themselves; if not, they're lying to the rest of us. My money is on the latter.

One administration functionary who told the truth about Iraq had to quickly apologize for his candor. Alberto Fernandez, the State Department official in charge of public diplomacy for the Middle East, said on the al-Jazeera television network that the United States had shown "arrogance" and "stupidity" in Iraq. The interview was broadcast Saturday; by Sunday, the State Department's Web site was quoting Fernandez as saying he "seriously misspoke" and as disowning his perfectly accurate remarks. I imagine Fernandez is already packing for his new job as deputy assistant consul general somewhere in the hinterlands of Kyrgyzstan.

The White House is still trying to shore up and defend a rhetorical Maginot Line that was overrun long ago, erased by implacable insurgents, sectarian militias, revanchist claimants to Iraq's vast oil wealth and Iraqi government officials whose interests do not necessarily coincide with those of the United States.

By now it has become obvious even to some of the administration's staunchest supporters that the Iraq war is a disaster. Republican incumbents who have to face the voters two weeks from now, especially, are seeing the war in a new light. The president was wrong the other day when he allowed that there might be a parallel between the current escalation of violence and the pivotal Tet Offensive in Vietnam in 1968. Tet began to shift public opinion against the Vietnam quagmire; in the case of Iraq, most Americans already oppose the war.

The president keeps saying that U.S. forces will stay in Iraq until we "get the job done," but no one knows anymore what that job might be. Does anyone still think a Western-style democracy is going to come out of this mess? Can anyone be sure that the Iraqi forces we're training and arming won't splinter into groups that defend their own parochial interests? Is anyone confident that if a government strong enough to control the whole country finally emerges, the new Iraq will even be a reliable ally of the United States?

By now it's shared wisdom -- outside of the White House, the Pentagon and perhaps the innermost precincts of Baghdad's Green Zone -- that there are no good options in Iraq, just bad ones. Setting deadlines for the Iraqi government to establish order and make painful political compromises isn't really a plan; it's a wish. Splitting the country into three parts would create a horrible mess. Pulling all U.S. forces out now would leave a horrible mess. Pulling all U.S. forces out a year from now would leave, yes, a horrible mess.

The least unattractive option is probably some sort of phased withdrawal. There is no justification for continuing to sacrifice American troops when no attainable goal is in sight.

The truth is that "the job," to the extent that Bush has been able to define it, almost certainly will never get done. The question is how many more American and Iraqi lives will be lost before the president admits it, drops all the bluster and acknowledges what Americans already know: "I made a mistake."

Iraq And Your Wallet (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

For every additional second we stay in Iraq, we taxpayers will end up paying an additional $6,300.

So aside from the rising body counts and all the other good reasons to adopt a timetable for withdrawal from Iraq, here's another: We are spending vast sums there that would be better spent rescuing the American health care system, developing alternative forms of energy and making a serious effort to reduce global poverty.

In the run-up to the Iraq war, Donald Rumsfeld estimated that the overall cost would be under $50 billion. Paul Wolfowitz argued that Iraq could use its oil to "finance its own reconstruction."

But now several careful studies have attempted to tote up various costs, and they suggest that the tab will be more than $1 trillion — perhaps more than $2 trillion. The higher sum would amount to $6,600 per American man, woman and child.

"The total costs of the war, including the budgetary, social and macroeconomic costs, are likely to exceed $2 trillion," Joseph Stiglitz, the Nobel-winning economist at Columbia, writes in an updated new study with Linda Bilmes, a public finance specialist at Harvard. Their report has just appeared in the Milken Institute Review, as an update on a paper presented earlier this year.

Just to put that $2 trillion in perspective, it is four times the additional cost needed to provide health insurance for all uninsured Americans for the next decade. It is 1,600 times Mr. Bush's financing for his vaunted hydrogen energy project.

Another study, by two economists at the American Enterprise Institute, used somewhat different assumptions and came up with a lower figure — about $1 trillion. Those economists set up a nifty Web site, www.aei-brookings.org/iraqcosts, where you can tinker with the underlying assumptions and come up with your own personal estimates.

Of course, many of the costs are hidden and haven't even been spent yet. For example, more than 3,000 American veterans have suffered severe head injuries in Iraq, and the U.S. government will have to pay for round-the-clock care for many of them for decades. The cost ranges from $600,000 to $5 million per person.

Then there are disability payments that will continue for a half-century. Among veterans of the first gulf war — in which ground combat lasted only 100 hours — 40 percent ended up receiving disability payments, still costing us $2 billion each year. We don't know how many of today's veterans will claim such benefits, but in the first quarter of this year more people sought care through the Department of Veterans Affairs than the Bush administration had budgeted for the entire year.

The war has also forced the military to offer re-enlistment bonuses that in exceptional circumstances reach $150,000. Likewise, tanks, helicopters and other battlefield equipment will have to be replaced early, since the Pentagon says they are being worn out at up to six times the peacetime rate.

The administration didn't raise taxes to pay for the war, so we're financing it by borrowing from China and other countries. Those borrowing costs are estimated to range from $264 billion to $308 billion in interest.

Then there are economic costs to the nation as a whole. For example, the price of oil was in the $20- to $30-a-barrel range early in this decade but has now shot up to more than $50, partly because of the drop in Iraq's oil exports and partly because of war-related instability in the Middle East. Professors Stiglitz and Bilmes note that if just $10 of the increase is attributable to the war, that amounts to a $450 billion drag on the economy over six years.

The bottom line is that not only have we squandered 2,800 American lives and considerable American prestige in Iraq, but we're also paying $18,000 per household to do so.

We still face the choice of whether to remain in Iraq indefinitely or to impose a timetable and withdraw U.S. troops. These studies suggest that every additional year we keep our troops in Iraq will add $200 billion to our tax bills.

My vote would be to spend a chunk of that sum instead fighting malaria, AIDS and maternal mortality, bolstering American schools, and assuring health care for all Americans. We're spending $380,000 for every extra minute we stay in Iraq, and we can find better ways to spend that money.

One Nation, Divisible (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

An American in Iraq has finally gotten it almost right.

J. D. Thurman, the major general who is the senior commander of U.S. forces in Baghdad, has figured out the obstacle to America's dream for Iraq.

"Part of our problem is that we want this more than they do," General Thurman told The Times's Michael Gordon, alluding to American efforts to unify Iraqis. "We need to get people to stop worrying about self and start worrying about Iraq."

That's a refreshingly candid alternative to the usual lines we hear about the Iraqi people's patriotism and resolve. General Thurman predicted that Americans will keep struggling unless Iraqis put aside their differences. Quite right — and quite depressing, because they're not about to do it, no matter what timetable the U.S. tries to impose.

But what's stopping them is not selfishness. When General Thurman talked about the conflict between serving oneself and serving one's country, he was applying an American template to a different culture. Rampant individualism is not the problem in Iraq.

The problem is that they have so many social obligations more important to them than national unity. Iraqis bravely went to the polls and waved their purple fingers, but they voted along sectarian lines. Appeals to their religion trumped appeals to the national interest. And as the beleaguered police in Amara saw last week, religion gets trumped by the most important obligation of all: the clan.

The deadly battle in Amara wasn't between Sunnis and Shiites, but between two Shiite clans that have feuded for generations. After one clan's militia destroyed police stations and took over half the city, the Iraqi Army did not ride to the rescue. Authorities regained control only after the clan leaders negotiated a truce.

When the U.S. invaded Iraq, American optimists invoked Germany and Japan as models for their democratization project, but Iraq didn't have the cultural cohesion or national identity of those countries. The shrewdest forecasts I heard came not from foreign policy experts but from anthropologists and sociologists who noted a crucial statistic: nearly half of Iraqis were married to their first or second cousins.

Unlike General Thurman and other Westerners, members of these tightly knit Iraqi clans don't look on society as a collection of individuals working for the common good of the nation. "In a modern state a citizen's allegiance is to the state, but theirs is to their clan and their tribe," Ihsan M. al-Hassan, a sociologist at the University of Baghdad, warned three years ago. "If one person in your clan does something wrong, you favor him anyway, and you expect others to treat their relatives the same way."

These allegiances explain why Iraqis don't want to give up their local militias. They know it's unrealistic to expect protection from a national force of soldiers or police officers from other clans, other regions, other religions. When the Iraqi Army ordered reinforcements to go help Americans keep peace in Baghdad, several Iraqi battalions deserted rather than risk their lives defending strangers.

Instead of trying to transform Iraqis into patriots and build up national security forces, the U.S. should be urging decentralization. The national government should concentrate on defending the borders and equitably distributing oil revenue, ideally by distributing shares of the oil wealth directly to citizens.

Most other duties, including maintaining law and order, should devolve to autonomous local governments: one for the Kurdish north, one for the Sunni Triangle, one for the Shiite south, plus coalition governments in Baghad and the multiethnic region around Kirkuk. The result would hardly be peace. There would still be murderous religious conflicts in Baghdad and fierce interclan battles in towns like Amara.

But the local leaders — elected officials, police officers, sheiks, clerics — would be in a better position to provide security and negotiate truces than would a national government. It's no accident that the most stable part of Iraq is also the most autonomous: Kurdistan, where two rival clans have negotiated a relatively peaceful coexistence.

It wouldn't be easy for Iraqis in other regions to work out their differences, but the local leaders would have one crucial advantage over any Iraqis or Americans giving orders from Baghdad. They would realize their neighbors are not going to suddenly embrace national unity. They would know you make peace with the citizenry you have, not the one you want.

Iraqi Prime Minister Acts To Rein In Militias (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 23 -- Iraq has ordered its security forces to crack down on unlawful acts by armed factions, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said Monday in a rare public rebuke to the Shiite militias allied with his government.

Although the statement was bolder than usual for Maliki, it fell short of directing that the illegal militias be disbanded, a move that American officials are increasingly urging as sectarian bloodletting and other violence soar.

Shiite militias have been accused of targeting Iraq's Sunni minority in a growing number of brazen killings. The largest of the militias belong to the two Shiite religious parties leading Maliki's government.

Meanwhile, a U.S. soldier in Baghdad was reported missing late Monday, and residents said American forces had sealed the central Karrada district and were conducting door-to-door searches, according to the Associated Press.

A military official in Washington told the AP that the missing service member was a translator and that the initial report was that he may have been abducted. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because the information had not been cleared for release.

In his statement Monday, the prime minister acknowledged that unspecified "illegal groups with weapons" were carrying out operations that are undermining security in the country. Iraq's security forces had been directed "to confront the attempts to break the law, regardless of their source," he said.

Maliki singled out turmoil in Maysan province, where the Mahdi Army militia of Moqtada al-Sadr, the powerful Shiite cleric, was accused Monday of renewing attacks on police officers in the provincial capital, Amarah. The police belong to a rival militia, the Badr Organization, formerly known as the Badr Brigade.

The accusation came after Mahdi Army fighters shot four policemen to death, leading Badr militiamen to behead the teenage brother of a Mahdi Army commander, the Associated Press reported.

DOJ_NMG_0085626

Iraqi army troops allegedly failed to intervene. About 500 additional troops have been deployed to Amarah since a burst of fighting last week between the two militias killed at least 25 people. In his statement, Maliki appealed to local residents to resist being pulled into the fighting.

Since midsummer, there have been record numbers of attacks on Iraqi forces and record numbers of deaths among Iraqi civilians, with more than 2,600 civilians killed last month in Baghdad alone.

Dozens of slaying victims are collected each day from the capital's streets. On Monday, 52 bodies were found across Baghdad; three of the dead had been beheaded, police said.

Other violence included a bombing in the capital that killed three Iraqis.

Attacks on American troops are also at one of their highest points of the war, with 87 killed already this month. The figure is the highest monthly toll for American forces here since October 2005, when 96 troops were killed.

The U.S. military on Monday reported two American fatalities, with a Marine killed Saturday in the western province of Anbar and a soldier killed in a bombing in Baghdad. The military also said a member of the international force training Iraqi policemen was killed Sunday in a roadside bombing in eastern Baghdad.

In London, Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Barham Salih called for U.S.-led forces to stay in Iraq until their Iraqi counterparts are capable of securing the country.

"I do believe there is no option for the international community to cut and run," Salih told reporters after meeting British Prime Minister Tony Blair. About 7,000 British troops are assigned to southern Iraq.

Salih said Iraqi forces would be in control of at least seven of Iraqi's 18 provinces by the end of the year, adding, "We understand that this cannot be an open-ended commitment by the international community."

Troops Take On Insurgent Haven (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

CAMP STRYKER, Iraq, Oct. 23 -- Minutes before sunrise Monday, two companies of American soldiers inched in Humvees toward a hulking concrete compound near this base south of Baghdad, guns ready, their eyes on a long-coveted target along the banks of the Euphrates River.

Nestled in a Sunni stronghold isolated by the river, bomb-seeded roads and a long canal, the Yusufiyah Thermal Power Plant is a prime example of one of the most serious concerns for U.S. commanders: It is an insurgent sanctuary just miles outside Baghdad from which fighters have launched attacks and terrorist bombings in the surrounding area.

Surveillance photos have shown enemy muzzle flashes coming from the upper floors of the sprawling facility, and officials believe it has served as an important way station for the movement of arms, explosives and men. Previous U.S. military units had attacked, but with low numbers of soldiers to commit to the fight, and were ultimately driven out by persistent counterattacks.

As the Humvees rolled in Monday morning and soldiers began storming the main building, Maj. Kenny Mintz watched live aerial video of the raid, which was several months in the making.

"Getting in there isn't the hard part, it's staying there," said Mintz, operations officer for the 2nd Brigade Combat Team of the 10th Mountain Division, which is running Operation Commando Thrust to occupy an area known as the Shakariya triangle. "The insurgents go where you're not. The power plant is important because it will offer us a place we can project from in a problem area. It has been untouched, and we have to be there."

More than three years into the Iraq war, insurgent safe havens in such close proximity to Baghdad underscore the complexity of the fight U.S. forces continue to wage. As American troops try to shore up Iraqi government institutions, transfer large swaths of territory to Iraqi forces and dampen spiraling sectarian strife, they are confronted by still lawless areas like this one.

The triangle's three points are Sadr al-Yusufiyah on the Euphrates to the northwest, the Jefur al-Sakur Bridge on the Euphrates to the south and Yusufiyah to the east. The region is a fault line between Iraq's Sunni and Shiite Arab populations and a scene of flaring sectarian violence.

As they make the first sustained effort to seize the triangle, U.S. troops in recent days have discovered more than 100 large weapons caches -- buried in 55-gallon blue plastic drums in the tall reeds along the Janabi canal -- that officials believe have been used in attacks and deadly explosions in and around Baghdad. Including several 500-pound aircraft bombs, the materials are estimated to be enough to build more than 1,000 roadside bombs and supply a battalion of fighters, roughly 400 people.

Amid the caches, guns from downed U.S. helicopters have been found, apparently salvaged as trophies. On Sunday, mortar rounds that were fired into a temporary U.S. patrol base nearby killed a young soldier with the unit.

Securing the power plant site has special symbolic importance to the U.S. military because the booby-trapped bodies of two soldiers who were captured and killed in June at a nearby checkpoint were dumped at the bridge crossing into the compound.

This offensive is playing out in the 600-square-mile sector that is the 2-10 Mountain's area of operations, a mix of rural Sunni farmland to the north and west and a dense urban setting to the south and east.

As Shiite militias have gained strength across the region, they have been trying to move into cities such as Mahmudiyah and Latifiyah, escalating sectarian violence. The Iraqi army brigade in the region is having mixed success. A powerful and competent pair of battalions in the east is working hand-in-hand with U.S. forces, while two other Iraqi battalions in the west struggle with mass desertion.

In many ways, the area is representative of Iraq as a whole, with areas of great promise bordering others where progress is largely unknown. "It is a complex situation," said Col. Michael Kershaw, the U.S. brigade's commander. "We have two different realities, and we have to build on what we have in Mahmudiyah and move west, where in some ways we're starting at the beginning. It's going to take time."

Even Mahmudiyah, with a strong Iraqi army presence and developing governmental strength, is facing sectarian violence.

On Saturday afternoon just before 5 p.m., insurgents rode seven bicycles into a bustling market in the largely Shiite city and left them amid holiday crowds, later triggering detonators hidden beneath the seats. Large chunks of plastic explosive crammed into the hollow metal frames of five of the bicycles blew market stands to charred shreds and killed at least 17 people, including children, according to U.S. and Iraqi officials.

Local Iraqi government authorities said the toll from what was initially called a mortar attack was higher. Authorities recovered two unexploded bicycle bombs. Col. Fawzi, an Iraqi battalion commander in Mahmudiyah, said Sunday that he believed the attack was meant to intimidate the local population and was in retribution for Iraqi army raids on a local Sunni political party's offices.

"I am upset and saddened by what happened," Fawzi said before leading a tour of the marketplace, wreckage still strewn across the road amid stands selling bananas and melon. "If we can remove the menace we are facing right now, Mahmudiyah can be stable."

On Monday, Iraqi army officials arrested 17 suspects in the market bombing and killed two insurgent mortar teams attempting to launch an attack, U.S. officials said. American soldiers intercepted a massive truck bomb that officials believe was heading to an Iraqi police station in Mahmudiyah.

Despite incidents like these, U.S. officials cite the possibility of progress. They say that the region's long-standing embrace of people who remain loyal to former president Saddam Hussein is diminishing. Maj. Frank Andrews, the 2-10 Mountain's executive officer, said that it is important to push out extremist operatives and convince locals that the United States is committed to the long haul.

"Now would be a very bad time for us to leave, not in a pessimistic way, but in an optimistic way," Andrews said. "We have a number of opportunities here that we want to see to fruition. I don't think it would be helpful to abandon them."

U.S. soldiers established themselves Monday atop the power plant along the Euphrates without resistance. Insurgents may have seen them staging for the large operation and chosen to pull back. Kershaw said, however, that he expects some form of counterattack in the coming days.

"We know how they respond to us trying to take their sanctuary," he said, referring to what followed past U.S. actions. "The question is how they will respond to a sustained U.S. presence."

Following A Death Trail To Sadr City (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell

The Los Angeles Times, October 24, 2006

U.S. forces think the kidnap-and-kill forays haunting Iraq originate in the insular Shiite stronghold of Baghdad.

BAGHDAD — Where are the killers coming from?

That was the question U.S. officers pondered at a cramped command post called Apache. They examined a map showing where scores of corpses had turned up in recent weeks.

A rectangular swath of northeast Baghdad stood out. Not for the bodies found in the district, but for the clusters of corpses discovered along its tattered outskirts.

"Sadr City," said Capt. Will Wade of the 1st Battalion, 77th Armored Regiment. "That's the nucleus."

The sprawling, densely populated Shiite Muslim stronghold known as Sadr City has always been a place apart. To some, it's a den of thieves, con men and fanatics; to others, an incubator of athletes, artists and clerics.

DOJ_NMG_0085628

Two years ago it was a battleground where fervent but outmatched militiamen led by Muqtada Sadr, the militantly anti-U.S. cleric, made suicidal stands against American tanks and helicopter gunships.

These days, many U.S. commanders view the neighborhood as something akin to Cambodia during the Vietnam War — a sanctuary for the militia known as the Al Mahdi army, whose zealous volunteers are dispatched elsewhere in pogroms against their Sunni Arab countrymen.

"They're in the export business, so a lot of their force is outside Sadr City," said Maj. Charles St.Clair, who served as a military advisor in Sadr City with the 506th Regimental Combat Team. "The fact that the Corleones or the Gottis may live in my neighborhood doesn't mean they do all their business there."

The teeming district of more than 2 million people — no one knows the population with any certainty — operates as a kind of autonomous city-state in a shaky, informal truce with U.S. troops. Although it suffers regular car bomb attacks, Sadr City is among the safest districts in a fearful capital.

Markets still bustle here with a vibrancy drained from much of Baghdad. A citywide curfew that extinguishes most night life is largely ignored here. Many police eschew body armor. Men still play dominoes and sip tea at smoky cafes.

Yet the very source of the stability, Al Mahdi militiamen who enforce security and rigid Islamic codes of dress and behavior, evokes dread elsewhere in Baghdad, where turf is fast being carved up along sectarian lines.

The Al Mahdi army was born in Sadr City three years ago, the urban disenfranchised answering the call of clerics who sought enthusiastic legions to shield holy places and oust the "occupier."

"People here do not like the Americans, but they are exercising restraint," said Fatah Sheik, a prominent leader in Sadr City. "In my personal opinion, the earth beneath the occupiers should be jolted and shaken so that they don't get the idea they are standing on solid ground and decide to stay longer."

Many have likened the Al Mahdi army, with its messianic fervor, to Hezbollah, the Shiite Muslim militant group in Lebanon dubbed a terrorist organization by Washington but lionized here. A four-story portrait of Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, Hezbollah's leader, greets motorists at one of the main entrances to Sadr City.

Like Hezbollah in Lebanon, the Shiite organization here runs an extensive social service network and controls patronage-rich government ministries including health and agriculture. Like Hezbollah, it makes payments to slain militants, which it dubs martyrs. And it helps deliver rations of water and food.

U.S. and allied forces are worried that Sadr City is becoming an Iraqi version of the Hezbollah bastions of southern Beirut and the Bekaa Valley in eastern Lebanon.

"If we are to avoid a descent into civil war and anarchy, then preventing the [Al Mahdi army] from developing into a state within a state, as Hezbollah has done in Lebanon, will be a priority," William Patey, Britain's former ambassador to Iraq, wrote recently in a confidential memo leaked to the media.

After U.S. forces raided Sadr City in August, the Shiite-dominated administration of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki made it clear the district was virtually untouchable.

"This won't happen again," he said.

Postwar U.S. administrators at first dismissed the Sadr movement as little more than a marginal nuisance. They opted instead to deal with more established Shiite leaders, despite their close ties to Iran.

Today, few doubt that the Al Mahdi army is a formidable and permanent national force, whether viewed as thugs or saints. The destruction of a major Shiite shrine in the Sunni-dominated city of Samarra in February galvanized the group into sectarian warriors reaching well beyond Sadr City.

U.S. forces appear to have settled for a kind of containment that generally avoids direct clashes in Sadr City. They worry more about the kidnap-and-kill forays that many think originate here.

"They'll send out an exporter, a gang, half a dozen cars of people in the middle of the night, all armed with AKs," Maj. St.Clair said.

The corpses usually show up the next day, often strewn along the no-man's land of levees, canals, junkyards and dirt roads along Sadr City's periphery. The grounds near a shuttered cigarette factory, once a U.S. base known as Camp Marlboro, were for a long time a popular destination for corpses.

Although most victims are Sunnis, the executed may also include Shiite "collaborators," common criminals and accused apostates, authorities said.

Inside Sadr City, militiamen are no longer as visible, having set aside their trademark black button-down shirts and black trousers for plaid shirts and dark trousers, typical civilian garb.

But people in Sadr City are quick to point out that the Al Mahdi army is all-seeing.

Militiamen on the alert for infiltrators and potential car bombers watch the district's half a dozen major entrances — others have been shut down for safety reasons — and work closely with a police force thoroughly penetrated by the Al Mahdi army.

DOJ_NMG_0085629

The Al Mahdi army's folk-hero status in Sadr City is to some extent coerced. No one wants to cross the militiamen, who can be ruthless and rely on a network of informers. Two years ago, the bodies of several local councilmen who cooperated with the U.S. Army were found hanging from lampposts, signs denouncing "collaborators" pinned to their shirts.

"Sadr City is its own place, and they do things their own way," said Staff Sgt. John Johnson of the 258th Military Police Company, a burly father of four who has worked as an advisor to Sadr City police. "They have to live here, and they have to say the right thing. This is Sadr City."

A place apart

Sadr City operates as a kind of autonomous city-state in a shaky, informal truce with U.S. troops. It is among the safest districts in the capital.

The beginning: Built in the 1960s as an urban renewal project, Revolution City was designed in geometric precision to house poor settlers from the rural Shiite Muslim south. Saddam Hussein later renamed it Saddam City.

After the invasion: Residents generally welcomed U.S. troops in 2003. The district was renamed Sadr City for Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Sadeq Sadr, assassinated during Hussein's rule after he founded a mosque-based social service network. Within a year, Sadr City erupted against U.S. troops.

Population: 2 million to 3 million, at least five times what the community was designed to house. Numbers swell daily with Shiite refugees fleeing Iraq's sectarian turmoil and seeking safety in an area controlled by followers of Muqtada Sadr, the virulently anti-U.S. cleric and son of the district's namesake. Sadr is the spiritual leader of the Al Mahdi army.

A slum? Although many sections fit the description, especially in the impoverished north, Sadr City also includes a prosperous merchant class, among them smugglers, forgers and other criminals. The district's 79 sectors encompass 19 square miles.

Proud history: Residents, who often display a swagger born of street survival, boast of the poets, doctors, engineers and athletes who came from Sadr City. Many in the district also were military conscripts during Hussein's regime.

Falling apart: Although it has received $200 million to upgrade infrastructure since the U.S.-led invasion, Sadr City still suffers from inadequate sewer lines, electrical blackouts, poor roads, spotty water supply and derelict schools.

U.S. Soldier May Have Been Kidnapped By Iraqi Insurgents (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 24, 2006

BAGHDAD — A U.S. soldier may have been kidnapped by Iraqi insurgents today, setting off a massive search of the capital, a military official said.

U.S. and Iraqi forces scoured the city for the soldier who was listed as "duty status -- whereabouts unknown" at about 7:30 p.m. An Iraqi intelligence source said the soldier may have been kidnapped while off a U.S. base.

U.S. and Iraqi security forces raided locations where the soldier may have been taken. The constant drone of helicopters could be heard over central Baghdad into the early hours of Tuesday morning.

The possible kidnapping came amid continued violence around the country.

A militia chief's brother, kidnapped last week as an act of vengeance that sparked a two-day battle over control of a southern Iraqi city, was found dead this morning amid signs of simmering unrest between rival Shiite groups vying for power.

Hussein Bahadeli, brother of the leader of the Amarah branch of the Mahdi army, was kidnapped Thursday to avenge the slaying of the provincial director of intelligence, killed in a roadside bombing incident a day earlier.

Hundreds of heavily armed black-clad militiamen loyal to Mahdi army leader Sheik Fadhel Bahadeli swarmed the city, attacking police stations and fighting gun battles that left as many as 25 dead on Thursday and Friday.

Roadside bombs caused both U.S. military deaths announced today. An International Police liaison officer attached to the 89th Military Police Brigade was killed and four soldiers were wounded shortly before noon Sunday when their vehicle was struck by an improvised explosive device east of Baghdad.

Another soldier died at 5 p.m. Sunday when the vehicle he was riding in was struck by an improvised explosive device in western Baghdad, the military said.

The Marine, assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5, was killed Saturday in Anbar province.

In other developments:

·Another bomb attached to a car killed at least one and injured 17 in a crowded market in northern Baghdad.

·U.S. forces killed five suspected insurgents south of the central Iraqi town of Balad. After shooting dead one insurgent, U.S. forces surrounded a house and tried to woo out the suspects before responding with force.

"Coalition aircraft delivered precision munitions onto the building, resulting in its destruction and the death of the four occupants who refused to exit," a press release said.

Troops Look For American Soldier Missing In Baghdad (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 23 — An American soldier apparently working as an interpreter went missing in Baghdad on Monday night, the American military said.

A brief military statement said that the soldier was reported missing around 7:30 p.m. and that American and Iraqi forces "immediately responded to attempt to locate the soldier."

"The search is ongoing," the statement said. The Associated Press reported that the missing soldier was working as an Army interpreter.

A military official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because detailed information had not yet been cleared for release, said the soldier was last seen around 2:30 p.m. in the Green Zone, the large walled area that houses the American Embassy and the Iraqi government and Parliament buildings. However, the military received a tip from an Iraqi that the soldier might have been kidnapped outside the Green Zone, the official said, and that lead is being followed.

The disappearance is highly unusual, as American soldiers are rarely, if ever, away from their units and Humvees when outside the safety of American bases, and leaving a base alone would violate military regulations.

Even so, the disappearance is deeply troubling for the military and comes at a time of tense relations between it and the Iraqi government. Military officials have grown increasingly frustrated with the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki for delaying moves to control the militia groups that are dragging Iraq toward civil war.

The two top American officials in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the commanding general, and Zalmay Khalilzad, the ambassador, are scheduled to give a news conference on Tuesday to try to smooth relations.

The news of the soldier also comes two weeks ahead of midterm elections in the United States, in which the recent rise in violence in Iraq, particularly against American soldiers, has been an issue affecting the prospects of Republican candidates.

The recent spike in American casualties continued Monday, with the military announcing four more deaths, including that of a civilian police adviser. The deaths included a marine in Anbar who was killed in "enemy action" on Saturday, and two soldiers killed in separate bombings in western and southeastern Baghdad on Sunday.

The police adviser was killed Sunday, and four soldiers were wounded in eastern Baghdad. October, with a week to go, already has the highest American death toll of any month this year.

At least nine Iraqis were killed in and around Baghdad on Monday, and the authorities found eight bodies around the capital, an Interior Ministry official said.

Few soldiers have been separated from their units over the course of the war, but there was at least one instance this year.

In June, two American soldiers were captured and a third was killed in an ambush in Yusufiya, a town south of Baghdad that is one of Iraq's most hostile. The bodies of the captured soldiers were found about a week later. They had been brutalized.

The military poured resources into that rescue effort, dedicating 8,000 troops, American and Iraqi, to search for the soldiers. The search drained troops away from Baghdad.

Amara, a tribal city in the southeast corner of Iraq that was the scene of intense fighting between Shiite militias last week, was afflicted by a spate of assassinations on Sunday and Monday. Residents said the killings were probably committed by tribe members taking revenge for the more than 25 police officers and militiamen who died in street fighting on Friday.

Five Iraqis were killed Monday and two on Sunday, said Col. Abed Zughayer of the Amara police. The dead included police officers and members of the Mahdi Army, a sprawling Shiite militia whose soldiers are powerful local forces in the provinces as well as in the capital.

Perhaps as troubling, about 200 members of the Nawafil tribe, a large tribe whose home is the marshes around Amara, arrived in the city on Monday afternoon to lend support to a senior commander of a special police force, Col. Mohamed Hadi, according to Colonel Zughayer.

The authorities on Monday found the body of a brother of a Mahdi Army commander. The brother's seizure by the police last week set off the spasm of violence that paralyzed Amara for a day. The man's body was disfigured; dogs had eaten part of it, said Ali Abu Trab, the office manager for the governor of the province.

The local authorities in Amara contacted the office of the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr in Najaf, south of Baghdad, to ask him to call for calm. Mr. Sadr is the head of the Mahdi Army, but his control of regional branches of that militia has slipped.

The colonel said the city has been relatively quiet, but that the Mahdi Army still controlled swaths of the eastern half of the city, which is divided by the Tigris River.

He said that a nighttime curfew had been imposed starting at 10 p.m., but that few were heeding it.

Prime Minister Maliki issued a statement on Monday warning militias, particularly in Amara, to stop the violence. "The Iraqi government hereby warns all groups with illegal weapons to refrain from any armed activities that undermine public security," he said, according to The Associated Press. "Let everyone be informed that orders have been issued to the armed forces to stop any transgression against state power."

Lawmaker Faults CNN For Sniper Video (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, October 24, 2006

A leading Republican lawmaker on defense issues has asked the Pentagon to bar CNN reporters from traveling with military units in Iraq because the network showed insurgent snipers shooting at U.S. troops.

"Does CNN want America to win this thing?" Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., asked in an interview Monday on the network. In past wars, he said, the press was more pro-American.

"You can't be on both sides of the war," Hunter said.

CNN issued a statement saying the decision to air the insurgents' video was "a difficult one, but for a news organization, the right one. Our responsibility is to report the news."

In a letter released Monday, Hunter asked Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to yank CNN from the military embedding program, in which journalists spend time with combat units in Iraq.

Hunter, a staunch defender of the Bush administration and its handling of the war in Iraq, said the decision was irresponsible because it could encourage more attacks on U.S. troops.

"CNN has now served as the publicist for an enemy propaganda film featuring the killing of an American soldier," wrote Hunter, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. California Republican Reps. Darrell Issa and Brian Bilbray also signed the letter.

CNN last week aired the footage, which was delivered through a contact with an insurgent leader.

The footage does not show the actual death or wounding of any service member. In one instance, the tape shows a service member milling around a public area. A shot rings out, and the tape fades to black.

Hunter's fury over the video underscores the tightrope often walked by news media in the war. Critics of the war say Americans see very little of the daily violence in Iraq because of television's reluctance to show gory footage. Dangerous conditions also keep journalists from reporting independent of military units that provide them protection.

Senior US Diplomat's Candor Gets Play In The Middle East, Ire At Home (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, October 24, 2006

CAIRO

When senior State Department official Alberto Fernandez said in an interview on Al Jazeera Saturday that US policies in Iraq have been marked by "arrogance" and "stupidity," he was expressing a sentiment widely held in the Arab world.

To many Arabs, it was a stunning moment of candor. It led front pages of newspapers across the region. Mr. Fernandez - whose fluent Arabic and dozens of regional television appearances have made him the voice of American policy to millions in the Middle East - struck the sort of tone that public policy experts say the US needs if it is to regain some of its credibility in Arab eyes.

The only problem was, his comments were immediately disavowed by the Bush Administration. Now the future of Fernandez - one of America's most potent public diplomacy weapons in the region - is clouded, and the Arab view of an America that admits to no mistakes has become more entrenched.

Fernandez's primary job is to book American officials on Arab programs, but with most officials reluctant to appear on Arab-language television, particularly on Al Jazeera, which many US officials view with barely disguised loathing, he's been mostly booking himself, doing at least 100 interviews this year.

In a laudatory piece on his efforts in Newsweek this August, Fernandez poked fun at himself. "I'm Cuban," he told the magazine, referring to his heritage. "We can't close our big mouths."

But after his latest foray, State Department officials in Washington say Fernandez has, in effect, been told to recant his remarks. At first, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Fernandez's comments were mistranslated.

Then, when an unimpeachable translation of his remarks was produced by the Associated Press, Fernandez was told by his bosses to disavow his comments. In a statement released by the State Department, Fernandez is quoted as saying: "I seriously misspoke by using the phrase 'there has been arrogance and stupidity by the US in Iraq.' This represents neither my views, or those of the State Department."

Marc Lynch, a Middle East expert and political science professor at Williams College whose latest book, "Voices of the New Arab Public," examines the role Al Jazeera and other media play in shaping Arab views, says it appears that Fernandez is being slapped down by the administration for his comments. He worries that could end up seriously undermining American outreach efforts in the region.

"If you can say: 'Yeah, the security situation in Iraq isn't very good and we've made a lot of mistakes, but now we have to get everyone on board to find solutions,' you're going to be much more effective," says Lynch. "The real impact to worry about here is whether future public diplomacy people take away the message that if they display the slightest amount of honesty, they're doomed."

By now, the view that the US has made major mistakes in Iraq is hardly news. It's something that's been acknowledged in print by former senior officials of the US administration there, and retired military generals who served there.

Lost in the furor over Fernandez's remarks - from right-wing blogs calling for his head to those on the left using it as fodder to claim that US policy in Iraq has been a disaster - has been the meat of his comments, which were designed to encourage constructive engagement in the region.

"There is no doubt that there is plenty of room for blame ... but we haven't focused enough on the future and the possibility of failure in Iraq," Fernandez told Al Jazeera in remarks later translated by the Associated Press. "We must all focus on saving Iraq for the sake of the Iraqi people and for our sakes, us in the West, and also you in the Arab world. I know that sometimes there is a kind of gloating in the Arab world that America has problems in Iraq ... [but] we must think of the Iraqi people, the Arabs, the Muslims, and the citizens of Iraq more than gloating about the United States."

"[Fernandez] has developed a reputation for being candid and blunt, and he'll often say things that aren't particularly popular at home, but that's earned him a reputation for being a little looser and a little more honest, and I think that helps him to get his point across," in the Middle East says Mr. Lynch. "The stuff he's getting pilloried for was setting the stage for getting across a message that's very important for the United States."

Northern Ireland Holds Iraq Lessons (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

Some of the Army's brightest minds gathered Oct. 16 in an auditorium in the Pentagon to hear a British general explain how Britain won in Northern Ireland after 37 years of fighting insurgents and how those lessons might be applied in Iraq.

At Fort Leavenworth, Kan., where officers pore over thousands of pages of after-action battlefield reports to learn the lessons of this war, the Combined Arms Center next month will release the Army's first comprehensive counterinsurgency manual since the 1960s. An Army official said it will stress winning hearts and minds, rather than using brute force, to defeat armed groups. The command has opened a Counterinsurgency Center to continue brainstorming over better battlefield tactics against terrorists.

On Capitol Hill this month, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner met privately with Gen. Peter Pace, the Joint Chiefs chairman, to convey his concerns over a war he says is "drifting sideways." An aide said Mr. Warner, Virginia Republican, is canvassing military specialists for new options for Iraq. He plans a hearing on the war after the Nov. 7 elections.

"He has been reaching out to officials at [the State Department, the Pentagon] and the White House as he looks at all facets of the Iraq issue to determine the way forward," said John Ullyot, Mr. Warner's spokesman. "Understanding and thinking about Iraq is Senator Warner's highest present priority, and he is working at it seven days a week."

Finding new tactics and broader strategies for Iraq is consuming the military as it ends one of its most violent months in Iraq, with more than 80 American troops killed. Army Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the chief military spokesman there, acknowledged last week that a three-month offensive had failed to meet expectations for reducing violence in Baghdad and that new methods would be used.

"Iraq isn't getting any better," said Richard H. Shultz Jr., director of International Security Studies Programs at Tufts University's Fletcher School. "As a result, there is a lot of nervousness about finding a better way of dealing with. The reason is straightforward. We lose in Iraq and it's going to be such a major victory for the jihadis. It will pale in comparison to Afghanistan and they thought they got a lot of mileage in defeating the Soviets."

The Army lecture featured Gen. C. Redmond Watt, Britain's top land forces commander who headed government troops in Northern Ireland when the Irish Republican Army announced disarmament last year. That 37-year campaign offered a textbook of lessons on how to defeat armed groups who use unconventional warfare to kill people, military and civilian alike.

Gen. Watt told the senior Army people, who included Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the chief of staff, that the British initially made mistakes by trying for quick tactical victories instead of embracing a long-range plan.

A person at the lecture noted that Gen. Watt said Iraq is 10 years away from a "sufficient outcome." It will take that long to bring along the Iraqi security forces, disarm militants and nurture the politicians needed to sustain a democratic society.

Gen. Watt was not invited especially because of Iraq. His appearance was part of a long-standing Kermit Roosevelt Lecture series to forge close British-American ties. But his talk did give Army officials insights into how to win in Iraq.

"Listening to a British general makes sense because the British, through a hard and long experience, discovered some of the ways to force armed groups to give up armed struggle," said Mr. Shultz, author of "Insurgents, Terrorists and Militias: The Warriors of Contemporary Combat."

He added, "The British understood there were different factions in Northern Ireland. They helped some. They worked against others. You also need to be able to degrade insurgents. That's how others have done it. This includes the Israelis and the British. The key to success was intelligence. They developed a method for local intelligence that was able to put the IRA back on its heels. The chieftains can't breathe. They have to worry about their own security. The reason the IRA finally came to the table is because they just knew they weren't going to win the armed struggle."

Iraq is just as complex, if not more so. American commanders face different types of deadly enemies. An Army officer in Baghdad said in an interview that it is now impossible to say how large the enemy is. "It's gang warfare," the officer said.

A TV Comedy Turns An Unconventional Weapon On Iraq's High And Mighty: Fake News (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 23 — Nearly every night here for the past month, Iraqis weary of the tumult around them have been turning on the television to watch a wacky-looking man with a giant Afro wig and star-shaped glasses deliver the grim news of the day.

In a recent episode, the host, Saaed Khalifa, reported that Iraq's Ministry of Water and Sewage had decided to change its name to simply the Ministry of Sewage — because it had given up on the water part.

In another episode, he jubilantly declared that "Rums bin Feld" had announced American troops were leaving the country on 1/1, in other words, on Jan. 1. His face crumpled when he realized he had made a mistake. The troops were not actually departing on any specific date, he clarified, but instead leaving one by one. At that rate, it would take more than 600 years for them to be gone.

The newscast is a parody, of course, that fires barbs at everyone from the American military to the Iraqi government, an Iraqi version of "The Daily Show With Jon Stewart." Even the militias wreaking havoc on Iraq are lampooned.

Debuting last month during Ramadan, while families gathered to break their fast after sundown, the show, "Hurry Up, He's Dead," became the talk of Baghdad, delighting and shocking audiences with its needling of anyone with a hand in Iraqis' gloomy predicament today.

The acerbic newscasts, each lasting about 20 minutes, are broadcast on Al Sharqiya, an Iraqi satellite station that has at times run afoul of the government for its regular news coverage. They are continuing through Id al-Fitr, the Muslim celebration for the end of Ramadan this week. Officials at the station are in discussions about turning the show into a weekly program.

The show's success is a testament to the gallows humor with which many Iraqis now view their lives — still lacking basic services and plagued by unrelenting violence more than three years after the American-led invasion.

Since the fall of Saddam Hussein, comedies have proliferated on Iraqi television. Al Sharqiya has another popular show, "Caricatures," also known for its dark humor toward the country's problems. Given the response by Iraqis, the channel's fake newscast seems to have eclipsed others in its genre in popularity.

"We need fun in our lives because of our tragic circumstances," said Silvana, 21, a Baghdad resident who has tuned in every night with her family, if the electricity was working. "Most of the channels focus on the violence, the bodies. But this program depicts our tragedies in a funny light."

Mr. Khalifa, the show's star, is a diminutive comedian who was a well-known theater actor in Iraq during Saddam Hussein's government. The initial episodes were taped in Dubai because the producers decided it would be too dangerous and logistically difficult to film in Baghdad. Despite its madcap humor, he said, the show has a serious message.

"The purpose of the show is to fix Iraq," he said. "We want to fix the civil services. We want to fix the government officials. We want to fix the relationships between people. We want to fix the government and stop the corruption."

The newscast opens with an explanation of the show's underlying premise: it is the year 2017 and the main character, Saaed, is the last Iraqi alive. He is lying face down on a beach with a red suitcase next to him. When he comes to, he is quickly encircled by beautiful women.

Cut to a scene of Saaed clad in a black T-shirt imprinted with "2PAC," showboating in front of a white stretch Humvee limousine with dancers cavorting all around.

The show's raucous theme song, which has become a popular cellphone ring tone here and is sung by children in schoolyards, laments that it would be better to be a lowly cat on the street than an Iraqi: "No one asks the cat where you are from, which party you're from, whether you are an Arab, a Kurd, a Sunni or a Shiite."

He sings on, "I am the last Iraqi alive, but I still do not own a house," a reference to the country's acute housing shortage.

The show's title appears initially as "The Government," but the Arabic words split in half to reveal the actual name, another crack at the country's plight.

When the broadcast begins, it takes place in the present. The show is meant to be a narration of how Saaed's country fell apart and he ended up as the last survivor, said Talib al-Sudani, the show's writer, who sold the rights to the show to Al Sharqiya several months ago for just $3,700.

Mr. Sudani, 40, gaunt and chain-smoking, is all too familiar with the woes his show satirizes. He lives in a cramped two-room apartment in Sadr City, a densely packed Shiite neighborhood, with his wife and five children. He used the cash from the show to buy a television, refrigerator, washing machine and cupboards for his home.

He came up with the show's premise one day when the curfew stranded him overnight at a cafe he frequents. He found himself envying a stray cat he saw wandering down the street.

"I couldn't go home," he said, "but she could."

With Baghdad's unrelenting violence, he said, he envisioned a day when all but one Iraqi was killed off.

"He would inherit everything, women, money, cars, land," he said. "He would take his breakfast in Erbil and lunch in Basra. He'd switch the electricity on and off himself, not someone else."

His initial idea was for the newscast to be more serious, with several different actors filling the different reportorial roles. Instead he wound up with Mr. Khalifa, a heavyset man just shy of five feet who does all the parts in his signature zany way, dressing up in heels, a wig and a dress to do the weather, donning a boxing helmet and snorkel fins for sports, and wearing an Iraqi dishdasha for business news.

In a recent episode, Mr. Khalifa poked fun at the federalism plan being pushed by many of the country's Shiite leaders that would divide Iraq into autonomous regions.

Reporting from an imaginary meeting of the "League of Iraqi Republics," he solemnly informed viewers that the main issue under discussion was the dispute between the governments of Waziriya and Kasra — actually adjacent Baghdad neighborhoods.

There were also problems, he said, between the Republic of Karrada Inside and the Republic of Karrada Outside, two parallel streets along the Tigris River here separated by just 500 feet.

Another issue on the table, he said, was the continuing embargo on the Republic of Bab al-Sharji, a Baghdad neighborhood famous for its electronics bazaars.

The federalism episode is typical. The humor behind many of the show's jokes lies in the uncomfortable recognition that they are just a step away from reality in a crumbling Iraq.

In one episode, Mr. Khalifa reported on a mass kidnapping. "Unknown men kidnapped unknown men, and they were driven to an unknown destination," he said.

There are some topics that have been deemed too controversial to air. An episode that Mr. Sudani wrote ridiculing the Saddam Hussein trial was dropped because producers were afraid it would anger loyalists of the old regime and the current government.

But the show has had few other inhibitions. Mr. Sudani, the writer, said he has lost hope for his country. Iraq's leaders are incompetent, he said. He fears that services will never be restored. The American experiment in democracy, he said, was born dead.

All anyone can do, he said, is laugh.

Sailor Kills Marine After Lie About Rape (WT/AP)

By Sonja Barisic

The Washington Times/AP, October 24, 2006

NORFOLK, Va. (AP) -- A sailor pleaded guilty Monday to abducting and killing a Marine corporal he thought had been involved in a gang rape. The rape turned out to be a lie, but the truth surfaced too late.

Petty Officer 3rd Class Cooper Jackson, 23, pleaded guilty Monday to premeditated murder, kidnapping, impersonating a Naval Criminal Investigative Service agent and obstruction of justice in connection with the death of Cpl. Justin L. Huff, 23.

In exchange for his guilty plea, prosecutors agreed to spare him a possible death sentence.

Federal agents had testified at his Article 32 hearing, the military equivalent of a grand jury investigation, that Jackson had been fooled into falling in love with a woman who called herself Samantha and made up a story about being raped by servicemen.

"Samantha" turned out to be Ashley Elrod, a 22-year-old hotel clerk on North Carolina's Outer Banks, who testified that she lied about being raped. She said she "might have" told Jackson that one of the Marines was named Huff or Huffman, and she said Jackson called her after Huff was killed. Elrod has not been charged.

During his court-martial, Jackson told the Navy judge how he posed as an NCIS agent and took Huff to North Carolina to get information about the purported rape. He said he then slit Huff's throat and buried the body to avoid being caught.

"I'd broken several laws and I had a missing Marine with me," Jackson said at his hearing Monday. "Quite frankly, I was scared of the consequences of what would happen, of being caught, more so than I was of the consequences of taking his life."

If the judge accepts the plea, Jackson could be sentenced to life in prison with or without the possibility of parole, said his lawyer, Don Marcari. The sentencing phase was to begin Tuesday.

Huff, 23, of Indianapolis, was reported missing Jan. 2 after he didn't show up for class at the Navy and Marine Corps Intelligence Training Center in Virginia Beach, where Jackson also was a student.

Agents said Jackson, of Boones Mill, confessed when they questioned him Jan. 12. The next day, he led agents to Huff's body in a wooded area in Currituck County, N.C., just south of the Virginia-North Carolina border.

Pat Tillman's Brother Calls War Illegal (AP-Y)

AP, October 24, 2006

The brother of NFL player-turned-Army Ranger Pat Tillman, who was killed in Afghanistan, has written a scathing indictment of the war in Iraq, calling it "an illegal invasion."

Kevin Tillman, a former Army Ranger, had remained silent since his brother's death in 2004, but in an article in the Web magazine Truthdig, he sharply criticizes the invasion of Iraq, the indefinite imprisonment of terrorism suspects and other events since the brothers enlisted together in response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"Somehow, the more soldiers that die, the more legitimate the illegal invasion becomes," Kevin Tillman wrote.

"Somehow American leadership, whose only credit is lying to its people and illegally invading a nation, has been allowed to steal the courage, virtue and honor of its soldiers on the ground," he wrote.

After playing for the Arizona State University Sun Devils, Pat Tillman was drafted by the Arizona Cardinals in 1998. He played with the team for four years. He was on the verge of signing another contract with the Cardinals in 2002 when he decided to join the Army instead.

The brothers, both ASU graduates, were initially sent to Iraq, then returned to the U.S. for Ranger training and later were sent to Afghanistan.

Pat Tillman, who played defensive back for the Arizona Cardinals, was killed by friendly fire near the Pakistan-Afghanistan border in April 2004.

The Defense Department is investigating allegations of a cover-up, including failure by the Army to tell Tillman's family for several weeks that he had been killed by gunfire from his fellow Army Rangers, not by enemy fire as they initially were told.

Brother Of N.F.L. Star Posts Antiwar Essay (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0085636

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 23 — A brother of Pat Tillman, the National Football League player who was killed in combat in Afghanistan after leaving his sports career to serve in the Army, has lashed out at the Iraq war in an essay published online.

The brother, Kevin Tillman, who was in the same Army Ranger unit as Pat Tillman, a corporal who was killed on April 22, 2004, by fire from his fellow soldiers under circumstances that the Pentagon continues to investigate, sharply criticized American political leadership and called the war "an illegal invasion."

"Somehow the more soldiers that die, the more legitimate the illegal invasion becomes," Mr. Tillman wrote in the 660-word essay that was posted on Thursday on Truthdig .com, a Web magazine offering news and opinion from a "progressive point of view."

"Somehow," Mr. Tillman added, "American leadership, whose only credit is lying to its people and illegally invading a nation, has been allowed to steal the courage, virtue and honor of its soldiers on the ground."

In what are apparently his most expansive public remarks since the death of his brother at age 27, he also does not spare the American public, which he suggests too often relies on superficial gestures to support the troops instead of holding politicians accountable.

"Somehow back at home, support for the soldiers meant having a 5-year-old kindergartener scribble a picture with crayons and send it overseas or slapping stickers on cars or lobbying Congress for an extra pad in a helmet," he wrote.

Mr. Tillman ended with a suggestion that the elections on Nov. 7 are an opportunity for people opposed to the war to send a message.

"Luckily this country is still a democracy," he wrote. "People still have a voice. People can still take action. It can start after Pat's birthday," Nov. 6.

Despite Pat Tillman's fame and the outpouring of emotion after his death, the Tillman family has generally kept a distance from antiwar protesters, though they have often spoken of their efforts to find the truth about what happened. Family members did not answer messages for comment on Kevin Tillman's posting.

A spokeswoman for the Pat Tillman Foundation in San Jose, Calif., where the Tillmans grew up, said, "It is our understanding that Kevin Tillman is not accepting interview requests."

Pat Tillman, a safety for the Arizona Cardinals, left the team in spring 2002 to join the Army along with Kevin Tillman, motivated in part by the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and eventually training as a Ranger. After a stint in Iraq, the brothers were sent to Afghanistan.

Pat Tillman died, the Army eventually concluded, after members of his own unit shot him as they searched for enemy fighters in a canyon in southeastern Afghanistan. An Afghan soldier fighting next to him also died.

Kevin Tillman's essay was posted as Pentagon investigators close in on the latest of several investigations into the case. Initially, the Army had suggested that enemy fire had killed Pat Tillman. Later, the Army conceded that his comrades had shot him.

Under pressure from the family and members of Congress, the inspector general of the Defense Department and the Army Criminal Investigation Command are examining the actions of members of Mr. Tillman's unit and the initial investigation.

Daniel Kohns, a spokesman for Representative Michael M. Honda of California, a Democrat from San Jose, who pushed for the investigations, said Pentagon representatives said a month ago that they expected to complete their work by the end of November or early December.

A spokesman for the Pentagon said Monday that the investigations were continuing. He declined to comment on Kevin Tillman's essay.

Robert Scheer, a liberal syndicated columnist and the editor of Truthdig, based in Santa Monica, Calif., said he had written about the case and had spoken to family members in the past.

Kevin Tillman's article was not solicited, Mr. Scheer said, and the site agreed to Mr. Tillman's conditions for posting it. The conditions were that it be posted unchanged aside from grammatical editing, including the headline he had written, "After Pat's Birthday."

Mr. Scheer said Mr. Tillman had made it known that, after leaving the military last year, he felt now was time to speak out, with his brother's birthday approaching. Pat Tillman also had expressed anger about the war to friends, several published reports have said.

"He is not proselytizing, he is not a political person," Mr. Scheer said of Kevin Tillman. "He just decided because his birthday was coming up he felt strongly that he had to say something."

Since the article went up on the Web site, it has received more than 4,000 responses, though Web server limits have prohibited publishing that many, Mr. Scheer said.

Hyde Urges Rumsfeld To Alter Afghan Drug Trade Policy (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand, Usa Today
USA Today, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — A leading House Republican is urging Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld to revamp the U.S. strategy against heroin production in Afghanistan, saying record opium poppy harvests show efforts to target farmers are not working.

Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., chairman of the House International Relations Committee, said in an Oct. 12 letter to Rumsfeld that the U.S.-supported poppy eradication program in Afghanistan is a failure. In the previously unreported letter, provided by Hyde's committee office, Hyde urges the military to help agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) take out drug kingpins and heroin processing centers. The current program, backed by the State Department and international agencies, focuses on low-level poppy farmers.

The "opium crisis" has "increased violence and terrorism against coalition forces there, and is now threatening to totally corrupt all of the new Afghan democratic institutions we support," Hyde's letter said, echoing concerns voiced by many U.S. officials — including Rumsfeld — that drug money is aiding a resurgence of the Taliban and al-Qaeda in Afghanistan.

Rumsfeld has not answered Hyde, but Air Force Lt. Col. Karen Finn, a Pentagon spokeswoman, said Monday, "We take this matter very seriously, and we will be responding."

Hyde's letter followed a report by the United Nations last month that said an estimated 407,724 acres of opium poppy were grown in Afghanistan this year. That's up 59% from 2005 and more than double the acreage farmed in 2000, before the U.S.-led assault on the former Taliban government.

Afghanistan is the world's top supplier of heroin, and narcotics make up more than one-third of its economy, the State Department has reported.

The Pentagon's mission in Afghanistan has focused on fighting the Taliban and al-Qaeda. It has viewed drug trafficking as a law enforcement issue. However, Rumsfeld has authorized U.S. military units operating in areas with drug activity to take along DEA agents.

Military support has helped DEA operations, the agency's Mary Irene Cooper said. The poppy eradication effort, however, has had little impact. The U.N. said 37,807 acres were eliminated this year, about 7% of the acreage cultivated.

Hyde wants military air support for DEA missions. He said it is too dangerous for civilian authorities to work alone."We can't lose the country to narcotics," he said in an interview.

Debt Keeping Troops From Duty (WP/AP)

By Thomas Watkins, Associated Press
The Washington Post/AP, October 24, 2006

Growing Numbers Seen as Security Risks Because of Finances

SAN DIEGO -- Thousands of U.S. troops are being barred from overseas duty because they are so deep in debt they are considered security risks, according to an Associated Press review of military records.

The number of troops held back has climbed dramatically in the past few years. While they appear to represent a very small percentage of all U.S. military personnel, the increase is occurring at a time when the armed forces are stretched thin by the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"We are seeing an alarming trend in degrading financial health," said Capt. Mark D. Patton, commanding officer at San Diego's Naval Base Point Loma.

The Pentagon contends that financial problems can distract personnel from their duties or make them vulnerable to bribery and treason. As a result, those who fall heavily into debt can be stripped of the security clearances they need to go overseas.

While the number of revoked clearances has surged since the beginning of the Iraq war, military officials say there is no evidence that service members are deliberately running up debts to stay out of harm's way.

Officials also say the increase has not undermined the military's fighting ability, though some say it has complicated the job of assembling some of the units needed in Iraq or Afghanistan.

The problem is attributed to a lack of financial smarts among recruits, reckless spending among those exhilarated to make it home alive after a tour of duty and the profusion of "payday lenders" -- businesses that allow military personnel to borrow against their next paycheck at extremely high interest rates.

Data supplied by the Navy, Marines and Air Force show that the number of clearances revoked for financial reasons rose every year between 2002 and 2005, climbing ninefold from 284 at the start of the period to 2,654 last year. Partial numbers from this year suggest that the trend continues.

More than 6,300 troops in the three branches lost their clearances during that four-year period. Roughly 900,000 people are serving in the three branches, though not all need clearances.

The Army -- which employs 500,000 people and accounts for the vast majority of the 160,000 U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan -- rejected repeated requests to supply its data, saying such information is confidential.

At Point Loma, Patton said, clearance revocations in key areas such as military police have become so common that he often looks for two sailors to fill a single posting.

Security clearances are revoked when service members' debt payments amount to 30 percent to 40 percent of their salary. The exact amount depends on the military branch.

There are three levels of clearance -- confidential, secret and top secret. Not all troops need clearance. Marine infantrymen do not, but some Marine specialists, such as those in intelligence, do. So do many troops in the Navy and the Air Force.

Financial problems are the overwhelming reason security clearances are revoked. Other reasons include criminal activity, questionable allegiance and ill health. A key reason the military revokes clearances on financial grounds is the fear that soldiers in debt might be tempted to sell secrets or equipment to the enemy.

Also, "when they are over there fighting, we like them to have their heads in the game," said Maj. Gen. Michael Lehnert, commander of Marine Corps bases in the western United States. "We like to have them . . . not worrying about whether or not they are going to be able to make the mortgage payment or car payment."

Runaway interest rates at payday lending businesses, many of which are clustered outside bases, are another source of the problem. Several states have cracked down on payday lending practices, and President Bush signed legislation this month limiting how much these businesses can charge military personnel.

Some personnel fall into debt after returning from combat. "It can be hard to cut that sense of elation and desire to live for the moment," Lehnert said. "Some tend to get themselves overextended financially."

Like other services, the Navy offers zero-interest emergency loans, and personnel commonly take money-management classes as part of basic training. "There is instruction or training in place to give them some of the pitfalls of debt," said Terry Harris, a personal finance educator at Naval Air Station Pensacola in Florida, including "security clearances being lost to that."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Skilling Gets 24 Years For Fraud At Enron (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 23 -- Jeffrey K. Skilling, the brash former chief executive of Enron Corp., was ordered to serve 24 years and four months in prison Monday after an emotional court hearing in which he watched a series of former employees blame him for the fraud at the heart of the company's collapse.

Skilling's face reddened but he remained impassive as he listened to five angry and tear-choked workers tell the court about their difficulties since losing their jobs and retirement savings after the Houston energy company hurtled into bankruptcy five years ago.

Dawn Powers Martin, who worked at the company's credit union for 22 years, called Skilling a "liar, a thief and a drunk" who "cheated me and my daughter out of our retirement."

When asked to make a statement, Skilling professed remorse but he spoke with the most passion when he vowed to appeal. "I am innocent of every one of these charges," he told the court.

U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III rejected a defense bid that would allow Skilling to remain free while he contested his conviction in May on 19 charges of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading. Skilling was not allowed to leave the courthouse until authorities fitted him with an electronic ankle bracelet that officials will use to monitor his movements while the Bureau of Prisons determines where he will serve his term. He has asked to be sent to a medium-security prison in Butner, N.C.

Under federal rules, Skilling, 52, must serve at least 85 percent of his sentence, which means he would not be released for more than two decades, when he will be in his 70s. Lake could have imposed a stiffer penalty. Skilling's sentence is second only to the 25-year term given to WorldCom Inc. founder Bernard J. Ebbers, whose company also collapsed during an accounting fraud that rocked investor confidence and prompted Congress to pass corporate accountability legislation in 2002.

"The Enron case is as large and as serious as any other fraud in this nation's history," prosecutor Sean M. Berkowitz told the court.

Skilling entered the courtroom arm-in-arm with his wife, former Enron corporate secretary Rebecca Carter, who sat in the first row with Skilling's brother and sister. During the proceeding, Carter cried and frequently bowed her head. Two children of Enron founder Kenneth L. Lay and his defense team were also present, and they comforted the Skilling family members with hugs and pats on the back.

Nine of the jurors in the long-running trial, including three alternates, also showed up as spectators, looking on from a back row as the hearing played out. Later, they said they supported the judge's decision, as did the former employees who testified.

Skilling's emotional state has been delicate since he left Enron. Over eight days on the witness stand during the trial, Skilling described his spiral into drinking and depression as Enron began to sink under the weight of its financial problems. After he was indicted, he twice had contact with police related to his alcohol consumption, most recently last month.

Monday afternoon, he told reporters that he had suffered over the past five years, at times, he said, even wishing he had injured himself more seriously during a hiking trip.

"There are times I'd say, 'God, I wish I'd died,' " he said.

The judge acknowledged that Skilling had helped transform Enron into one of the nation's largest companies. Skilling and his lead lawyer took time to underscore their contention that Enron collapsed not because of fraud, but because the market lost confidence in the company months after his abrupt resignation in August 2001. That caused creditors to demand immediate payment for their loans, creating a cash crunch the company could not withstand.

Skilling enlisted friends, including his administrative assistant of two decades, to speak on his behalf. "I don't consider myself a victim of anything other than my shortsighted [investment] decisions," said the assistant, Sherri Sera. She called Skilling a "visionary" who "revolutionized" the energy industry. As she returned to her seat, she embraced Skilling's wife.

But Lake said Skilling's good works did not outweigh that he had "imposed on hundreds if not thousands of people a life sentence of poverty."

As part of the resolution of the case, Skilling also agreed to turn over what his lawyers called the "overwhelming majority" of his assets, about $45 million, including the proceeds from the sale of his Mediterranean-style mansion, to employees who lost more than $1 billion with Enron's demise. His lawyers at O'Melveny & Myers LLP are to receive $15.5 million to pay suppliers and to cover some fees, estimated at $30 million. In what analysts have called the highest-ticket criminal defense in history, the firm already has collected $40 million in cash from Skilling and his insurance policies to defend criminal and civil cases.

Under the federal sentencing guidelines, Skilling could have received more than 30 years in prison. Instead, the judge chose a term on the lower end of the range. The judge scuttled a defense request to shave 10 months off the prison term, a move that would have made Skilling eligible for a low-security facility with fewer restrictions than the medium-security prison where he ultimately will reside.

Skilling's term is by far the longest of any won by the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, which announced late Monday that it was closing its doors. Former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow, who admitted to siphoning millions of dollars from the energy-trading company but ultimately cut a deal with prosecutors and testified against Skilling, got a six-year sentence. Lay, the founder of Enron and also a defendant in the case, died of heart disease in July, only weeks after he and Skilling were convicted by a jury.

Lake threw out Lay's conviction last week, citing a legal precedent that comes into play after a defendant dies before he completes the appeals process. On Monday, prosecutors said they had filed a civil lawsuit against Lay's estate seeking to recover $2.5 million used to pay the mortgage on his Houston penthouse condominium, $10 million from a family trust and $22,000 from a bank account.

Outside the courthouse, Skilling met throngs of reporters and camera crews. Wearing a tracking device underneath his navy suit, he waxed about Enron's past business prospects and talked about the "nightmare" his life had become. He said he felt horrible about the victims of Enron's collapse, but added that he had not broken the law, despite the aggressive prosecutors, the demonizing media reports and the resounding jury verdict.

"In the Inquisition, only about 10 percent of the people held out," Skilling said. "I can tell you it ain't fun."

Enron's Skilling Is Sentenced To 24 Years (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 23 — Jeffrey K. Skilling was sentenced to 24 years and 4 months in prison for his role in the pervasive fraud and conspiracy that led to the bankruptcy of Enron, closing the book on the government's prosecution of top executives at the once-highflying energy company.

Enron's fall ushered in a wave of prosecutions against corruption at the highest levels of American business. Since then the Justice Department has tightened the tourniquet around high-level executives involved in white-collar crime, leading to a series of stiff prison sentences.

Mr. Skilling stood stoically in his black suit as Judge Simeon T. Lake III read his sentence, which narrowly missed being the longest one ever handed down to a white-collar criminal. That record still belongs to Bernard J. Ebbers, the former chief executive of WorldCom, who was sentenced to 25 years last year for his role in the $11 billion fraud that led to that company's collapse.

Mr. Skilling's sentence nevertheless amounts to almost life imprisonment for the 52-year-old former chief executive, who in one decade transformed Enron from a sleepy pipeline company into an energy-trading juggernaut. Accounting schemes he approved masked huge debt and cash flow problems at the company that led to its ultimate demise. Shareholders at Enron, once the seventh-largest company in the country, lost billions of dollars in stock and retirement savings.

"As the many victims have testified, his crimes have imposed on hundreds if not thousands a life sentence of poverty," Judge Lake said, responding to criticism of the sentence as overly harsh.

Once in prison, Mr. Skilling could trim his sentence by 54 days a year with good behavior. And he could knock off one more year for participating in an inmate drug and alcohol treatment program, which the judge required.

Mr. Skilling has recently struggled with alcoholism. Despite being ordered not to drink by the court after a drunken scuffle with bar patrons in Manhattan in 2004, he was arrested last month by Dallas police for public intoxication and forced to spend a night in jail.

At Enron, Mr. Skilling alone now bears the dear price for fighting the charges that he and his co-defendant and Enron founder, Kenneth L. Lay, deceived analysts and investors about the company's true financial condition. Mr. Lay was convicted in May of fraud and conspiracy but died unexpectedly in July of heart-related problems. Several of Mr. Lay's family members and lawyers attended Monday's sentencing.

For now, at least, Mr. Skilling will avoid the discomfort of prison life.

Judge Lake denied Mr. Skilling's request to remain free pending appeal. But he allowed him to be confined to his Houston home until the Bureau of Prisons assigns him to a correctional facility, which could be a few months. He left court wearing an electronic monitoring bracelet on an ankle under his trousers.

Mr. Skilling, who is appealing his verdict, continued to profess his innocence. "I am innocent of every one of these charges," Mr. Skilling told the judge. "We will continue to pursue my constitutional rights and it's not a dishonor to this court or anyone else who was involved in this, but I feel very strongly about this."

In his five-minute speech, he reiterated that Enron collapsed because of a "severe liquidity crisis" and did not have "enough dry powder" to deal with the events that followed his abrupt resignation as chief in August 2001. "But I wasn't there," he said. "I wish I was there."

While saying he did nothing illegal, Mr. Skilling said he did feel bad about what happened. "I can't imagine more remorse," Mr. Skilling said. "I have friends who have died. Good men."

But some outside lawyers saw little remorse in Mr. Skilling's words. "He was defiant to the end," said Philip Hilder, a Houston criminal defense lawyer.

The judge's sentence fell within the 2000 federal sentencing guidelines. Judge Lake rejected the government's call to use stricter 2001 guidelines. But he found several reasons to increase Mr. Skilling's sentence into a range of 292 months to 365 months, or 24 years and 4 months to 30 years and 5 months.

The higher sentence, the judge said, was because he found that Mr. Skilling had lied to the Securities and Exchange Commission about the real reasons for his sales of Enron stock before the company's collapse in December 2001. Mr. Skilling said he sold the stock only because of the impact on the market of the 9/11 terrorist attacks.

Judge Lake said he would recommend that Mr. Skilling be assigned to the federal prison in Butner, N.C., for medium and low-security inmates. Because of the length of his sentence he will initially be placed in a medium-security facility.

The judge also approved a restitution order that will send as much as $45 million of Mr. Skilling's money to the victims of the Enron fraud. Under the order, $15.5 million will go to Mr. Skilling's lawyers and another $5 million to Enron shareholders if Mr. Skilling's appeals are unsuccessful. Essentially all of Mr. Skilling's almost $60 million fortune will be stripped from him, the judge said.

Some outside lawyers questioned Mr. Skilling's willingness to agree to the restitution order, saying it amounted to a tacit admission of guilt that could affect his chances of successfully appealing his verdict. "That could hurt him down the line," said Joel Androphy, a Houston criminal defense lawyer.

The government said Monday that it was also continuing to pursue the ill-gotten gains from Mr. Lay, even though his verdict was voided last week because of his death. Prosecutors filed a civil forfeiture action to recover more than $12.5 million from Mr. Lay's Houston condominium, a family investment partnership and a bank account.

The courtroom Monday was packed with reporters and local citizens, including nine jurors from the criminal trial. Mr. Skilling's brother, Mark, and his ex-wife, Susan, were there, but none of Mr. Skilling's three children attended the sentencing.

Six Enron shareholders and former employees spoke in support of Mr. Skilling's getting the maximum sentence for his crimes.

"Mr. Skilling has cheated me and my daughter of our retirement dreams," said Dawn Powers Martin, who worked 22 years at Enron. Now, she said, he should be denied "the chance to walk the earth as a free man."

Anne Beliveaux, who worked as an administrative assistant in Enron's tax department, said: "The worst mistake Ken Lay ever did was to hire you, bring you in and let you run the company, which we all loved. You should be ashamed of yourself."

One supporter, Sherri Sera, Mr. Skilling's longtime administrative assistant, said Mr. Skilling had "revolutionized" the energy industry and was "the most intellectually honest person you will ever meet."

Sean Berkowitz, the director of the Enron Task Force at the Justice Department, said Mr. Skilling's sentence was appropriate and should serve to deter white-collar crime.

"The Enron fraud is as large and serious as any other fraud in this nation's history," Mr. Berkowitz said. He added that Mr. Skilling "sat at the top and set the culture of what happened at Enron — he should bear the brunt of the responsibility."

Daniel Petrocelli, Mr. Skilling's lead lawyer, argued for a sentence closer to 7 to 10 years. But he said that while the jury found Mr. Skilling had "crossed the line," the "jury had no evidence that this man ever intended to harm anybody."

Judge Lake likened that argument to someone's committing arson to collect insurance but not intending for anyone to be inside the building.

One juror, Jill Ford, said she agreed with the judge. "Just because you don't mean to do it doesn't mean you don't know it is wrong," Ms. Ford said in an interview outside the courtroom. "But this is still really sad for everybody involved."

At day's end, Mr. Skilling told reporters outside the courthouse that he had no regrets in fighting for his innocence. A federal appeals court has overturned a string of convictions in Enron-related cases, giving him some hope, at least, of winning another trial.

For the next month or so, while confined to his home, he said he planned to spend as much time as he can with his family.

"Enron has become a horror to me," Mr. Skilling said, glassy-eyed and shaking. "The word Enron conjures up some really awful things. I don't blame the judge for what he did."

Skilling Gets 24 Years, 4 Months In Prison (LAT)

By Martin Zimmerman & Lianne Hart

The Los Angeles Times, October 24, 2006

HOUSTON — In one of the toughest prison terms to arise from the recent era of corporate scandal, former Enron Chief Executive Jeffrey K. Skilling was sentenced today to more than 24 years in federal prison for his role in the 2001 collapse of the energy trading company.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake pronounced his sentence of 24 years and four months after a two-hour hearing that featured angry testimony from former Enron workers, as well as a plea for mercy and a ringing expression of innocence from Skilling.

"In terms of remorse your Honor, I can't imagine more remorse," Skilling told Lake. "That being said your, your Honor, I am innocent of these charges. I am innocent of every one of these charges."

Skilling was sentenced nearly one week after the conviction of his former co defendant, Enron founder and Chairman Kenneth L. Lay, was thrown out after the court ruled that Lay's death in July denied him the chance to appeal the verdict.

A federal jury in May found Skilling guilty on one count of conspiracy, 12 counts of fraud, five counts of making false statements and one count of insider trading. He was acquitted of nine other insider-trading counts.

Skilling's pivotal role in what has been called the biggest scandal in the history of American business made leniency unlikely, experts said, especially given the long sentences handed out to other corporate criminals of the era, such as former WorldCom CEO Bernard J. Ebbers.

"This is a very tough time to be a white collar defendant," said Douglas R. Young, a San Francisco defense attorney. "In the public's mind, there is something about wanting to punish people who have seemingly been at the top of the game."

With no parole in the federal prison system and only limited time off possible for good behavior, it's probable that Skilling, 52, will serve the bulk of his sentence, said Stanford law professor Robert Weisberg, describing it as "a life sentence."

The Harvard MBA joined Enron in 1990 from the elite consulting firm McKinsey & Co. and was regarded as the force behind the company's transformation from a staid gas pipeline company into a high-tech energy-trading giant. Intense and sharp-tempered, Skilling became Enron's chief executive in February 2001. His resignation a few months later shocked Wall Street and intensified scrutiny of Enron's mounting financial woes.

Enron's implosion was one of the most infamous corporate scandals in U.S. history. The energy company's failure wiped out more than 4,000 jobs and billions of dollars of stock market value. It also led to sweeping regulations and legislation -- particularly the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law -- meant to curb corporate wrongdoing and restore confidence in companies' financial statements.

Lay and Skilling became the headline targets of a massive crackdown on corporate wrongdoing that also resulted in charges against executives of such companies as WorldCom, Adelphia Communications, HealthSouth and Tyco International.

Enron's auditor, then-Big Five accounting giant Arthur Andersen, went out of business after being indicted on an obstruction of justice charge in the wake of Enron's collapse. Testimony showed that Andersen employees shredded mounds of Enron-related documents after the federal probe was launched. The U.S. Supreme Court last year overturned the firm's 2002 conviction because of faulty jury instructions.

Well before Enron's bankruptcy, the company was embroiled in controversy during the California energy crisis of 2000 and 2001. Officials accused Enron and other "merchant energy" firms of helping to drive electricity prices through the roof by using a variety of unethical trading ploys to "game" California's fledgling power market. Judge Lake kept those issues out of the trial.

Skilling Gets 24 Years In Prison (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

HOUSTON -- Former Enron Corp. President Jeffrey Skilling was sentenced to 24 years and four months in prison, climaxing this generation's defining business scandal and highlighting its increasing intolerance of crime in the executive suite.

The 52-year-old Mr. Skilling didn't show emotion as he stood with his lead attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, in court yesterday and received the 292-month sentence from Judge Sim Lake. Judge Lake had presided over the four-month trial here earlier this year in which Mr. Skilling and his co-defendant, former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay, were convicted on numerous counts of fraud and conspiracy arising out of the onetime energy giant's late 2001 collapse into bankruptcy court. Mr. Lay died from heart-related problems shortly after his May conviction.

In remarks yesterday to the court, Mr. Skilling, who also served for a time as Enron's chief executive, reiterated his innocence and his plans to appeal his conviction on 19 felony counts. Mr. Skilling said he felt remorse for the toll that Enron took on everyone from friends and family to shareholders and company employees. "I've had friends who have died," Mr. Skilling said.

"I am innocent of these charges," he said. "We will continue to pursue my constitutional rights."

VIDEO REPORT

Paul Lin interviews WSJ.com's Law Blogger Peter Lattman2 about Jeffrey Skilling's sentencing and the message it may send to would-be white-collar criminals.

Judge Lake denied a defense motion that Mr. Skilling be allowed to stay out of prison pending his appeal. The judge did allow Mr. Skilling to "self-surrender" to prison authorities. Such a surrender usually occurs several weeks after sentencing. In the meantime, Judge Lake ordered Mr. Skilling to be confined to his home here and subject to electronic monitoring, which usually involves wearing an ankle bracelet that tracks a person's location.

Under federal law, a prisoner serves at least 85% of his sentence. If his conviction and sentence withstand appeal, Mr. Skilling would face imprisonment until he was older than 70.

Yesterday, the courtroom was packed with dozens of spectators. Many had taken part in the trial of Messrs. Skilling and Lay. Though Mr. Lay was no longer part of the case, several of his attorneys and family members attended in an apparent show of support for Mr. Skilling. Mr. Skilling and his wife, Rebecca Carter, hugged some of the defense lawyers. Ms. Carter was teary-eyed at times.

QUESTION OF THE DAY

Vote: Is Skilling's sentence appropriate? Cast your vote in WSJ.com's Question of the Day4.

Judge Lake allowed several former Enron employees and shareholders to speak, sometimes tearfully, about the damage they suffered as a result of Enron's collapse. They talked of lost jobs, lost retirement savings and a loss of faith in a company they loved. Some urged that Judge Lake give Mr. Skilling a very long prison sentence.

"Give him what he deserves: the rest of his life in prison," said Anne Beliveaux, an 18-year Enron veteran who was an administrative assistant at the company. She said she lost more than $500,000 when the value of the company's stock collapsed.

Mr. Petrocelli argued for a term of seven years to 10 years. Such a term would have put Mr. Skilling's sentence closer to those received by other senior Enron executives.

The federal sentencing system called for a much longer sentence than that. For the past two decades, federal prison terms have largely been determined by sentencing guidelines. They are based on numeric calculations that take into account such factors as a defendant's role in the crime, his acceptance of responsibility and, in cases of a fraud, the dollar loss.

Losses in the tens of millions of dollars can be a major upward driver of prison terms. In the case of a giant public corporation, such as Enron, the losses as measured by stock-market value can quickly reach into the billions of dollars.

Last year, a landmark Supreme Court ruling gave federal judges much more discretion to depart from the guidelines' calculations. Judges are still required to consider the guidelines and many follow them. Judge Lake yesterday said Mr. Skilling's guideline calculation called for a prison term of between 292 months and 365 months. The Skilling sentence was at the bottom end of that range.

Twenty years ago, when the guidelines were introduced, Mr. Skilling likely would have faced a sentence of about six years to seven years, sentencing experts say. Since then, there has been a steady ratcheting upward of prison terms for white-collar criminals, partly spurred by the scandals at Enron and other big companies, including WorldCom Inc. Former WorldCom chief Bernard Ebbers is serving 25 years in prison.

In handing down yesterday's sentence, Judge Lake acknowledged that Mr. Skilling had done good things at Enron and in the wider community. But Mr. Skilling also "repeatedly lied" to Enron investors and employees, the judge said. He pointed to the earlier statements from some of the victims, adding that Mr. Skilling had confined many to "a life sentence of poverty." Judge Lake recommended to federal prison authorities that Mr. Skilling be assigned to a facility in North Carolina.

The fact that corporate executives can receive prison terms akin to life sentences as a first-time offender has caused debate in law-enforcement and legal circles.

"Mr. Skilling's sentence was entirely expected and grossly excessive," said Jacob Frenkel, a former federal prosecutor who is in private practice in Rockville, Md. The sentence shows "how distorted sentencing in white-collar cases has become."

Yesterday's sentence also underscored the dangers of going to trial versus the benefits of pleading guilty and cooperating with federal investigators. Andrew Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, received a six-year sentence after he pleaded guilty to criminal charges and helped the government in its case against Messrs. Skilling and Lay.

Richard Causey, the company's former chief accounting officer, faces a maximum of seven years imprisonment under a plea bargain with the government. Prosecutors portrayed Messrs. Fastow and Causey as having been deeply involved with Mr. Skilling.

Under an agreement between prosecutors and the defense that Judge Lake announced, most of Mr. Skilling's remaining assets, about $45 million, will go to a fund for Enron victims. This would include the sale of his Houston mansion. The funds would be in escrow pending the outcome of Mr. Skilling's appeal. An additional $15 million would go to pay some of his legal expenses, part of a defense effort that is estimated to have cost more than $50 million so far, according to court filings and people familiar with the matter. His unpaid legal fees probably total an additional $20 million, according to these people.

Judge Orders Him To Pay $45 Million In Restitution (HC)

By Kristen Hays

Houston Chronicle, October 24, 2006

Former Enron Corp. CEO Jeff Skilling took the blow of a 24-year prison sentence the same way he took a jury's decision that he's a felon: Dry-eyed and calm.

Standing alone before U.S. District Judge Sim Lake to make a statement at his sentencing hearing Monday, Skilling insisted before he learned what his punishment would be that he is remorseful about Enron's 2001 demise and its devastating fallout to employees and investors.

"I will live those days and everything that happened subsequently for the rest of my life," he said.

"I have friends who died," he added without elaboration.

His self-described best friend, ex-Enron executive Cliff Baxter, fatally shot himself as the scandal swirled in January 2002. And his co-defendant, former Enron Chairman Ken Lay, died of heart disease in July, just six weeks after he and Skilling were convicted of crimes including fraud and conspiracy at the close of their four-month trial.

"All that being said, your honor, I am innocent of these charges. I am innocent of every one of these charges," the 52-year-old former business titan said with a bit of defiance in a hearing that capped an era of fraud that prompted Congress to pass sweeping reforms and stiffen white collar penalties.

Unmoved, Lake imposed a prison term of 24 years and four months — the bottom of a possible range that stretched to 30 years and five months.

He will also fork over $45 million in restitution should he lose his appeal.

Skilling's term is just a few months shy of the 25-year sentence former WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers began serving last month for orchestrating the $11 billion fraud that drove his company into bankruptcy.

"It's difficult to understand how 24 years for a nonviolent crime can be the low end of anything," said David Berg, a Houston civil litigator.

But others, including nine of the 16 jurors and alternates in Skilling's trial who attended his sentencing, approved.

"Judge Lake knows the law. He stood firm where the sentence will be served and when lenience was allowed, he considered that," said jury foreman Deb Smith.

Philip Hilder, a former federal prosecutor who represents several Enron defendants and witnesses, said Skilling's punishment was fair.

"It's not one that's out of the ordinary," he said.

Outside the courthouse, Skilling said with a shrug that he was disappointed, but called Lake a "fair guy" and said he would appeal.

"This is no act or anything. I believe that I'm innocent," he said.

Workers respondSeveral ex-Enron workers who made statements in court vehemently disagreed.

"Mr. Skilling has proven himself to be a liar, a thief and a drunk," said Dawn Powers Martin, a 22-year Enron worker. "Shame on me for believing the management of Enron."

Skilling has had two alcohol-laced run-ins with the law, once in 2004 that involved no arrest, and again last month in Dallas, where he was arrested on a misdemeanor.

Another ex-employee, Anne Beliveaux, referred to Skilling's abrupt resignation less than four months before Enron crashed.

"When things got bad you jumped ship because you knew the sky was falling underneath you all," she said. "You should be ashamed of yourself."

Outside the courtroom, Beliveaux said she was satisfied with having said her piece to Skilling directly.

"I looked him in the eye. That's why I came," she said. "This was my closure."

A couple of supporters spoke up for Skilling as well. Sue Walden, a longtime friend, acknowledged that jurors found that crimes occurred at Enron, "but to hold one individual responsible is unfair and unjust."

Confined at homeIn the hearing, Lake ordered Skilling to be confined at home until the U.S. Bureau of Prisons determines when and where he will report to prison, a process that generally takes six to eight weeks. The ex-CEO must wear an electronic monitoring ankle bracelet at all times so federal authorities can track his movements, and he can leave his home only for specified reasons, such as grocery shopping or medical appointments.

"This is not an easy decision," Lake said before he revealed the punishment. "Sentencing is the most difficult and least pleasant part of my job."

He noted that Skilling, a father of three, has a loving family and has done "good works," such as community service for Habitat for Humanity.

"But Congress has determined that crimes like this are deserving of a long punishment," the judge said. Though tantamount to life in prison, a lengthy prison term compares to a "life sentence of poverty" suffered by victims who lost jobs and money when Enron imploded, he said.

Skilling stoic, wife emotionalSkilling showed no visible emotion, but his wife, Rebecca Carter, leaned forward in a front-row pew and sobbed quietly. Friends and supporters who tried to comfort her included Elizabeth Vittor and Sharon Lay, the ex-chairman's daughter and sister, respectively. Vittor, a lawyer, was part of her father's legal team and sat between the two defendants throughout the trial.

Skilling's brother, Mark, also an attorney, sat near Carter and was as stoic as the ex-CEO. Skilling's children did not attend.

Under federal guidelines, investor loss drives a recommended prison term. Skilling's lawyers and prosecutors agreed ahead of time that investor losses exceeded $80 million, which meant Skilling faced 15 to 18 years in prison based on the loss alone, Hilder said.

The term increased as Lake found that other circumstances applied, such as use of sophisticated means to carry out crimes; conduct that jeopardized soundness of a financial institution, which were employee retirement accounts in Skilling's case; and abuse of a position of trust.

Lake emphasized another such circumstance — that Skilling lied to the Securities and Exchange Commission in December 2001 when he claimed that a market roiled by the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks prompted him to sell half a million shares of Enron stock the following week.

During the trial, jurors heard an audiotape of Skilling asking his broker to sell 200,000 shares of Enron stock on Sept. 6, 2001. The order was held up to give Skilling time to produce paperwork proving he was no longer CEO, and therefore didn't have to report his stock sales to the SEC.

Skilling testified that he didn't remember placing that order.

"I find that Mr. Skilling perjured himself when he testified under oath to the SEC" that he sold stock that September solely because of the attacks, Lake said.

DOJ_NMG_0085645

Heaviest punishmentSkilling can shave up to 3 1/2 years from his prison term — or 15 percent — for good behavior. He also can shave up to another year if he successfully completes a drug and alcohol rehabilitation program available to all inmates.

Still, his sentence far exceeds those given to or facing other ex-Enron executives who cut plea deals or gambled with jury trials and lost.

With Lay dead, former chief financial officer and admitted thief Andrew Fastow sentenced to six years, and former chief accounting officer Richard Causey expecting to serve five to seven years as part of a plea deal, Skilling was the last one standing from the executive suite, said Robert Mintz, a New Jersey-based former prosecutor who follows the Enron case.

"There was nobody else left to shoulder the bulk of retribution, which is why I think he received one of the most severe sentences we've seen out of all these cases of corporate fraud," Mintz said.

Skilling also agreed to turn over $45 million that will be distributed to Enron victims if he loses his appeal. That amount will include proceeds from sales of his $5.1 million Houston mansion and a $700,000 Dallas townhouse.

Skilling said after the hearing that he was "thrilled to death" that the money would go to victims, rather than to the government as a fine.

Those assets have been frozen since he was indicted in February 2004, as was another $15.5 million that was released Monday to pay his lawyers.

Prosecutors had sought up to $183 million in cash and assets from Skilling, but they and his lawyers agreed that he would turn over the lesser amount. Lead Skilling lawyer Daniel Petrocelli told Lake the forfeiture agreement would essentially clean Skilling out.

Prosecutor Sean Berkowitz, who cross-examined Skilling during the trial, said that leaving Skilling with "virtually no assets when all this is over is appropriate."

"The Enron fraud is as large and serious as any other fraud in this nation's history," Berkowitz said.

Petrocelli retorted that Skilling didn't set out to harm anyone.

"He is not a sacrificial man. He is a man on trial now facing judgment," Petrocelli said.

"But that harm is a consequence of the illegal conduct he did intend," the judge said.

No regrets at going to trialOutside the courthouse, a resolute Skilling said he had no regrets that he went to trial rather than cut a plea deal.

"No. I'm innocent," he said, when asked if he considered it. "I can't do that. I've told my children I'm innocent."

Jurors convicted Skilling of 19 of 28 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors, and Lay of six counts of fraud and conspiracy. Lake also convicted Lay of a count of bank fraud and four counts of lying to banks in a separate, non-jury trial.

Lake has already denied his request to remain free on bond during appeal, and Petrocelli said they would challenge that ruling as well as Skilling's convictions.

"We're looking forward to the next set of judges," he said.

In the meantime, Skilling said he aims to spend time with his family while on house arrest.

"You guys will know where I am at any time," he said.

Skilling Gets 24 Years In Accounting Scandal (WT/AP)

By Juan A. Lozano

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

HOUSTON -- Former Enron Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling, the most vilified figure from the financial scandal of the decade, was sentenced yesterday to 24 years and four months in the harshest sentence yet in the case that arose from the energy trading giant's collapse.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake denied Skilling's request for bond and ordered him to home confinement, with a requirement to wear an ankle monitor. Judge Lake, who told the U.S. Bureau of Prisons to recommend when Skilling should report to prison, suggested that he be sent to the federal facility in Butner, N.C., for his role in a case that came to symbolize corporate fraud in America.

Under federal law, criminal defendants can get two months a year shaved off their sentence for good behavior, David Irwin, a former federal and state prosecutor who practices in Towson, Md., told Bloomberg News. There is no parole in federal sentencing.

"By my calculations, he'll have to serve 20 years and four months," Mr. Irwin said. "That's a long time for a 52-year-old man."

Skilling was the last top former official to be punished for the accounting tricks and shady business deals that led to the loss of thousands of jobs, more than $60 billion in Enron stock and more than $2 billion in employee pension plans after the company sought bankruptcy protection in December 2001. Skilling, insisting he was innocent yet remorseful in a two-hour hearing, is appealing.

His remaining assets, about $60 million, will be liquidated, according to an agreement among Enron employee attorneys, the company's savings and stock ownership plans, prosecutors and Skilling's legal team.

About $45 million will be put in a restitution fund for victims. The remaining amount will go toward Skilling's legal fees, said Lynn Sark, an attorney for the Enron Corp. Savings Plan and Stock Ownership Plan. The Justice Department allowed Skilling to set aside $23 million for his defense when he was indicted; he still owed his attorneys $30 million as of yesterday.

Skilling stood with his hands clasped below his waist, with attorney Daniel Petrocelli at his side. He gave no visible reaction to the sentence. After court adjourned, Skilling hugged Mr. Petrocelli.

Skilling's term is the longest received by any Enron defendant; former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow was given a six-year term after cooperating with prosecutors and helping them secure Skilling's conviction.

It falls just shy of the sentence imposed on former WorldCom Chief Executive Officer Bernard J. Ebbers, who received 25 years for his role in the $11 billion accounting fraud that toppled the company he built from a tiny telecommunications firm to an industry giant.

Skilling's co-defendant, Enron founder Kenneth L. Lay, died from heart disease July 5. Mr. Lay's convictions on 10 counts of fraud, conspiracy and lying to banks in two separate cases were wiped out with his death.

Skilling's arrogance, belligerence and lack of contriteness under questioning made him a lightning rod for the rage generated by the collapse of Enron in 2001.

"Your honor, I am innocent of these charges," Skilling told Judge Lake yesterday. "I'm innocent of every one of these charges.

"We will continue to pursue my constitutional rights, and it's no dishonor to this court and anyone else in this court. But I feel very strongly about this, and I want my friends, my family to know that."

He also disputed reports that he had no remorse for his role in the fraud that drove the company to seek bankruptcy protection.

"I can tell you that's just the furthest thing from the truth," he said. "It has been very hard on me, but probably, more important, incredibly hard on my family, incredibly hard on employees of Enron Corporation, incredibly hard on my friends and incredibly hard on the community."

Skilling's wife, former Enron corporate secretary Rebecca Carter, was in the courtroom.

Skilling was convicted in May on 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors. He was acquitted on nine counts of insider trading.

Judge Lake yesterday set investor loss tied to Skilling's actions at $80 million, which he relied on to set the sentence. With that figure, Skilling faced up to 30.4 years in prison.

Skilling also faces more than $18 million in fines for his crimes.

Victims unleashed nearly five years of anger on Skilling yesterday and begged the judge to send Skilling to prison for life.

"Mr. Skilling has proven to be a liar, a thief and a drunk, flaunting an attitude above the law," said 22-year Enron employee Dawn Powers Martin. "He has betrayed everyone who has trusted him. Shame on me for believing the management of Enron."

Some chose not to vilify Skilling, however.

"I can't state strongly enough, during 20 years, have I seen or heard anything that he was leading a massive conspiracy to mislead Enron shareholders and employees," said Sherri Sera, a former administrative assistant. She said she, too, had lost thousands in Enron stock and benefits but blamed her failure to diversify.

Skilling spent 11 years at Enron. He took over as chief executive from Mr. Lay in February 2001 but abruptly quit six months later, citing a desire to spend more time with his family. Prosecutors said he left Enron because he knew the company was on the brink of bankruptcy.

24 Years For Skilling In Enron Case (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, October 24, 2006

HOUSTON — A federal judge sentenced Jeffrey Skilling, the lead architect of the complex fraud that was Enron, to 24 years in prison Monday, bringing closure to a massive federal effort to identify and punish the perpetrators of the biggest accounting fraud in history.

DOJ_NMG_0085647

Declaring that Skilling "repeatedly lied to investors," U.S. District Judge Sim Lake rejected defense arguments that seven to 10 years in prison would be sufficient. Instead, he gave Skilling, 52, one of the harshest sentences ever for a white-collar crime, nearly matching the 25 years that a New York judge leveled against former WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers last year.

As Lake spelled out the sentence, Skilling's wife, Rebecca Carter, hunched over and began sobbing in the first row of the spectator gallery. But Skilling, who was known at Enron for having a highly combustible temper, remained an island of calm throughout the proceeding.

In addition to his wife, Skilling's brother and sister attended the sentencing. To the surprise of many observers, several members of the late Ken Lay's family also showed up. In May, Skilling and Lay were both convicted of deceiving investors about Enron's true financial condition.

As if drawn by a need for closure, more than half the jurors who served on the trial also showed up at the sentencing.

Lay was scheduled to be sentenced along with Skilling, but he died of a heart attack on July 5. Last week, in accord with legal precedent, Lake vacated Lay's conviction and dismissed the indictment against him, leaving Skilling as the only Enron CEO to be sentenced for crimes committed against investors.

Enron's collapse in the fall of 2001 wiped out more than $60 billion in market capitalization and ruined the retirement savings of thousands of former employees. Several of those victims spoke at Monday's hearing, urging Lake to impose the maximum sentence allowed on Skilling.

One such victim was Ann Beliveaux, an 18-year Enron employee whose savings were wiped out by Enron's collapse, just as she approached retirement. Looking directly at Skilling, she said: "The worst mistake Ken Lay ever made was to hire you, bring you in and let you run the company. When things got bad, you just shoved off, because you knew what was coming."

Prior to his sentencing, Skilling addressed the judge, saying he was bothered by the perception that he felt no remorse about Enron's collapse. "That's just the furthest thing from the truth," he said. Referring to Lay and former Enron executive Cliff Baxter, who took his own life in January 2002, he said, "I had friends who died, good men."

But Skilling spent much of his speech reiterating his innocence, a position consistent with his plans to appeal the verdict. In addition to his sentencing, Lake approved a settlement calling for Skilling to surrender all his $43 million in assets to a restitution fund for Enron retirees and shareholders.

Skilling Sentenced To 24 Years In Prison (FT)

By Sheila McNulty

Financial Times, October 24, 2006

Jeffrey Skilling, Enron's former chief executive, was on Monday sentenced to 24 years and four months in prison for orchestrating the fraud and conspiracy that destroyed the giant energy trader and forced a tightening of regulatory oversight across corporate America.

Mr Skilling, 52, put his arm around his lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, after his sentence was announced, then sat down and turned to give his sobbing wife, Rebecca, a weak smile across the courtroom. She sat, clothed in black, in the public gallery, alongside the media, former Enron employees and the jury that had convicted her husband.

Former Enron CEO Jeffrey Skilling Sentenced To 24 Years In Prison (LAW)

By Brenda Sapino Jeffreys, Texas Lawyer

Texas Lawyer, October 24, 2006

At a hearing on Monday where Jeffrey Skilling continued to proclaim his innocence, U.S. District Judge Sim Lake of Houston sentenced Skilling, the former chief executive officer of Houston's Enron Corp., to more than 24 years in prison.

Lake denied Skilling's request to remain free on bail pending his appeal, but the judge allowed Skilling to remain in home confinement until the U.S. Bureau of Prisons orders him to report to prison. Lake granted a defense motion that Skilling serve his time in the Butner Federal Corrections Complex in Butner, N.C.

In May, a jury found Skilling guilty of 19 criminal charges stemming from the collapse of Enron, which filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in December 2001. Skilling stood trial alongside former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay, but Lay died in July, and earlier this month Lake vacated Lay's conviction of 10 criminal charges because Lay's death made it impossible for him to appeal his conviction.

Lake sentenced Skilling to 292 months in prison, which was at the low end of the range of punishment dictated by the Federal Sentencing Guidelines. Lake said Skilling could have received up to 365 months in prison under the guidelines. Prosecutors and defense attorneys had stipulated the financial loss caused by Skilling's crimes at a minimum of $80 million, Lake said.

At the sentencing hearing, Lake also approved a stipulated forfeiture and restitution settlement agreement that would provide money to plaintiffs in civil litigation filed by disgruntled shareholders and employees who lost retirement money through Enron's retirement plans. Skilling will forfeit assets worth about $45 million, said Sean Berkowitz, an assistant U.S. attorney who is the head of the Enron Task Force.

"I think it is a fair solution," Lake said about the restitution agreement. "It will allow victims to recover ... a substantial amount of money."

The fund will be overseen by U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon, who presides over the civil litigation.

That restitution agreement calls for the payment of $15.5 million to O'Melveny & Myers, Skilling's defense firm, as partial payment for $12.7 million in unreimbursed costs and more than $20 million in unpaid fees for his criminal defense.

In relatively brief remarks in a jam-packed courtroom, Skilling said it's "just the furthest thing from the truth" for people to think he is not remorseful for what happened to Enron.

"It's been very hard on me. ... It's been incredibly hard on my family. It's been very hard on the employees of Enron Corp.," he said.

However, he said, "I am innocent of these crimes," and noted that he will pursue his constitutional right to an appeal.

Skilling stood next to his defense attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, when hearing his sentence. Skilling's wife, Rebecca Carter, was in the courtroom; she broke down sobbing after Lake sentenced her husband.

Several members of the public gave victim impact statements, including former employees who lost much of their retirement money and asked Lake to give Skilling the maximum sentence.

Ann Beliveaux, who worked at Enron for 18 years, said she lost more than $500,000 in her retirement account at Enron and faces an uncertain retirement.

"Never in my wildest dreams did I think I'd be facing what I face in one month when I turn 65," Beliveaux said.

"The worst mistake Ken Lay ever did was to hire you," Beliveaux told Skilling.

But Sherri Sera, who said she was Skilling's longtime executive assistant, implored Lake to consider that Skilling is a business "visionary" who could help the Houston community with business advice, and the judge should consider Skilling's long history of charitable work in determining his sentence.

"He's a natural resource this country can't afford to lock up," Sera said.

Petrocelli, a partner in O'Melveny & Myers in Century City, Calif., was not immediately available for comment following the hearing, but he told Lake during the hearing that Skilling never intended to harm anyone.

"This jury had no evidence against this man that he harmed anybody or intended to harm anybody," Petrocelli said.

Lake said during the hearing that Skilling's crimes "have imposed on hundreds if not thousands of people a life sentence of poverty."

Berkowitz asked Lake to give Skilling a sentence within the range dictated by the sentencing guidelines. Berkowitz declined comment following the hearing.

But in a written statement, Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher of the U.S. Department of Justice's Criminal Division, said, "Today's sentence is a measure of justice for the thousands of people who lost their jobs and millions of dollars in investments when Enron collapsed under the weight of the fraud perpetrated by the company's top executives."

The government, meanwhile, announced on Monday that it will file a civil forfeiture action to recover property that allegedly constituted proceeds of the criminal case against Lay. The civil complaint, according to the government's press release, seeks to forfeit Lay's condominium in Houston, property associated with a Lay family investment partnership and a bank account with more than $22,000.

Michael Ramsey, a solo practitioner in Houston who was on Lay's defense team, says that if the six-year sentence that former Enron Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow received is a benchmark "anything above what Andy Fastow drew is retaliation or retribution" albeit within the sentencing guidelines.

Ramsey says he's not criticizing Lake, but criticizing the system.

In May, a jury found Skilling guilty of one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud, 12 counts of securities fraud, five counts of making false statements to auditors and one count of insider trading. The jury found Skilling not guilty of nine counts of insider trading.

Ex-Enron Chief Skilling Gets Prison Time (CHIT)

By Greg Burns

Chicago Tribune, October 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0085649

HOUSTON -- A landmark case in the annals of corporate crime ended Monday on a chilling note for any business executive tempted to cook the books, with a federal judge sentencing former Enron Corp. Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling to more than 24 years in prison.

The 292-month sentence brings closure to one of the most traumatic frauds in the nation's history, and provides momentum for the government crackdown on executives who con investors and enrich themselves. "Corporate crooks should beware," warned FBI assistant director Chip Burrus.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake ordered Skilling to forfeit $45 million in victim restitution, and confined him to his Houston mansion until a prison cell is designated for him within a few months. Addressing news reporters outside the courthouse, wearing a court-required ankle bracelet to track his movements, the one-time corporate star remained unrepentant, professed his innocence and vowed to appeal.

Lake rejected Skilling's claim, noting that the defendant repeatedly lied to investors and cashed in part of his stock while others were left with devastating losses. "His crimes have imposed on hundreds if not thousands of people a life sentence of poverty," Lake said.

During the three-hour hearing Lake rejected a plea for leniency, comparing Skilling to an arsonist who sets a fire in a building thought to be empty, only to discover that people inside were killed. Skilling faced the judge alone in the aftermath of the July 5 death of Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay, his co-defendant at trial. The 52-year-old ex-executive spoke in a clear voice and showed no emotion when he heard the sentence.

His wife, Rebecca, a former Enron insider, leaned over, put her head in her hands and sobbed from a front-row bench in the courtroom. His three children were not present, nor was Skilling's older brother Tom, chief meteorologist for WGN-Ch. 9 and the Chicago Tribune.

"This has been a difficult situation all around, for my family and for many others," the popular Chicago weatherman said in a statement. "Between my parents' diminishing health and the demands of my job, we're trying to get through every day the best we can."

Secure facility

Because of the length of his sentence Skilling is eligible for no less than medium security, and the judge rejected a request from his attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, for a 10-month reduction that might have opened the door to a less-restrictive institution.

Under federal rules inmates typically serve at least 85 percent of their prison term.

On May 25 a federal jury found Skilling guilty of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, lying to auditors and insider trading, acquitting him of nine additional insider-trading charges.

Last week Lake dismissed the conviction of Lay, who was legally entitled to a clean slate because he died before his appeals were exhausted. Lay's absence from the courtroom in which he and his co-defendant sat side-by-side during their trial cast a lonely spotlight on Skilling, who nevertheless looked tan, fit and alert.

Last month Skilling paid a $385 fine and boosted the frequency of his alcohol- and mental-health counseling after being found intoxicated in Dallas.

Among the victims speaking directly to Skilling at Monday's hearing was Charles Prestwood, who retired from Enron after 33 years only to lose everything in its bankruptcy except for the gifts he received from the company in recognition of his long service. "I had $1.3 million and all I've got to show for it is two clocks," he lamented.

Similarly, Anne Beliveaux, an 18-year Enron veteran, described how she lost her entire $500,000 nest egg just prior to reaching retirement age. "You knew the sky was getting ready to fall," she told Skilling. "You should be ashamed of yourself."

Afterwards, she pronounced the 24-year term "OK," but added, "Myself, I would have given him life."

The fall of Enron five years ago wiped out thousands of jobs and billions of dollars in wealth, shaking the public's confidence in financial markets and triggering the liquidation of Chicago's Andersen accounting firm. Along with WorldCom's collapse soon after, the case led to new rules governing the accountability of business executives, and stiffer penalties for abusing their positions.

Enron executives led by Skilling and Lay deceived investors by hiding debt and losses in off-the-books partnerships, making Enron appear to be booming even as its woes mounted. Prosecutors demonstrated that Skilling and Lay lied to investors, omitted critical facts and put personal interests above all others.

Both defendants testified in the trial, and Skilling, a graduate of West Aurora High School, showed the brainpower and intensity that propelled his career from Harvard Business School and McKinsey & Co. to the top of Enron's energy-trading empire.

Fastow rewarded

But jurors rejected his view of Enron as a company undone by a "run on the bank" through no fault of his own. Although stiff sentences have become the norm, recent Supreme Court cases give judges greater discretion than in the past. And the rewards for cooperating in high-level white-collar cases rarely have been so significant.

After Andrew Fastow's testimony helped convict Skilling, the ex-Enron chief financial officer, who carried out the fraud and diverted company money into his own pockets, received a six-year sentence. That was four years less than called for in his plea agreement.

Skilling is likely to reference the leniency shown to Fastow in his appeal, which claims he failed to receive a fair trial because of alleged missteps in jury instructions and the handling of adverse publicity. No one has ever suggested he had an inadequate defense, however.

The Skilling legal team is said to have received $40 million, and the restitution agreement approved Monday awards his law firm another $15.5 million, primarily to pay out-of-pocket costs. The firm is still owed a greater amount in unpaid fees, Petrocelli said.

Not everyone holds Skilling responsible. Sherri Sera, his longtime personal assistant, told the court she, too, lost her retirement savings when Enron stock collapsed, but she blames herself for making a "short-sighted investment decision." Her ex-boss has been "unfairly demonized and ridiculed," she said. "He is a natural resource the country can ill-afford to lock away or throw away."

Government Sues Ken Lay's Estate (HC)

By David Ivanovich

Houston Chronicle, October 24, 2006

$12.7 million in assets sought, including family's River Oaks condo

WASHINGTON - The government filed suit against the late Ken Lay's estate Monday, hoping to wrest control of the one-time Enron chairman's River Oaks condominium and other assets valued at about $12.7 million.

In the wake of a federal judge's decision last week to vacate Lay's fraud and conspiracy convictions because of the Enron executive's death, the government filed a civil suit in U.S. District Court in Houston seeking "to recover property that constitutes proceeds of the fraud proven in the criminal case against Lay," the Justice Department said in a statement.

The government wants Lay's 33rd-floor condo in the Huntingdon at 2121 Kirby, valued at $2.5 million, along with $10.2 million in assets controlled by KLL & LPL Investments Ltd. and $22,680.14 in a Bank of America account.

Michael Ramsey, the Houston attorney who represented Lay at the criminal trial, called the government's suit an effort to "seize the homestead of the widow."

"Mr. Lay is dead, and this is an attack, apparently, on his widow and his children," Ramsey said.

Lay died July 5, just weeks after a jury found him guilty on six charges of fraud and conspiracy. In a separate trial, U.S. District Judge Sim Lake also found Lay guilty of four counts of bank fraud.

But since Lay died before his appeals could be exhausted, Lake, after a decision handed down in another case by the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals, wiped out the conviction.

Civil suit pursuedBecause that decision meant the government could not seize Lay's assets, the government chose to file a civil suit.

The government contends Lay garnered a total of $99 million from criminal activity.

The $12.7 million worth of assets identified in the civil case "is the amount identified that we believe we can recover through the civil process," Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said late Monday.

Sierra could not say Monday whether the government would seek forfeiture of other assets later.

Ramsey argued the government should leave any civil matters to the attorneys representing the victims of the Enron collapse. "I don't know what business the government has being involved," Ramsey said.

Western Digital Finishes Options Review (AP-YBIZ)

AP, October 24, 2006

Western Digital Review Finds 19 Improper Stock Options Grants

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Western Digital Corp., a computer memory and data storage company, said Monday that its three-month investigation of its stock option practices turned up 19 improper stock option grants, but it found no evidence that the option grants were manipulated to avoid reporting compensation expenses on its financial statements.

The company said that 19 stock option grants between fiscal year 1998 and fiscal year 2003 were improperly accounted for, and as a result the company should have recognized approximately $21 million of stock compensation and tax-related expenses.

The investigation, which was carried out by a special committee of independent members of the company's board of directors, found that an annual employee stock option grant made in November 1999 was "intentionally dated with hindsight at a low price." But the company said although this instance of backdating was improper, no evidence was found that it was done to avoid compensation expense or any other financial statement impacts.

At least 140 public companies have disclosed Justice Department, SEC or internal investigations into possible backdating of their option grants.

The company said its special committee has recommended several changes to the board in how stock options are granted, and the board has adopted all the recommendations. The investigation also found no misconduct by the company's current management, the company said.

Western Digital has not yet determined how it will alter its financial statements as a result of the investigation. The company said it has notified the Securities and Exchange Commission of the results of its investigation and "will cooperate fully in the event of any inquiry."

Shares of Western Digital dropped 44 cents, or 2.5 percent, to close at $17.17 on the New York Stock Exchange.

CNet Networks Says 3Q Revenue Rose But Delays Full Report (AP)

AP, October 24, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - CNet Networks Inc., an online publisher of technology news and reviews, said Monday its third-quarter revenue grew 13 percent, but it will delay filing its official results until an accounting review of its past stock-option grants is complete.

The company would not speculate on when the review would be completed and declined to discuss how its earnings might be effected.

Quarterly revenue rose to $92.8 million from $81.9 million during the same period last year.

That matched the results expected by analysts polled by Thomson Financial.

Shares of CNet climbed 40 cents, or 4.74 percent, to $8.84 after hours, after falling 3 cents to end the Nasdaq session at $8.44. The stock has ranged between $7.07 and $16.09 over the past year.

For the fourth quarter, CNet said it expects revenue of $108 million to $115 million. For the full year, the company forecast $376 million to $386 million in revenue.

Analysts project $111.3 million in revenue for the fourth quarter, and $379.8 million for fiscal 2006.

CNet is one of at least 93 companies that have been questioned by the Securities and Exchange Commission or the Justice Department for the timing of past stock options grants.

CNet previously said it found instances in which actual measurement dates for certain past stock options differ from recorded measurement dates, and that these accounting errors will require the company to restate certain past financial statements.

CNet said it will not file its full financial results for the quarter until the restatement process is complete.

The company said Monday it does not expect the anticipated restatements to have any impact on its previously reported revenues or cash positions.

Like other companies caught in the stock-option scandal, CNet has acknowledged a technique known as "backdating," which occurs when insiders look back in time for a low point in their company's stock price so the exercise, or "strike," price of the options could be set at that ebb.

If they aren't properly disclosed, backdated options can inflate corporate profits and result in an underpayment of taxes.

Following its internal probe, Shelby Bonnie resigned as CNet's chairman and chief executive earlier this month, though he remains a member of CNet's board.

The company reiterated Monday that a number of executives, including Bonnie, "bear varying degrees of responsibility" in the past options-granting process, but that no one, including current employees, engaged in "intentional wrongdoing."

Neil Ashe, who immediately replaced Bonnie as CEO, thanked his predecessor for his leadership during a conference call to analysts Monday.

"He fostered innovation and excellence. We owe him a permanent debt of gratitude for the vision as well as the industry at large," Ashe said.

CNet said that in the third quarter, its sites averaged 124.5 million unique visitors per month, up 13 percent from the year-ago period. CNet noted that it launched a new food-related Web portal, Chow, during the quarter.

Prudential Agreement With DOJ Signals New Risk For GCs (CORPCOUN)

By Sue Reisinger, Corporate Counsel

Corporate Counsel, October 24, 2006

The price for settling criminal allegations by the government keeps getting higher. In August, Prudential Financial Inc. signed a deal with the U.S. Department of Justice that allows it to avoid prosecution for wrongdoing at a brokerage subsidiary. But prosecutors didn't ask for a corporate monitor, as they typically do in deals of this nature.

Instead, the settlement with Newark, N.J.-based Prudential requires GC Susan Blount to personally design, install, and oversee a complex compliance program. Moreover, Blount must report on the program to federal prosecutors twice a year for the next five years.

Forcing a company to adopt a compliance plan is common in deferred and nonprosecution agreements, several experts say -- but demanding that a GC be held personally accountable is not. In effect, Blount has become an enforcement officer for Michael Sullivan, the U.S. attorney in Boston who oversaw the investigation into the problems at Prudential. Should the compliance program fail, Blount could be held liable by the government, as well as by shareholders.

Why didn't Sullivan take the usual route and appoint a corporate monitor? That move would have "made little sense in this case," Sullivan explains, because Prudential had sold a majority share in the subsidiary that engaged in the wrongdoing. "The [government] did, however, want to make sure that the parent company improved its oversight of its subsidiaries," Sullivan says. He accomplished that by imposing significant duties on GC Blount that cover the entire company.

Blount and Prudential's CEO signed the settlement with the government in late August. The "agreement" is called just that, not a deferred or nonprosecution agreement. The deal ends a three-year probe of Prudential Equity Group by Sullivan's office. The subsidiary admitted in the settlement that some of its Boston-based brokers illegally timed mutual fund trades to benefit big hedge fund clients, to the detriment of long-term investors. PEG says that the trades earned over $57 million in commissions and $100 million in profits for hedge fund clients. Sullivan's office is continuing its investigation into individual brokers, and at least ten have been charged.

The deal also settled actions and investigations by several other state and federal agencies, including the Securities and Exchange Commission. Linda Thomsen, the SEC's director of enforcement, said at a press conference after the settlement was signed that senior officers at Prudential received more than 1,000 e-mails and letters from mutual fund companies complaining about the timing practices. "High-level officers of Prudential were aware of the complaints," she said, "but the company failed to take action to stop the fraud."

Blount, named general counsel in 2005 after 20 years in Prudential's legal department, didn't return calls for comment. A Prudential spokesman also wouldn't comment on the terms of the agreement. Specifically, the agreement requires Blount to make twice-a-year reports to the Prudential board's audit committee "as to the appropriateness and effectiveness of the compliance plan ... [and] to provide the reports to the U.S. attorney in the District of Massachusetts."

Besides those terms, the agreement is extraordinary in several other ways. For one, it represents the first criminal penalties against a company for deceptive market timing. For another, the $600 million in fines and penalties is the largest payment by a single company to resolve market-timing charges. Then there's the unusual length of the agreement. Most deferred and nonprosecution deals run from 12 months to three years, but this one runs a minimum of five years -- the longest found on public record.

In a statement, Prudential CEO Arthur Ryan said simply, "We take these matters very seriously and deeply regret the conduct of some former employees that led to these problems."

U.S. Requests Extradition Of Fugitive Ex-CEO From Namibia (WE/AP)

The Wichita Eagle, October 24, 2006

WINDHOEK, Namibia (AP) - The U.S. has requested the extradition from Namibia of Jacob ``Kobi'' Alexander, accused in the United States of hatching a scheme to pocket millions of dollars by secretly manipulating stock options, the U.S. Embassy spokesman said Monday.

The request was submitted Friday, U.S. Embassy spokesman Ray Castillo said in Windhoek. No date was set for an extradition hearing for the former chief executive of voicemail-software maker Comverse Technology Inc.

Alexander was granted bail by a Namibian court earlier this month on condition that he hand in his passport, stay in the Windhoek district and report twice a week to an Interpol inspector.

Dennis Khama, a Namibian Ministry of Justice official who handles extradition issues, confirmed the U.S. request had been received and said the minister would first have to determine whether it complied with the country's extradition laws. If it does, the minister will then submit the request to a magistrate.

Alexander's lawyer, Richard Metcalfe, was out of the country and unavailable for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0085653

Alexander was arrested Sept. 26 in the Namibian capital, Windhoek, at the request of the FBI after a two-month manhunt. In an affidavit filed with a Namibian court, Alexander said he had entered the country lawfully in July and had been living here openly with his wife and three children.

Alexander, a 54-year-old Israeli citizen, also said he had plans for businesses and investments in this desert country.

It is alleged that from 1991 through 2005, Alexander exercised options and sold stocks worth approximately $150 million, making a $138 million profit, according to a U.S. criminal complaint. Of that, about $6.4 million was generated by backdating options.

The complaint accuses Alexander and two other former top Comverse executives of making stock options more lucrative by backdating their exercise price to a low point in the stock's value. Usually, a stock option's exercise price coincides with the market value at the time of a grant to give the recipient an incentive to drive the price higher.

In addition, the company awarded thousands of stock options to fictional employees, then secretly transferred the awards to an internal account under the name I.M. Fanton, which stood for phantom, U.S. court papers said. The scheme allowed Alexander to award those options to ``favored employees" and to himself without board of directors approval, the papers added.

Comverse Technology is headquartered in Woodbury, New York.

Fla. Viatical Settlements Co Founder Pleads Guilty (DOW)

By Siobhan Hughes, Of DOW JONES NEWSWIRES

Dow Jones, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- A founding partner of a Florida viatical settlements company has pleaded guilty to participating in a massive securities fraud in which investors lost $956 million, federal prosecutors announced on Monday.

Peter Lombardi, one of the founders of Mutual Benefits Corp., was accused of helping orchestrate the fraud from October 1994 through May 2004. He has agreed to be responsible for $956 million in restitution to victims and faces as much as 20 years in prison and a fine of as much as $5 million, according to a press release issued by the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of Florida.

Jon May, an attorney for Lombardi, could not immediately be reached for comment.

Viatical settlements allow terminally ill people to sell their life insurance policies for an immediate payment. The purchaser of the policy becomes the beneficiary of the policy and makes premium payments, receiving the full life insurance benefit when the terminally ill person dies.

Lombardi was accused of helping direct an international network of sales agents who falsely assured investors by using false projections of how long the insured people would live. The Justice Department said that in fact, most investors have never realized any profit and haven't been able to get their investment back since about 80% of the policies never matured.

The SEC last year reached a separate settlement with Lombardi and two other men, brothers Joel and Leslie Steinger, with whom he ran the company. In that settlement, the Steinger brothers each agreed to give up $9 million in ill- gotten gains and to pay a $500,000 civil penalty. Lombardi agreed to pay $5.88 million in disgorgement and to pay a $120,000 civil penalty.

Grasso Vows Another Appeal In Response To N.Y. Judge's Ruling (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 24, 2006

Richard A. Grasso, the ex-New York Stock Exchange chairman, will ask the New York Appellate Division, 1st Department, to review Justice Charles E. Ramos' decision ordering him to repay as much as $100 million in compensation from his former employer.

"Justice Ramos recently wrote that he takes comfort from the fact that the Appellate Division will review his rulings," Grasso said late Thursday. "So do I."

Grasso is being sued by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who has argued that Grasso's $187.5 million pay package was excessive under the state's not-for-profit law. Spitzer said Friday that he was not surprised by Grasso's decision to appeal the latest decision. "The defendants will continue to do what they have always done -- delay," Spitzer said.

But Grasso attorney Gerson A. Zweifach, a partner at Williams & Connolly, has reportedly said that any delay was Spitzer's fault. Zweifach said the case is at a standstill because the Appellate Division must decide whether it was appropriate for Ramos, in an earlier decision, to order a bench trial over the issue of whether Grasso's pay was reasonable. "The reality is that this case would be mostly done with trial right now had the attorney general not asked the judge to delay the trial and to order a bench trial," Zweifach said.

Four appeals stemming from the case are pending, including one filed by Kenneth Langone, Grasso's co-defendant.

SEC Won't Charge Perle In Hollinger Board Probe (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission has notified former Defense Department adviser Richard Perle that regulators won't bring charges against him in connection with a case involving his service as a Hollinger International Inc. board member.

Dennis Block, an attorney for Mr. Perle, said his client was notified by the SEC early this month that he wouldn't face charges.

Mr. Perle served on the executive committee of Hollinger International from 1994 to 2003, along with former Hollinger Chairman Conrad Black and former Hollinger Chief Operating Officer David Radler. The SEC filed civil-fraud charges against Messrs. Black and Radler in 2004, accusing them of engaging in undisclosed transactions that benefited them but hurt the newspaper-publishing company.

Mr. Radler has pleaded guilty to participating in a scheme to divert more than $32 million from Hollinger's newspaper-holding company and has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors. Mr. Black was indicted on criminal charges last year and has pleaded not guilty. He is to stand trial next year.

A 2004 report for Hollinger International's board found that Mr. Perle "repeatedly breached his fiduciary duties as a member of the executive committee" by failing to evaluate several consent forms that authorized many of the transactions.

The report said that Mr. Perle "was beholden to Black and other insiders for his compensation," and that he therefore "had a motive to abdicate his fiduciary duties as an Executive Committee member so as to accommodate Black and Radler."

John Nester, an SEC spokesman, declined to comment.

Hollinger International changed its name to Sun-Times Media Group Inc. in July. The company publishes the Chicago Sun-Times and other newspapers and Web sites in the Chicago area. A spokeswoman for the company also declined to comment.

Ex-Delphi Employees Seek Aid (FREEP)

By Jason Roberson, Free Press Business Writer

Detroit Free Press, October 24, 2006

They want insurance to pay legal fees

Former Delphi Corp. CEO J.T. Battenberg III, former CFO Alan Dawes and seven other former Delphi employees who have incurred legal bills linked to a federal investigation of accounting issues, filed a motion in a U.S. bankruptcy court Thursday demanding access to a Delphi insurance policy that could pay their legal expenses.

From Delphi's bankruptcy filing Oct. 8, 2005, through February 2006, most of the former employees racked up more than $147,000 in legal expenses collectively. The costs are related to allegations of violations of federal and state securities laws and the Employee Retirement Income Security Act.

But Delphi general counsel David Sherbin sent individual letters to attorneys of the former employees in February letting them know Delphi would not pay the outstanding balance of legal bills or any future legal fees and related expenses.

"The company has the authority but not the obligation" to pay for certain legal expenses, Sherbin said in a Feb. 21 letter addressed to Dawes' attorney.

A hearing on the motion from the former employees is set for Nov. 30. Delphi spokeswoman Claudia Piccinin declined to comment Monday, saying it would be inappropriate to speak on the matter before the hearing.

Battenberg's attorney, William H. Jeffress Jr. of Baker Botts LLP in Washington, D.C., did not return phone calls seeking comment. An assistant for Dawes' attorney, Elizabeth Baird of O'Melveny & Myers LLP, said she was unavailable for comment.

According to law firm Lowenstein Sandler PC in New York, Delphi's senior executives are accused of:

· Disguising $441 million in financing transactions as sales of inventory or indirect materials.

· Improperly accounting for more than $240 million in transactions with General Motors Corp., its former owner, by deferring expenses that should have been accounted for immediately.

· Improperly accounting for millions of dollars in transactions with service providers, including $68 million in transactions with Electronic Data Systems.

· Overstating the company's pretax income by $14 million in 2002 and by $34 million in 2003 by improperly recording obligations and adjustments before they accrued.

· Improperly accounting for direct materials by understating the value. Delphi's senior executives are accused of instructing subordinates not to record high-dollar supplies as inventory and directing subordinates to delay delivery of inventory.

DOJ_NMG_0085655

In 2004, Delphi bought a directors and officers liability insurance policy from National Union Fire Insurance Co. of Pittsburgh.

As early as the summer of 2004, Delphi disclosed that the Securities and Exchange Commission was investigating the company's accounting practices. On Aug. 8, 2005, Delphi disclosed that the Justice Department and other federal authorities were investigating the company.

Delphi and some former employees also are individual defendants in numerous lawsuits alleging violations of federal and state securities laws and the Employee Retirement Income Security Act. Most of these cases have been consolidated before Judge Gerald Rosen of the U.S. District Court for the eastern district of Michigan.

Ford To Restate Earnings (DEN)

By David Shepardson, Detroit News Washington Bureau

Detroit News, October 24, 2006

Automaker says credit arm's faulty accounting will require recalculating numbers from 2001.

WASHINGTON -- Ford Motor Co. became the latest auto company to admit accounting mistakes Monday when it said it would restate earnings going back to 2001 because its credit arm incorrectly accounted for interest rate and currency derivative swaps.

Ford Motor Credit and many large companies -- especially banks -- use the financial instruments to hedge their bets against changes in currency values or swings in interest rates.

Ford said the restatement would materially improve 2002 results, but would have no effect on the company's cash position.

"Our overall hedging strategy is sound," Ford's Chief Financial Officer Don Leclair said in a conference call Monday as Ford released third-quarter financial results. "We will correct our accounting for these types of derivative instruments. We remain committed to strong internal controls and reporting transparency."

Merrill Lynch analyst John Murphy said in a note to clients Monday that "the restatements add to speculation" that Leclair may soon leave and be replaced by an executive picked by new Ford CEO Alan Mulally.

But Mulally supported Leclair in a written statement provided to The Detroit News.

"I'm absolutely delighted that Don is on the team," Mulally said. "His depth of knowledge of the company and the industry and his determination to help transform Ford Motor Company is extremely helpful to me and to our leadership team."

Many companies used a "shortcut method" to avoid regular review and reporting of the complex financial instruments, said Wesley Smyth, vice president and senior accounting analyst at Moody's Investors Service.

At the time Ford used the derivatives, the company believed it had followed all of the complicated rules related to the shortcut.

"We have reassessed the accounting for these swaps and have determined that they do not meet the requirements for the way we had previously accounted for them," Leclair said. The only way companies lose money is if they chose to terminate an instrument that no longer qualifies for hedge accounting, Moody's said in a March note.

Moody's "views the (earnings) restatements related to the shortcut method as technical misinterpretations of the accounting rule which do not alter the economic substance of the transactions," the note said.

Leclair said the errors were discovered during a routine review of Ford Credit's annual report with the SEC.

Ford will issue its restated earnings early next month when it files its third-quarter report with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Ford is not alone in making the accounting error. Since 2004, more than 100 companies have restated earnings because of problems with derivative accounting.

In March, Wynn Resorts Limited -- the Las Vegas casino concern -- restated earnings for 2003, 2004 and 2005 for the same reason as Ford. It improved the company's accumulated deficit by approximately $16.2 million and had no effect on cash flow.

Others restating earnings include Bank of America, Citizens Banking Corp. and First Bancorp.

Ford's derivative error comes as auto industry accounting practices are under SEC scrutiny.

In recent years, the SEC has intensely reviewed the accounting practices of several automakers and suppliers, including Delphi Corp., General Motors Corp. and Collins & Aikman, among others.

GM alone has been subpoenaed by the SEC in six separate investigations -- though two are aimed at industrywide practices.

In October 2004, the SEC sought information from GM, Ford and Delphi to determine whether the companies were properly accounting for retiree pension and health care obligations. In September 2005, the SEC subpoenaed DaimlerChrysler AG for records connected to pension obligations for its Chrysler unit.

Regulatory McCarthyism (WSJ)

By Jonathan Macey

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

Virtually every month sees some newly warmed-over argument to regulate the $1.2 trillion hedge fund industry. Having failed to stir up sufficient fear that hedge funds are ripping off their investors or are somehow harming the companies in which they invest, the latest complaint is that hedge funds pose a "systemic risk" to the financial markets.

Systemic risk is policy-speak for the danger that some event (such as the collapse of a large number of hedge funds) could spark a financial system breakdown that would include waves of bank failures, the collapse of the stock market, and general panic and chaos. The threat that some economic activity or other poses systemic risk is a favorite of regulators because a putative meltdown is not only a very scary prospect but difficult to disprove. So frightening is this vague notion that regulators are safe in suggesting that even the slightest threat should justify massive regulatory intervention. And better to regulate now, before it is too late, since we cannot know for sure whether a particular activity poses a systemic risk until the event occurs.

In the case of hedge funds, however, the very structure of the industry proves that they do not pose any systemic risk to the economy. Unlike the accounting and investment banking industries, the hedge fund industry is disaggregated and highly diverse. There are more than 10,000 hedge funds -- no two identical. Many, but not all, specialize in equity investments, others in debt and some in foreign exchange trading. Some hedge funds are entirely independent, while others are linked with various financial institutions, including investment banks and mutual funds. Some hedge funds are highly leveraged. Many invest in companies whose stock is heavily traded. Some specialize in owning stocks, others bet on financial downturns by selling short. Moreover, hedge funds, unlike private equity funds and commercial banks, tend to prefer investments with short-term time horizons, so that they have ready access to liquidity.

Precisely because of this enormous diversity, the investment strategies of hedge funds cannot pose systemic risk. From a societal perspective, the economy has a fully diversified portfolio of hedge funds. When some do well, others are bound to do poorly because their investments strategies are in no way correlated.

Cries about the threat of systemic risk from hedge funds first emerged in 1998. A large hedge fund, Long-Term Capital Management, suffered massive losses when the value of Russian debt took a nose dive. The latest uproar came just last month, when it was reported that Amaranth Advisors had lost almost $5 billion on risky investments in natural gas. In both cases, the financial markets continued to operate seamlessly, without a hint that any sort of systemic risk would actually manifest itself.

In addition to their diversity, the secrecy in which hedge funds are able to operate further ensures that such funds will not present systemic risk. Unlike investments by corporate insiders or mutual funds, because hedge funds are unregulated they need not disclose their investment choices to other investors. Some decry this lack of "transparency." However, the ability to operate without disclosure prevents copy-cat investments and other forms of "herding" behavior that might actually generate systemic risk.

The current light regulation, which includes the usual strict prohibition on insider trading, protects the valuable intellectual property interests that hedge funds have in the research that guides their portfolio selections. Thus, from an economic perspective, the absence of hedge-fund regulation both increases wealth by protecting property rights in information, and eliminates systemic risk by preventing other investors from rushing like lemmings to copy the investment strategies developed by hedge fund managers.

Further, unlike mutual funds and corporate insiders, hedge funds, because they are unregulated, can sell stock short, thereby profiting not only when they predict increases in share prices, but also when they are able to predict that shares will drop in value. This, in turn, reduces risk by contributing to the efficiency of the capital markets: The more efficient the markets, the more information we have about which firms are doing well and which are imploding.

Another major distinction between hedge funds and other institutional investors is that some hedge funds take active roles in corporate governance. Hedge funds agitate to remove underperforming CEOs of companies in which they invest. They lobby directors and management to streamline businesses and to return cash to shareholders. This leads me to believe that the big push to regulate hedge funds is done not only in ignorance, but also by vested interest groups who dislike the hedge fund managers' capacity to pressure management to perform. Ultimately, these accusations about systemic risk come from people have their own reasons for pushing for regulation. Bureaucrats seek to expand their own turf; corporate executives want to remain free of the oversight posed by hedge funds. Still, the irresponsible accusation that hedge funds pose a threat of systemic risk is a form of regulatory McCarthyism.

Hedge funds are already thoroughly regulated by market forces. Those that perform well for their investors will flourish. Those that perform poorly will whither. This is the best and only form of regulation that hedge funds require.

CRIMINAL LAW:

U.S. Prosecutors Targeting GOP Lawmakers (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, The Associated Press

AP, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Public corruption cases brought by Justice Department prosecutors in Washington are on the rise, fueled in part by investigations targeting Republican lawmakers in Congress.

With the Nov. 7 elections looming, prosecutors have moved forward on investigations of three GOP lawmakers in the last month alone. And several Justice Department officials privately hint that even more inquiries _ involving Republicans and Democrats alike _ may be under way.

"We can't look at what party someone is a member of in deciding whether or not to pursue an investigation," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told reporters last week, calling government corruption prosecution one of his top priorities. "We have to follow the evidence wherever it leads."

Gonzales said there is "no special emphasis" on those cases as the elections approach. But the Justice Department generally tries to keep a low profile on government corruption cases in the months before an election to avoid unfairly influencing voters.

Justice Department data show a 60 percent increase over the last five years in government corruption convictions and settlements by its Washington-based public integrity unit. Prosecutions resulted in 84 convictions and settlements in 2005, the data show, compared to 52 in 2001.

The aggressive pursuit of Republican lawmakers by Bush administration prosecutors is a sign of the independent streak of career attorneys inside the public integrity unit, said Paul F. Rothstein, a legal and government ethics professor at Georgetown Law School.

"A lot of them are nonpolitical _ they do have a taste for rooting out corruption and wrongdoing," Rothstein said. "There are some tensions coming from it. ... It's probably a very delicate and agonizing situation for the political appointees at the top" of the Justice Department.

Investigations by the public integrity unit at Justice headquarters in Washington make up only a sliver of public corruption cases prosecuted nationwide, most of which are handled by U.S. attorneys' offices. Last year, for example, federal prosecutors around the country charged 445 government officials, resulting in 390 convictions.

With only 29 attorneys, the public integrity unit in Washington is small when compared to the 450 government lawyers who prosecute criminal cases in the capital.

The unit's prosecutors generally lead or assist in high-profile corruption or national security cases, including inquiries involving members of Congress or the administration. According to its annual report, the unit had five open investigations _ all of them unidentified _ involving Congress at the end of last year.

The unit has seen an increase "in certain kinds of corruption that gets in newspapers," said one prosecutor who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the cases. "Any time you're investigating a member of Congress, it's going to get a lot of attention."

In the last month, the Justice Department has moved forward on inquiries involving two House Republicans: Reps. Mark Foley of Florida and Jim Kolbe of Arizona, both being investigated for possible improper or illegal sexual contact with teenage congressional pages. At the same time, prosecutors stepped up their investigation into whether Rep. Curt Weldon, a Pennsylvania Republican, steered $1 million in contracts to his daughter's lobbying firm.

All three men have denied the charges. Foley resigned shortly after the allegations surfaced, while Kolbe is retiring from the House.

Additionally, three other House Republicans and one GOP senator, as well as two House Democrats have been linked to ongoing Justice Department investigations over the last year. Two other House Republicans _ Reps. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California and Bob Ney of Ohio _ have pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

Experts say the spike in reported corruption cases is likely caused by one-party control of both the House and Senate. Investigations by the Republican-controlled House Ethics Committee, for example, ground to a near-standstill for more than a year because of partisan squabbles over staff and rules for its inquiries.

DOJ_NMG_0085658

"It's far worse than what we've seen for decades on Capitol Hill," said Craig Holman of the watchdog group Public Citizen. "We've got sex, we've got bribery, we've got lobbyist corruption, earmarking, money laundering. ... The people who are in power become very comfortable with their positions, and they don't think that they can get in trouble for stepping over the line."

Police Chiefs To Ask Bush For More Anticrime Funds (WSJ)

By MARK SCHOOFS And ROBERT BLOCK

Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

More than a dozen local police chiefs, many under pressure from their communities to control a rise in violence, are meeting with White House budget and policy officials tomorrow to advocate for emergency and long-term funding to fight crime.

The meeting reflects tension between police officials and the Bush administration as the federal government directs more attention -- and finances -- to terrorism prevention over traditional crime-fighting. Federal funding to fight crime has been slashed since 2001, while money for antiterrorism programs has soared.

Some homeland-security outlays, such as money to improve information-sharing among local, state and federal law-enforcement agencies, do help to fight crime. But the lion's share of antiterrorism funding goes to specialized equipment, such as $400,000 antibomb robots and preparation for catastrophic attacks.

"We don't need any more trucks and helicopters," says Timothy Dolan, Minneapolis police chief, echoing the comments of several chiefs who feel they are now sufficiently equipped to handle a terrorist attack but are losing their ability to fight street crime.

Police concerns reflect the complaints made by state emergency managers in the run-up to Hurricane Katrina last year. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the Federal Emergency Management Agency was required to expand its focus on terrorism while maintaining its mandate to cope with natural disasters -- but wasn't given enough resources to carry out both tasks. Until the 2005 storm, the complaints of emergency experts were largely dismissed by the administration.

Some police have made similar arguments at professional gatherings over the past several months. At a Policing Terrorism Conference in New York in August, 300 police chiefs complained to FBI officials and Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez about having to juggle terrorist-hunting needs with the competing demands of more traditional policing.

"Crime is something people in my community feel every day -- not terrorism," W.H. "Rickey" Ricks, the homeland-security chief for the Orange County Sheriff's Office in Orlando, Fla., told the conference. "We stand or fall as local law enforcement on how we are dealing with crime, not on how we are preparing to stop terrorists."

Chief Ricks's boss, Sheriff Kevin Beary, narrowly won re-election two years ago after his opponent accused him of spending too much time and money on counterterrorism and not enough on dealing with crime in the area.

The pressure on local police is rising because the crime rate is ticking up. Nationwide, 2.3% more violent crimes -- including 3.4% more homicides -- were committed in 2005 than in 2004, according to the Federal Bureau of Investigation's most recent annual analysis. More than 16,000 Americans died in criminal homicides last year. The violence varies from city to city: Chicago and Miami haven't had increases; in Boston, homicides have hit a 10-year high and in Cincinnati a 20-year high, according to local crime statistics analyzed by the Police Executive Research Forum, or PERF, a think tank. "We know we are on the front end of an epidemic of violence," said Chuck Wexler, executive director of PERF. Mr. Wexler says the chiefs will show White House officials the numbers "and say, 'We need help now.' "

The federal budget for fighting crime, which had soared beginning in 1994 when President Clinton and the Republican-led Congress passed legislation to add 100,000 police and to improve policing tactics, has dropped since 2001.

Few chiefs are willing to say that crime is rising because of federal cuts in funding. Many factors influence crime, and the majority of police funding comes from state and local governments.

The budget for the Justice Department's two main pots that fund local crime-fighting -- "State and Local Law Enforcement Assistance" and "Community Oriented Policing Services" -- fell to about $2.5 billion in fiscal year 2006, from about $4.4 billion in 2001, according to figures provided by the department. The White House budget proposal for next year would cut that figure even further, to about $1.5 billion, according to the department's figures. The president's proposal zeroes out an important funding stream: the Byrne Justice Assistance Grants, which were a favorite because they allowed local authorities to decide how to use them.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty says the cuts reflect the increased need to fund homeland security and military defense, and concerns about the budget deficit. According to the administration, the Byrne grants were zeroed out in the president's budget partly "because the crime rate continues to be at its lowest for many years." The administration's expectmore.gov Web site says the administration decided against requesting Byrne grants partly because they could be used for a variety of potential local law-enforcement activities rather than a clearly defined purpose -- exactly the flexibility chiefs say they need.

Mr. McNulty will be in charge of a new research effort, announced this month by Mr. Gonzales, to determine causes of the rise in violent crime in order to combat it. Mr. McNulty said the program, called the Initiative for Safer Communities, would examine 15 to 20 cities, including a few where crime hasn't increased, to see what tactics are working. Mr. McNulty said the program wouldn't require additional funds.

Neither Mr. McNulty nor the Office of Management and Budget would say what added funds might be made available.

House Panel Questions Hastert's Top Aide In Foley Case (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — House ethics committee members spent more than six hours Monday grilling the top aide to House Speaker Dennis Hastert as the panel continued its investigation into what Republican leaders did when warned about former representative Mark Foley's attentions to teenage congressional pages.

Scott Palmer, who has served as Hastert's chief of staff for more than 20 years, occupied the committee all afternoon. Hastert has said he knew nothing of concerns about Foley's sexual communications with pages — high school students who work as messengers for Congress — until the Florida Republican resigned Sept. 29.

Foley stepped down after being confronted with sexually explicit computer messages and inappropriate e-mails that he allegedly sent to some of the boys.

Kirk Fordham, Foley's former chief of staff, said he alerted Palmer several years ago to his concerns about Foley's friendships with pages. Fordham's lawyer, Timothy Heaphy, said Fordham's warnings could have come as early as 2002. Palmer has denied Fordham's account.

“What Kirk Fordham said did not happen,” Palmer said when the scandal broke.

Palmer's lawyer, Scott Fredericksen, said Palmer's testimony before the panel Monday was “consistent with the position he's taken all along.”

All four House members who are on the ethics subcommittee charged with pursuing the investigation were present for all or part of Palmer's appearance. Only two members are needed to take a sworn deposition, and the lawmakers have been taking turns interrogating witnesses.

On the panel are Chairman Doc Hastings, R-Wash., and Reps. Howard Berman, D-Calif., Judy Biggert, R-Ill., and Stephanie Tubbs Jones, D-Ill.

Hastert has defended his staff, but has said anyone who covered up information about Foley's misbehavior should be fired.

So far, these people have claimed they warned congressional leaders or their staff about Foley:

·Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., said he alerted Hastert's staff in 2000 or 2001.

·Fordham said he spoke with the speaker's office in 2002 or 2003.

·Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La., said he alerted the speaker's office last year and spoke to House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, and Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., again this spring.

·Boehner and Reynolds said they brought up Alexander's complaints with Hastert. The speaker said he does not remember the conversation, but does not dispute that it occurred.

After Alexander contacted Hastert's office last year about e-mails that Foley had sent a Louisiana page, Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., head of the House Page Board, and former House clerk Jeff Trandahl confronted Foley, who promised to stop.

Shimkus said he did not tell two other page board members, Reps. Dale Kildee, D-Mich., and Shelley Moore Capito, R-W.Va., because the parents of the Louisiana page wanted the matter kept private.

Sally Vastola, a longtime aide to Reynolds, appeared earlier Monday before the committee.

Other major witnesses who have testified include Boehner, Alexander, Fordham and Trandahl. Hastert, R-Ill., also is expected to testify.

Hastert Aide Testifies In Foley Case (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0085660

The House ethics committee questioned Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's chief of staff for more than six hours, trying to determine when Republican leaders were first alerted to concerns about Mark Foley's conduct with Congressional pages. The aide, Scott Palmer, declined to comment after emerging from the closed-door session shortly before 8:30 p.m. His lawyer, Scott L. Fredericksen, said Mr. Palmer's sworn testimony was "consistent with the position that he's taken all along." Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican resigned his seat in Congress last month after explicit e-mail he sent to former pages became public. A former aide to Mr. Foley has said he shared his concerns about his boss with Mr. Palmer at least three years ago, but Mr. Palmer has denied that account.

Palmer, Vastola Tell Their Sides (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, October 24, 2006

The four-member House ethics subcommittee looking into the activities of former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) heard testimony on Monday from Scott Palmer, chief of staff to Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), and Sally Vastola, a top aide to National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), even as the panel is scheduled to hear from Reynolds himself today.

Vastola, executive director of the NRCC, declined to comment following her three hours of testimony. She was accompanied by counsel, Robert Kelner of Covington & Burling, a specialist in election and political law.

At press time, Palmer was still being questioned by the committee after more than three hours of testimony. He made no comment to reporters as he entered the committee room and was accompanied by his attorney, Scott Fredericksen of Foley & Lardner LLP.

Reynolds is set to appear today and it is anticipated that two additional senior aides to Hastert will also appear this week, but Hastert's office has declined to announce the schedule. Mike Stokke, deputy chief of staff, and Ted Van Der Meid, staff counsel, are expected to provide key testimony in the investigation.

Two weeks out from Election Day, the timing of the investigation potentially is seen as most politically damaging for Reynolds, who is facing a tougher-than-expected re-election bid against Democratic candidate Jack Davis, who also tried to unseat Reynolds in 2004. Davis has now sought to make the Foley scandal a central point in the campaign, and Reynolds was forced to go on the air with a TV ad apologizing for the handling of the Foley incident.

Immediately following the Foley revelation, numerous polls showed Reynolds down in his district by as many as 15 points, but recent polls indicated that Reynolds has rebounded and is running closer to a statistical dead heat with Davis. The Republican National Committee has also directed funds to his district to bolster his re-election effort.

Reynolds' public statements have often been at odds with those of Hastert since Foley resigned on Sept. 29. Reynolds said he discussed the initial e-mail exchange with Hastert earlier this year, but Hastert maintains he does not recall such a conversation. That particular e-mail exchange was characterized only as "over-friendly" and was unrelated to a series of sexually explicit online communications that were first revealed last month. It did, however, prompt enough concern to cause officials to ask Foley to cease communication with the former page, at the request of the teenager's parents. The page was sponsored by Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), whose office first brought the e-mails to the attention of senior Hastert aides.

It also was reported shortly after the story broke that tensions were high between the Hastert and Reynolds camps as leadership offices sought to coordinate a timeline of events and a unified message on the Foley matter.

That effort was not particularly successful as Reynolds and Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) continued to offer conflicting accounts, as did Kirk Fordham, a now-resigned former top aide to Reynolds. Fordham testified before the ethics panel last week and stated publicly that he informed Palmer as early as 2003 of potentially inappropriate behavior from Foley toward male pages. Palmer denied the account in a online statement and has made no further public comments.

It is unclear if Hastert will be questioned by the ethics committee. Spokesman Ron Bonjean said the Speaker attended a fundraiser for Tennessee Republican David Davis, who is challenging Rep. Bart Gordon (D), on Monday, but said his schedule for the remainder of the week was not available.

Hastert Top Aide Testifies About Foley (AP-Y)

By Larry Margasak

AP, October 24, 2006

The House ethics committee Monday questioned Speaker Dennis Hastert's top aide, a crucial witness in determining whether Hastert's office knew at least three years ago of Rep. Mark Foley's come-ons to male pages.

The closed-door testimony by Hastert chief of staff Scott Palmer could help determine who is telling the truth about when the speaker's office learned of Foley's conduct. Hastert has said it was in the fall of 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0085661

The speaker has a lot riding on the outcome. He has fended off calls for his resignation with statements that his staff acted properly after the 2005 notification, and quickly had a lawmaker and the House chief clerk confront the Florida Republican.

Hastert said he didn't learn about Foley until late September, when the scandal became public and Foley resigned.

The speaker's timeline could be shattered if the committee believes former Foley chief of staff Kirk Fordham, who already has testified before the ethics panel. Fordham has said publicly that he told Palmer about Foley in 2002 or 2003, and subsequently learned that Palmer spoke with Foley on the subject.

"What Kirk Fordham said did not happen," Palmer said weeks ago in his lone public statement on the matter.

Hastert's version, issued as an internal report, said his staff learned in the fall of 2005 that Foley had sent overly friendly e-mails to a former Louisiana page. The report said the staff did not see the texts of the e-mails, which asked about the 16-year-old's birthday and requested a picture.

The report said the speaker's office contacted then-chief clerk Jeff Trandahl, who went to confront Foley with Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill. and chairman of the board that oversees the page program. They ordered Foley to immediately stop communicating with the youngster.

The report added that nobody in Hastert's office knew, until the messages became public, that Foley also had sent sexually explicit instant messages to other former pages.

Ironically, the internal report did not mention any role played by Palmer, despite his status as Hastert's top assistant.

The speaker has left himself one major escape route, publicly pledging to fire any of his staff members who were found to have covered up knowledge of Foley's conduct.

Hastert also has said he doesn't recall discussing Foley's conduct with Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., the House Republican campaign chairman; or Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, both of whom said they told Hastert about Foley earlier this year.

Boehner testified before the committee last week and Reynolds was expected to be questioned Tuesday.

Before Palmer testified, Reynolds' top political aide, Sally Vastola, appeared before the committee as it began a third week of closed-door testimony. Vastola is executive director of the National Republican Congressional Committee and a longtime top aide to Reynolds.

Vastola's testimony could touch on how Reynolds reacted when learning of problems with Foley's behavior toward pages and with whom Reynolds may have shared the information.

Testimony from Hastert's aides would go a long way toward wrapping up the interviews required for the panel to make its findings, though it's unclear whether the panel will have enough time to issue a report before Election Day.

The committee, evenly divided between the parties, could issue an interim report by Election Day.

For A Top Democrat, Further Climb Seems Out (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 23 — Representative Jane Harman has gained national prominence as the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, but even her supporters now concede that she is unlikely to become chairman if her party wins control of the House.

Standing in her way is another California lawmaker, Representative Nancy Pelosi, the Democrats' speaker-in-waiting, who would have the power to pick the leader of each committee. The relationship between the two has soured in recent years over political rivalries and policy disputes, and Congressional officials on both sides of the divide say Ms. Pelosi would most likely look elsewhere to fill the Intelligence Committee's top job.

"To say it is unlikely she will get the job is accurate," said one Democratic Congressional official with knowledge of the party's post-election plans.

The question of Ms. Harman's future reflects in part the struggles the Democrats have encountered in developing an identity on national security issues, which for years have been the party's Achilles' heel.

Ms. Harman, a moderate from Southern California, has been one of the party's most outspoken voices on national security matters since the Sept. 11 attacks. But she has also drawn sharp criticism from more liberal Democrats, including Ms. Pelosi, who have privately said that she has not sufficiently used her position to attack the Bush administration for its prewar intelligence failures on Iraq and for its use of secret programs like the domestic eavesdropping carried out without warrants by the National Security Agency.

Two candidates whom Ms. Pelosi is said to be considering for Intelligence Committee chairman are Representatives Alcee L. Hastings of Florida and Silvestre Reyes of Texas, both of whom currently serve on the panel.

The selection of Mr. Hastings, who is black, would help Ms. Pelosi shore up support from the powerful Congressional Black Caucus. But he has a checkered past, having been impeached and removed from a federal judgeship in 1989 on a bribery charge. Some Democrats fear that installing him in so sensitive a position would only invite Republican charges of weak Democratic leadership on national security matters.

Ms. Harman, first elected to Congress in 1992, served for six years until she relinquished her seat to run for California governor. After her defeat in that race, senior Congressional Democrats recruited her to run again in 2000 for her old House seat, promising that her seniority privileges would be restored if she won.

She was elected, and since 2003 has been the ranking member of the Intelligence Committee. Her supporters say she had assumed she would ascend to committee chairwoman if Democrats reclaimed the House, until news reports last year that Ms. Pelosi planned to install Mr. Hastings. Ms. Harman has lobbied intensely over the last year, enlisting outside interest groups and wealthy Democratic donors to help convince Ms. Pelosi that she would be the best candidate for the job.

Ms. Pelosi's allies say that she is infuriated by the lobbying effort and that the outside pressure has made her even less likely to consider Ms. Harman.

Ms. Harman's efforts to claim the post have even attracted the attention of investigators. Federal officials said Monday that she was the focus of a year-old F.B.I. inquiry related to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, or Aipac, a powerful pro-Israel lobbying group. The officials, confirming a Time magazine report, said the bureau had been looking into whether she had made improper promises to the group in exchange for its efforts to lobby Ms. Pelosi on her behalf.

But the officials also said that the accusations had not been proved and that although the inquiry remained open, it was no longer being actively pursued.

"Congresswoman Harman does not know what this is all about," said her lawyer, Theodore B. Olson. "She has no information from the government that she is under an investigation of any sort, and the idea that she should be investigated for being a supporter of Aipac is frightening."

Misdirected Vengeance (WP)

REP. JANE HARMAN (Calif.), the ranking Democrat on the House intelligence committee, took a step last week that she knew would be thermonuclear: Without the assent of the panel's chairman, Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), and in contravention of a previous understanding, she released an unclassified summary of a report about former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.). Later that day, in barely disguised retaliation, Mr. Hoekstra suspended a Democratic committee staff member's access to classified documents, ostensibly based on the flimsiest of suspicions that the aide had been involved in the leak of a separate, classified document.

Ms. Harman's unilateral strike violated the bipartisan basis on which the intelligence committees are meant, at least in theory, to operate. But that cannot justify Mr. Hoekstra's malicious and misdirected response, which tarnished a staff member's reputation and was not supported by any evidence. The issue involves the leak of the April 2006 National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism. The Democratic staffer, Laurence Hanauer, received a phone call from an aide to a committee member, Rep. John F. Tierney (D-Mass.), asking about the NIE; Mr. Tierney says he had gotten a call about the document from the New York Times. Mr. Hanauer looked for the document in the committee files and, not finding it, got a copy from the Office of the Director of National Intelligence. Four days later, the New York Times published a story about the NIE. "I cannot assume that this was mere coincidence," Mr. Hoekstra wrote in a letter to Ms. Harman.

But Mr. Hanauer denies any involvement in the leak; he submitted a sworn affidavit to this effect yesterday. He immediately told his bosses after the story was published that he had retrieved the document. The Times had been working on its story for weeks and said it had interviewed "a dozen United States government officials and outside experts" who had seen the report or drafts of it.

Mr. Hoekstra's real motive -- striking back at Ms. Harman -- was made clear later in the letter, when he linked the two releases of information. Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), the committee vice chairman who had lodged a complaint about Mr. Hanauer weeks before, said he made his letter public to retaliate against Ms. Harman. "If the ranking member wants to play politics," he told Fox News, "there are some of us on the other side that can play politics, and I'm not afraid to do it."

Not afraid, perhaps. But the depth to which he and Mr. Hoekstra are willing to sink in doing so is nothing to be proud of. They should let Mr. Hanauer do his job.

Crooked Builders Hit Storm Victims (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, October 24, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — Unlicensed contractors are preying on Gulf Coast residents whose homes were ravaged by Hurricane Katrina and are in dire need of repair, state and FBI officials say.

DOJ_NMG_0085663

“There's not enough skilled labor out there, and it's causing chaos,” says Charles Marceaux, executive director of the Louisiana State Licensing Board for Contractors.

Phony contractors are collecting down payments for work and then disappearing, Marceaux says. One scam involves workmen who take down payments and even drop materials off at work sites, only to return in the night to retrieve the materials and sneak away.

Marceaux said there are an estimated 20,000 licensed contractors in New Orleans alone. Getting an exact tally of how many unlicensed repairmen are operating is impossible, but he estimates that their number exceeds that of legitimate contractors.

Other crooked contractors have told homeowners that they had installed plumbing or electricity in their houses, even though they put nothing behind the walls, Marceaux says.

James Bernazzani, the FBI's special agent in charge in New Orleans, says the federal government will have jurisdiction in many cases because the money the contractors took often comes from federal rebuilding grants.

It's unusual for the FBI to get involved in cases involving relatively small amounts of money, Bernazzani says.

“Before the storm, the threshold for the FBI to take a fraud case was $1 million,” he says. “But we're assuming non-traditional roles down here, and we're trying to be a deterrent.”

The problem could get even worse. The vast majority of residents in Louisiana and Mississippi haven't received their share of $10.2 billion in federal rebuilding grants. Grants can be as high as $150,000. Hurricanes Katrina and Rita destroyed about 300,000 homes along the Gulf Coast.

The Louisiana attorney general's office says it is investigating more than 140 cases of contractor fraud. Many claims, however, are simply too small to be taken on. Under current statutes, a case needs to involve at least $7,500.

Marceaux and others are working to increase penalties. In Mississippi, where the attorney general's office is investigating 264 cases of fraud, a law passed in March reduces the minimum amount necessary for criminal action to $5,000 for a first offense and as low as $1,000 for a second offense.

Among the victims is June Collins, whose New Orleans home was hit by a tree during Katrina. She says a roofer insisted she needed a new roof, and charged her $7,000 to install it.

“There was no hole, and it was not leaking, but I was nervous and in a hurry to fix it,” she says. She later discovered she needed only a minor roof repair. And she found out that the roofer had installed cheaper shingles than those originally on the roof.

Collins, 65, tried to take her case to the attorney general but was turned away since it involved less than $7,500.

“I know it's a small amount of money, but when it's in your pocket, it's a lot,” she says.

Sheriff's Office Says Duncan Acted Alone (AP)

By Nicholas K. Geranios

AP, October 24, 2006

SPOKANE, Wash. - A man who pleaded guilty to murdering three people at a rural Coeur d'Alene, Idaho, home has given law enforcement officers enough information to confirm their conclusion that he acted alone, the Kootenai County, Idaho, sheriff's office said Monday.

Making good on last week's plea agreement with Kootenai County prosecutors, Joseph Edward Duncan III met Friday with investigators.

"In the interview, Duncan gave investigators detailed information that was consistent with the physical evidence that had been collected at the scene of the murders of Brenda and Slade Groene and Mark McKenzie," Sheriff Rocky Barker said in a statement.

Details of Duncan's interview will not be released until after the U.S. Justice Department concludes its case against him, Barker said. The federal government has said it intends to seek the death penalty against Duncan when it charges him in the abduction of two small children from the home and the slaying of one of them. Those charges have not been filed yet.

Kootenai County Prosecutor Bill Douglas and Duncan's public defender, John Adams, were not immediately available for comment Monday.

Last week, Duncan entered his pleas to the May 2005 murders and kidnappings of three people in the home, and also agreed to answer all questions from investigators about the state court case. Friday's interview was conducted as a result of that deal, which some victims' relatives have attacked as too beneficial to Duncan.

Rather than go to trial, the registered sex offender confessed to many of his crimes and agreed to give state and federal prosecutors two chances to win the death penalty against him because of his concern for the welfare of abduction victim Shasta Groene, now 9, Adams has said.

Duncan, 43, pleaded guilty to three counts of first-degree murder and three counts of first-degree kidnapping.

He was immediately sentenced by 1st District Judge Fred Gibler to life in prison without parole for the kidnappings. But the sentence on the murder counts will be deferred while the federal government brings its charges.

If federal prosecutors fail to win a conviction and death sentence in their case, Duncan will be returned to the state court, where a jury will be impaneled for a death penalty hearing, Douglas said.

Duncan, a native of Tacoma, Wash., has spent most of his adult life in Washington prisons. He was on the run from a child molestation charge in Minnesota when he drove past the Groene home on Interstate 90 east of Coeur d'Alene, spotting Shasta, then 8, and Dylan Groene, 9, playing outside.

He stalked the family for several days, then entered the home the night of May 16, 2005, and bound and fatally bludgeoned the children's mother, Brenda Groene; her fiance, Mark McKenzie; and Groene's 13-year-old son, Slade.

Court documents allege Duncan kidnapped the two youngest children and went into the mountains near St. Regis, Mont., where he sexually abused them for seven weeks before killing Dylan.

Shasta, the sole survivor of the carnage, was rescued when she and Duncan walked into a restaurant in Coeur d'Alene early on the morning of July 2, 2005. Duncan was quoted in court documents as saying he was trying to return the girl to her father.

All of the confessions made by Duncan can be used against him in the federal case.

Duncan is also considered the prime suspect in the slayings of two children near Seattle and one in Southern California in the 1990s.

The state deal became controversial immediately for two reasons: While it saved Shasta from having to testify against Duncan in state court, the girl may still have to face him in federal court.

Also, Duncan was not required to provide to law enforcement officers the password or key to his encrypted personal computer files, which are thought to contain evidence of his criminal activities. He was required to give the password only to a defense lawyer, who is not required to share the contents of the computers with law enforcement.

Meanwhile, Duncan arrived Monday at the Idaho Maximum Security Institution in Kuna. The Idaho Department of Correction transported Duncan under heavy security from the Kootenai County Jail, his home for the past year.

Two Plead Guilty In Coke Secrets Case (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

ATLANTA -- The two men accused of plotting with a secretary at Coca-Cola Co. to steal trade secrets from the beverage maker and trying to sell them to archrival PepsiCo Inc. each pleaded guilty Monday to one count of conspiracy.

Ibrahim Dimson and Edmund Duhaney entered their pleas in federal court as part of a deal with prosecutors. They both could face up to 10 years in prison and $250,000 fine when they're sentenced Jan. 29.

Former Coke secretary Joya Williams is still scheduled to stand trial starting the week of Nov. 13.

"She is absolutely not pleading," Ms. Williams's attorney, Janice Singer, said immediately after Messrs. Dimson and Duhaney's plea hearing.

During the hearing, Mr. Duhaney told the judge that Ms. Williams contacted him first and wanted to "make things happen," while Mr. Dimson testified that he then was contacted by Mr. Duhaney to try to broker a deal with Pepsi.

Ms. Williams and Messrs. Dimson and Duhaney were indicted July 11 on federal conspiracy charges. The three were accused of stealing new product samples and confidential documents from Atlanta-based Coca-Cola and trying to sell them to Pepsi, which is headquartered in Purchase, N.Y.

The alleged crime was foiled after Pepsi warned Coca-Cola.

The prosecution says a box containing two undisclosed Coca-Cola product samples and other confidential company documents was found in Mr. Duhaney's home during a search on July 5, the day all three were arrested and the same day a $1.5 million transaction was to occur. Documents were also found in Ms. Williams's home.

Coke has declined to reveal which product or products are linked to the samples.

Ms. Williams, who has since been fired as an administrative assistant for Coke's global brand director at its Atlanta headquarters, allegedly took the information from the company and gave it to Messrs. Dimson and Duhaney.

Two Plead Guilty Of Conspiring To Sell Coca-Cola Trade Secrets (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 24, 2006

Two menpleaded guilty in a US court to conspiring to steal and sell Coca-Cola Company trade secrets, the state attorney's office in Atlanta, Georgia said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0085665

Ibrahim Dimson, Edmund Duhaney and a former Coca-Cola employee, who has pleaded not guilty, were arrested in July on charges of selling secrets from the Atlanta-based company to soft drink arch-rival PepsiCo.

Each could receive a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and a fine of up to 250,000 dollars if found guilty.

Dimson and Duhaney admitted they had conspired with former Coca-Cola executive assistant Joya Williams to steal trade secrets and sell them.

The three were arrested after PepsiCo gave its rival a copy of a letter signed "Dirk" in which it was offered "very detailed and confidential information."

Phone records and investigations showed Williams was the alleged source of the information, the state attorney's office said in a statement.

The author of the letter provided an undercover agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) 14 pages of secret Coca-Cola documents, and requested 10,000 dollars in "good faith" money to provide further information. The company said the documents contained highly classified trade secrets.

"I can even provide actual products and packaging of certain products, that no eye has seen, outside of maybe five top execs," Williams allegedly wrote.

An FBI undercover agent met with Dimson, who was posing as "Dirk" in June.

Dimson gave the agent "a brown Armani Exchange bag containing one manila envelope with documents marked 'highly confidential' and one glass bottle with a white label containing a liquid product sample," the statement said.

The undercover agent paid "Dirk" 30,000 dollars and agreed to pay an additional 45,000 dollars after testing the sample.

On June 27, an undercover agent offered to buy the remaining trade secret items for 1.5 million dollars, and on that day Duhaney and Dimson opened a bank account to receive a wire transfer, officials said. The three suspects were arrested later in the day.

Officials said they had videotape from Coca-Cola allegedly showing Williams stuffing documents into bags, and placing what appeared to be a product sample in her personal bag.

Coca-Cola later verified the sample was genuine and is in fact a product being developed by the company, the Justice Department said.

Jury Deliberations Start In Journalist's Killing (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

A D.C. Superior Court jury yesterday began deliberations in the trial of a man accused of killing New York Times journalist David E. Rosenbaum.

Percey Jordan Jr., 42, is facing charges including felony murder, conspiracy and credit-card fraud stemming from the death of Mr. Rosenbaum, who was walking outside his home in Northwest Jan. 6 to cure a case of the hiccups when he was attacked and robbed. He died two days later from his injuries.

The 12-member predominantly white jury is made up entirely of women. The panel began deliberating at about 2:15 p.m., and was dismissed by Judge Erik P. Christian at 4:45 p.m. without reaching a verdict.

The trial largely has focused on the testimony of Mr. Jordan's cousin, Michael C. Hamlin, who has pleaded guilty to second-degree murder, robbery and conspiracy charges in the case.

Hamlin, 24, testified that the robbery was Mr. Jordan's idea and that Mr. Jordan struck Mr. Rosenbaum in the head with a hard, plastic pipe.

During closing arguments yesterday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Amanda Haines compared the evidence against Mr. Jordan to "bricks in a wall."

She said surveillance photos and credit-card statements show that Mr. Jordan and his cousin robbed Mr. Rosenbaum and later used his credit cards along with the stolen credit cards of a Silver Spring woman to purchase items at a gas station, drugstore and grocery store. Hamlin testified that he used Mr. Rosenbaum's cards while Mr. Jordan used the woman's cards.

"You have a solid wall of proof," Miss Haines told the jurors. "And the writing is now on the wall for Mr. Jordan."

Miss Haines also argued for the credibility of Hamlin's testimony, which defense lawyer Michael Starr said was selfishly motivated and made up to save himself from serving life in prison.

"They tried to give Michael Hamlin a makeover for this trial, but you can't buy it because it doesn't match up with his actions," Mr. Starr said.

Mr. Starr reminded jurors that Hamlin repeatedly lied to police after he turned himself in and argued that police led him to implicate his cousin in the slaying.

DOJ_NMG_0085666

He also attacked the credibility of prosecution witness John Snowden, a longtime friend of Mr. Jordan who is on parole. Snowden said Mr. Jordan mentioned the crime to him five days after the incident took place.

Mr. Starr said Snowden was motivated to tell the story to police by the possibility of getting reward money.

Deliberations are set to resume at 10 a.m. today.

Judge Allows Hinckley To Continue Visits (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

A federal judge yesterday permitted would-be presidential assassin John W. Hinckley Jr. to continue occasional overnight stays at his parents' house in Williamsburg.

However, U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman added that Hinckley's siblings may have to take on a greater role supervising him.

"Cutting them off for no good reason would not be therapeutic," Judge Friedman said of the visits.

Citing concerns about the health of Hinckley's parents, government attorneys had hoped to halt the visits until a hearing could be held on the issue. Hinckley's father is in his 80s and his mother just turned 80.

Hinckley, 51, has been a patient at St. Elizabeths Hospital since he was found not guilty by reason of insanity in the 1981 shooting of President Reagan. He said he shot Mr. Reagan to impress actress Jodie Foster.

At the hearing yesterday, Judge Friedman said he plans to revisit the issue of Hinckley's overnight stays once a government psychiatrist submits a written report on Hinckley. The report is expected next Tuesday.

Last year, the judge gave Hinckley the right to make overnight visits to his parents' house. Government attorneys have expressed concerns about the arrangement.

The U.S. Justice Department last month filed documents that said the physical condition of Hinckley's parents "has deteriorated considerably" and that hospital reports "reveal persistent tension within the Hinckley family stemming from this physical deterioration."

Judge Friedman said he may mandate that Hinckley's brother or sister be present during the visits, but won't make any decisions until reading the latest psychiatric report.

Hinckley attorney Barry Levine said his client ultimately should be reintegrated into society.

Mr. Levine argued that requiring Hinckley's brother or his sister to replace Hinckley's father in a custodial role would be difficult because the siblings do not live close to Williamsburg.

Mr. Levine plans to seek an expanded set of conditions for Hinckley, court records show. He declined to explain what additional freedoms Hinckley could receive, but said they would be "life-changing" for Hinckley.

St. Peters Mayor Resigns After Pleading Guilty To Accepting Bribe (KSDK)

KSDK-TV, October 24, 2006

(KSDK) - The City of St. Peters said Monday morning it received a resignation letter from Mayor Shawn Brown.

City administrator Bill Charnisky said he received a letter via FAX that said Brown's resignation was effective as of 10:45 a.m. Monday.

Bruce Holt, president of the St. Peters Board of Aldermen, will serve as acting mayor of St. Peters.

Brown pleaded guilty Friday to a felony charge of soliciting and accepting a bribe.

On August 18, Brown, 34, was indicted on charges of threatening to veto an ordinance authorizing the city to purchase digital red light and speeding enforcement systems from Redflex Traffic Systems, a Scottsdale, Ariz., company, unless the company paid him.

The indictment says the company presented its systems to St. Peters city officials in early 2006. On June 8, the St. Peters Aldermanic Board voted and passed an ordinance which authorized the company to provide traffic enforcements products to the city.

According to FBI Special Agent-in-Charge Roland Corvington, Redflex contacted authorities and aided them in their investigation.

As part of the investigation, Redflex delivered a check for $2,750 to Brown's home as part of the bribery. Neither Redflex representatives nor Brown's attorney would explain why Brown sought that exact amount.

Brown could face up to ten years in prison and/or a fine of $250,000 when he is setenced on January 11.

St. Peters Mayor Steps Down After Admitting Bribery (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, October 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0085667

ST. PETERS, Mo. - The mayor of the St. Louis suburb St. Peters resigned Monday after admitting in federal court last week that he solicited a bribe in exchange for guaranteeing passage of an ordinance to purchase a speeding enforcement system.

Shawn Brown, 34, submitted a letter of resignation to City Administrator Bill Charnisky on Monday, according to a statement from the city. The resignation was effective at 10:45 a.m., according to the statement.

Brown pleaded guilty Friday to a felony charge of soliciting and accepting a bribe. He could face up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine at sentencing Jan. 11.

Brown was indicted by a federal grand jury in August. He was accused of soliciting and accepting $2,750 from Redflex Traffic Systems Inc.

Brown, elected in 2004, was serving his first term in office. St. Peters, with 51,000 residents, is one of the largest suburban communities in the St. Louis area.

David Hayes, a longtime critic of Brown, told the St. Louis Post-Dispatch that the St. Peters Board of Aldermen would consider impeaching Brown this week if he did not resign.

According to the indictment, Brown threatened to veto an ordinance authorizing the purchase of Redflex's digital red light and speeding enforcement system unless the Scottsdale, Ariz.-based company paid him first.

Redflex officials went to the FBI and cooperated with the agency in delivering a check for $2,750 to Brown's home a week after the mayor signed the ordinance on June 16.

Brown has previously said the money was a campaign contribution.

St. Peters' Mayor Resigns Amidst Bribery Charges (SLBIZ)

St. Louis Business Journal, October 24, 2006

St. Peters Mayor Shawn Brown submitted his resignation Monday, three days after he entered a guilty plea to bribery charges.

In Brown's one-line faxed resignation letter to City Administrator Bill Charnisky, he said: "I, Shawn Brown, on this 23rd day of October at 10:45 a.m., submit my letter of resignation as mayor of St. Peters effective immediately."

Aldermanic President Bruce Holt will serve as interim mayor.

Brown, of 108 Golden Harvest Court in St. Peters, pleaded guilty Friday morning in federal court to one felony count of bribery; soliciting and accepting an improper payment from a prospective vendor to the city.

Brown, 34, was indicted in August on charges he threatening to veto an ordinance authorizing the city to purchase digital red light and speeding enforcement systems unless the vendor, Redflex, of Scottsdale, Ariz., paid him a bribe.

When Brown did not immediately resign his office after submitting his guilty plea, St. Charles County Prosecuting Attorney Jack Banas released a statement saying that he intended to immediately initiate procedures to seek the mayor's removal from office. The city's attorney, Randy Weber with the law firm of Hazelwood & Weber LLC in St. Charles, was advised of Banas' intentions, according to the statement.

Brothel Raids Lead To Arrests Of 10 Men (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, October 24, 2006

October 24, 2006 Ten men have been charged with running brothels in Memphis using prostitutes they enticed here from other states and countries, authorities said Monday.

The Hispanic men named in the 15-count federal indictment distributed business cards in the Memphis Latino community to advertise and provided cell phone numbers for the brothels, according to officials.

Those arrested are charged with money laundering, harboring illegal aliens and enticing women to engage in prostitution.

The allegations say the crimes have been ongoing here for more than two years.

The men, including four brothers, were arrested in a multi-agency raid Oct. 13 involving some 150 law-enforcement officers.

"This was a massive undertaking," said FBI Special Agent in Charge My Harrison.

The brothels were located in a half dozen houses or apartments in four locations around Memphis, including one in an apartment at 1717 Steve Way Drive near Sharpe Elementary School in the vicinity of Kimball and Getwell.

The others were at 1104 and 1108 N. Holmes near Jackson; 3685 N. Victory Heights and 3822 E. Victory Heights off Prescott between Winchester and Raines, and 574 E. Cadraca near Summer and Perkins.

After paying $30 in advance for 15 minutes of activity with the prostitute, customers were given a poker chip or bead to give the prostitute to signify that payment had been made.

U.S. Atty. David Kustoff said the prostitutes mostly were illegal aliens from New York, Illinois, Georgia, Mexico, the Dominican Republic and Colombia.

He said the women are being processed administratively by immigration but are not named in the criminal indictment.

Kustoff declined to comment on how many women were involved or how much money the enterprise had generated.

The defendants, many of whom are related, include Raul Santillan-Leon, Raymundo Flores, Fernando Reyes-Santillan, Ramiro Sanchez-Garcia, Cristobal Flores, Diego Cortes-Barrientos, Rafael Cortes-Barrientos, Eliseo Cortes-Barrientos, Rodolfo Cortes-Barrientos and Martin Moreno.

The defendants are in federal custody and will make an initial court appearance today.

The investigation included U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Memphis police and the FBI.

Robbers Execute Huge N.E. Philly Bank Robbery (KYW)

KYW-TV, October 24, 2006

(CBS 3) PHILADELPHIA The FBI is investigating a brazen heist in Northeast Philadelphia that is being called one of the biggest bank robberies in the area in years.

Authorities said at least two individuals robbed the PNC Bank located at 11830 Bustleton Avenue in the city's Somerton section early Monday morning.

The early morning 'take over' robbery occurred as the first bank employee arrived at the bank.

The two men, wearing masks and carrying guns, forced their way into the bank as the employee opened the branch.

The first teller was made to open the door for other bank employees as they arrived for work.

During the robbery, the subjects appeared to be communicating with others outside the bank.

The robbers repeatedly warned and threatened the bank employees to fully cooperate and not to activate any alarms.

The suspects were in the bank for 35 minutes, emptying the vault, teller drawers and ATM machines before locking the employees in the vault. There were no injuries.

The substantial, but undisclosed bank loss, is believed to be the largest loss in recent history stolen during a bank robbery.

Anyone with information regarding this robbery should contact the FBI at (215) 418-4000.

Huge Local Bank Robbery Reported (WCAU)

WCAU-TV, October 24, 2006

PHILADELPHIA -- Surveillance Video | Images The FBI is looking for at least two men responsible for what it calls the biggest local bank robbery in recent history.

"The substantial, but undisclosed bank loss is believed to be the largest loss in recent history stolen during a bank robbery," said Jerri Williams, a Special Agent for the bureau's Philadelphia division.

Williams said on Monday afternoon that the robbers hit the PNC Bank on Bustleton Avenue as employees arrived for work on Monday morning.

After taking the first employee at work captive, the robbers held the woman inside the bank as other employees arrived.

Once all the employees were rounded up and held captive, the robbers emptied the entire bank and were in communication with others, the FBI said.

"The robbers were able to empty out the vault, all teller drawers and two ATM machines, before locking all the employees in the bank vault and exiting from the bank," Williams said.

The robbery took about 35 minutes and the robbers left as the bank opened for business at 9 a.m.

But before they left, they locked the employees in the vault.

The two men were dressed in dark hooded sweatshirts and their faces were covered by ski masks.

The two robbers were further described as a Black male and a Hispanic or Black male with a light complexion.

Anyone with information regarding this robbery should contact the FBI at (215) 418-4000.

Bank Heist May Be One Of Philly's Biggest (WPIV)

By Erin O'Hearn And Bob Monek

WPVI-TV, October 24, 2006

"Substantial" Amount of Cash Stolen

SOMERTON - October 23, 2006 - It's being called one of the biggest bank robberies in recent history. At least two bandits pulled off the heist early Monday morning.

The robbery unfolded at the PNC Bank at 11830 Bustleton Avenue shortly after 8:00 a.m.

Authorities described the robbery as a "take over," in which the first employee to arrive at the bank was accosted by two gunmen. They forced their way into the bank.

PNC bank surveillance video shows a masked man forcing several employees into the bank vault. It is one snapshot of a half hour ordeal officials say is Philadelphia's biggest bank heist in at least five or six years.

FBI spokesperson Jerri Williams says the ease at which this robbery was executed indicates the suspects may have staked out the bank for a while, knowing who the employees were and when they arrived at work. "It was well done. They were in there for a total of 35 minutes, which is unheard of," said Williams.

The suspects were armed with silver handguns, dressed in dark-hooded sweatshirts and ski masks.

According to investigators, the bandits made the first employee open the door for other workers as they arrived. The suspects appeared to be communicating with others outside the bank.

The robbers repeatedly warned and threatened the bank employees to fully cooperate, threatening to shoot the employees if anyone activated the alarms.

The bandits emptied the vault, every teller drawer and two ATM machines.

"We're not disclosing the amount but I can tell you it's the largest loss that has occurred," said Williams. "Pretty substantial."

But Action News does know that last year a lone robber took $250,000 from a Nova Savings bank in Center City. Sources tell us the amount taken from the PNC bank was significantly larger.

Before they fled, the robbers locked all of the employees in the vault.

Anyone with information regarding this robbery is asked to contact the FBI at (215) 418-4000.

Organized Robbers Hit Phila. Bank (PHI)

By Stephanie L. Arnold

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 24, 2006

Two men took employees hostage at gunpoint early yesterday in what FBI officials called the biggest bank robbery in Philadelphia in recent history.

FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said that although she could not reveal how much money was taken, it was well over the $250,000 taken in another substantial bank heist two years ago.

Officials said the robbery began shortly after 8 a.m., when two suspects, described as a black male and a Hispanic or black male in dark-hooded sweatshirts and ski masks and carrying silver handguns, rushed a female employee outside the PNC bank at 1180 Bustleton Avenue in the city's Northeast section as she was arriving for work.

Police said the teller was made to open the door for other bank employees as they arrived for work. Williams said that during the robbery the men used hand-held radios to communicate with associates outside the bank.

Williams said the robbers emptied the vault, all teller drawers and two ATM machines before locking about a dozen employees in the vault and leaving the bank.

Williams said the robbery's execution was unusual.

"I can say that the majority of robberies that occur are demand-note robberies by desperate people," Williams said. "They are usually not well planned and definitely not well executed. They took time and thought and this was not a robbery that was based on a desperate need for cash. This was a deliberate, planned robbery."

FBI officials say anyone with information regarding the robbery should contact the FBI at 215-418-4000.

2 Bandits Get Thousands In PNC Bank Heist (PHDN)

By Simone Weichselbaum

Philadelphia Daily News, October 24, 2006

Walkie-talkies, unsuspecting employees, armed and masked thugs and an open vault were the components of one of the biggest bank heists in Philadelphia's recent history yesterday.

Two bandits - wearing dark-hooded sweatshirts and ski masks and armed with silver handguns - made off with as much as $400,000 from the PNC Bank on Bustleton Avenue near Somerton in the Far Northeast, law-enforcement sources said.

The duo stole the cash from the bank's vault, cleaned out all the teller drawers and two ATM machines, agents said.

They locked the frightened employees in the vault and fled.

"It appeared to be a well-planned and executed robbery, and a horrific and terrifying experience for the bank employees," said FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams.

The employees escaped by unlocking the vault from the inside. No one was hurt during the 35-minute morning "takeover," Williams said.

DOJ_NMG_0085670

The gunmen were still on the lam last night.

The drama began shortly after 8 a.m. when a woman employee inside the bank walked to the front door to unlock it, Williams said.

The robbers pushed their way inside and told the worker to continue to unlock the door for other arriving employees as she normally would, Williams said.

During the heist, the bandits spoke into walkie-talkies, possibly to others watching outside the bank, Williams said.

"That is rare," Williams said of the use of the devices in a holdup.

The pair told the employees not to activate any alarms.

Once they were finished collecting the cash, they ushered the workers into the vault.

The bandits left the bank at 8:47 a.m., Williams said.

After the employees got out of the vault, they called 911, Williams said.

Anyone with information on the incident is asked to call the FBI at 215- 418-4000.

FBI: North Texas Bank Heists Rise 'astronomical' (WFAA)

By Jim Douglas

WFAA-TV, October 24, 2006

As yet another Dallas bank was targeted in a robbery Monday, the FBI has called the number of North Texas banks heisted this year "astronomical."

The Professional Bank in the Lakewood area of Dallas was hit early Monday afternoon. Investigators think the bandit who robbed the bank on Abrams has hit three or four others as well, which might be enough for him to get his own catchy nickname soon.

However, Dallas isn't alone, Fort Worth robberies have almost doubled compared to last year.

"We've never seen a spike in bank robberies to this level," said John Skillestad, FBI supervisor.

Police recently caught three men, the T-shirt bandit, envelope bandit and the backpack bandit, which were all suspected of hitting about 50 banks between the trio of them.

"Overall, numbers are way beyond what we've ever had here in Dallas," Skillestad said.

At this time last year, Dallas County had 35 bank robberies, but the number has more than tripled to 110 this year.

Tarrant County had 30 bank robberies compared to 57 this year. Plano jumped almost 50 percent from 12 to 18.

As for the whole North Texas area, the number jumped from 94 last year to 205 this year.

Dozens of robbers remain on the loose.

"I'm thinking another 40 to 50 people," Skillestad said.

One robber foiled his own heist when he got too greedy and went for one more wad of bills.

"He looked over the counter, saw there was a stack of money in the till [and] told her to give him that stack as well," Skillestad said.

It was that stack that contained a red dye pack that exploded on the robber seconds later.

Agents believe drugs, like meth, are driving the increase. They also said they expect the trend to increase as time heads into the holidays.

But Skillestad said repeat offenders still on the loose are most likely looking to a fate behind bars soon enough.

"An average bank robber does two or three robberies before he or she gets caught," he said.

Hackers Zero In On Online Stock Accounts (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Hackers have been breaking into customer accounts at large online brokerages in the United States and making unauthorized trades worth millions of dollars as part of a fast-growing new form of online fraud under investigation by federal authorities.

E-Trade Financial Corp., the nation's fourth-largest online broker, said last week that "concerted rings" in Eastern Europe and Thailand caused their customers $18 million in losses in the third quarter alone.

Another company, TD Ameritrade, the third-largest online broker, also has suffered losses from customer account fraud, but a spokeswoman declined to quantify the amount yesterday. "It is an industry problem," spokeswoman Katrina Becker said. "It does continue to grow."

Federal regulators cited recent cases in which hackers gained access to customer accounts at several large online brokers and used the customers' funds to buy certain stocks. The hackers appeared to be trying to drive up share prices so they could sell those stocks at a profit, regulators said.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and the FBI are looking into E-Trade's cases, chief executive Mitchell H. Caplan said in an earnings conference call with reporters last week. Spokesmen for the SEC and FBI declined to discuss details of those cases.

Both E-Trade and TD Ameritrade have guaranteed that they will cover their clients' losses, even though they are not required to do so by law. But the problem is growing faster than public awareness of it, federal regulators said, noting that the fraud is fed by the rising use of the Internet for personal finance and the easy availability of snooping software that allows hackers to steal personal account information.

"Although these schemes cleverly combine aspects of securities fraud, identity theft and hacking, what they really boil down to is outright thievery," said John Reed Stark, chief of the Office of Internet Enforcement at the SEC. "In the last couple of months we have seen a marked increase in online brokerage account intrusions."

More than 10 million people have bought or sold investments online in the United States in the last few months, according to Avivah Litan, a securities analyst for the Stamford, Conn.-based Gartner Inc.

The scams typically begin with a hacker obtaining customer passwords and user names, experts said. One way is by placing keystroke-monitoring software on any public computer in a library, hotel business center or airport. With the software, all keystrokes entered on the computer can be recorded and e-mailed anywhere in the world.

Experts said all hackers have to do is wait until anyone types in the Web address of E-Trade, Ameritrade or another online broker, and then watch the next several dozen keystrokes, which are likely to include someone's password and login name.

These emerging Internet stock schemes appear to be new versions of the widely used "pump-and-dump" e-mail scams, in which spammers send out mass e-mails containing bogus news alerts intended to manipulate stock prices.

Stark said perpetrators are breaking into customer accounts and buying shares of thinly traded, microcap securities, also known as penny stocks. The hacker gains access using the customer's user name and password, then liquidates that person's existing stock holdings and uses the proceeds to buy shares in the microcap. The goal, regulators said, is to boost the price of a stock the hacker has already bought at a lower price in another account. The hacker then liquidates the stock and wires the money either to an offshore account or through a series of straw men, or dummy corporations, Stark said. The straw man may not know he is participating in fraud; he may have been told he is helping, say, an offshore business.

The entire operation can take a matter of minutes, or at most, hours.

"The unwitting victim opens the account in the morning and finds he or she owns thousands of shares in a microcap company that they have never heard of," Stark said.

Caplan said E-Trade recently made operational changes and added technology to thwart the criminals. "We've seen that level of fraud in the last three weeks or so reduced to almost zero . . . ," he said in the conference call.

Glen Mathison, a spokesman for Charles Schwab Corp., the largest online broker, said losses due to online identity theft and fraud have not reached "a material level" that would require disclosure to investors. But he added that Schwab also guarantees to reimburse clients for online losses caused by fraud.

Unlike banks, brokerage accounts are not protected by Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. and other federal banking rules that ensure consumers get their money back, so the consumer must rely on the company to cover any losses.

Ameritrade's Becker said the company advises clients to make sure they have good spyware detection software on their computers. Ameritrade's Web site also offers clients free software that helps detect or eliminate snooping programs.

In Canada, the Investment Dealers Association, the self-regulatory arm of Canada's securities industry, is looking into similar scams.

Online financial fraud has grown so serious that the Federal Financial Institutions Examination Council, a government entity that establishes standards for banks, has given U.S. financial institutions until Dec. 31 to tighten security measures for accessing online accounts.

"This thing is so widespread and it has such a significant impact on the industry at large . . . that I think you're going to end up seeing structural changes in the industry," Caplan said.

Feds Probe Hub City's Housing Program (EBHNT)

By Richard Khavkine

East Brunswick (NJ) Home News Tribune, October 24, 2006

NEW BRUNSWICK — The investigation into the city's housing rehabilitation programs has reached the federal level.

DOJ_NMG_0085672

City police investigators have turned over documents detailing agreements and contracts between the city and contractors to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Newark. U.S. Department Housing and Urban Development dollars fund some of New Brunswick's housing-rehab programs.

City spokesman Bill Bray had no comment on whether city officials turned over the documents voluntarily or were compelled to do so. Bray, citing the ongoing nature of the multipronged probe, also would not say when the documents were turned over to federal investigators.

Officials at the U.S. Justice Department, which oversees the U.S. Attorney's Office, could not be reached for comment yesterday. An agent at HUD's Office of the Inspector General said she could not confirm nor deny that agency's involvement in the investigation.

In recent weeks, some city employees have been put on paid administrative leave as a result of the city's investigation and a large part of the rehab home projects have been put on hold.

No additional personnel have been placed on leave since then, Bray said.

The city has so far declined to say how many employees are on leave, identify them or specify which department they work in.

But the rehab programs are run out of the city's Department of Planning, Community and Economic Development and efforts in recent weeks to reach William H. Walker, the director of the rehab programs, and Richard P. Kaplan, the programs' construction inspector, have been unsuccessful. And a person answering the telephone at the city agency earlier this month said they would not be in the office "any time soon."

Program Coordinator Maria Angela Torres, who also was said to be out the office, and two other employees also work in the rehab office.

The rehab programs provide grants and loans of up to $20,000 for qualified residents to upgrade city homes in need of repair, on anything from roofs and gutters to furnaces and sidewalks. After a bidding process, a homeowner is asked to choose a contractor from among as many as five competing bidders. Eight area contractors comprise the rehab program's bidder's list.

The city's HOME program, funded by federal dollars with a budget last year of $242,000, financed repairs to 12 units for residents of moderate or low incomes, said Bray.

Man Awarded $1.1 Million Over BTK Report (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

WICHITA -- A jury has ordered a Wichita television station and its news director to pay a man $1.1 million for naming him two years ago as a possible suspect in the BTK serial killings.

Roger Valadez had sought as much as $2 million from Emmis Communications, then-owner of KSNW-TV, and News Director Todd Spessard for the station's coverage of Valadez's arrest on Dec. 1, 2004.

The jury found Friday that KSNW and Spessard defamed Valadez when the station used his name after his home was raided.

"We are pleased," Valadez said after the trial. "The jury found that it was wrong."

BTK -- a self-coined nickname that stands for "bind, torture, kill" -- terrorized Wichita in the 1970s, taunting authorities with anonymous letters, and then resurfaced with new messages in 2004.

The case was finally cracked in late February 2005 with the arrest of Dennis L. Rader, who eventually pleaded guilty to killing 10 people between 1974 and 1991.

Less than three months before Rader's arrest, Valadez had come to the attention of the BTK task force. Police raided his home and took a DNA sample from his mouth.

But Valadez was never charged in connection with the slayings. He was arrested on minor outstanding warrants and released the next day, and his attorney said he was quickly ruled out as a BTK suspect.

In his closing arguments Friday, KSNW lawyer Bernard Rhodes pointed to evidence that he said showed that police considered Valadez a suspect in the BTK killings at the time.

"I am sorry Roger Valadez was a suspect, but the fact is that he was," Rhodes said.

Rhodes said he would appeal the verdict, calling it the "wrong verdict based upon the wrong law."

Police Probe Dumping Of Homeless By L.A. Hospital (LAT)

By Richard Winton And Cara Mia Dimassa, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0085673

The LAPD has opened its first criminal investigation into the dumping of homeless people after documenting five cases Sunday in which ambulances dropped off on skid row patients recently discharged from a South Los Angeles hospital. All of the patients told police they did not want to be taken downtown.

LAPD officials, who photographed and videotaped the five alleged dumping cases, called it a major break in their yearlong effort to reduce the number of people left on skid row by hospitals, police departments and other institutions.

Though police have documented other cases of hospitals dropping off recently discharged patients in the district, "this is the most blatant effort yet by a hospital to dump their patients on skid row against their will," LAPD Capt. Andrew Smith said.

Officials at Los Angeles Metropolitan Medical Center strongly denied that they had improperly handled the patients.

Dumping has emerged as a major political issue in Los Angeles, with Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and other critics saying that the practice exacerbates the ills of a district that already has the largest concentration of homeless people in the West.

Police said they were investigating whether the patients were falsely imprisoned during their transfer and also whether the hospital violated any laws regarding the treatment of patients. The state Legislature recently passed a law aimed at cutting down on dumping across city boundaries, but it won't take effect until January.

Sunday's investigation began about noon, when a Los Angeles Police Department sergeant saw a patient being left in front of the Volunteers of America homeless services center on San Julian Street. He immediately called an LAPD videographer, who over the next few hours recorded four more ambulances arriving at the facility and leaving patients who had been discharged from Los Angeles Metropolitan.

Police also recorded interviews with the patients as well as with James Frailey, a 30-year-old attendant with ProCare, a private ambulance company.

Frailey told police that the hospital had hired his company "on a regular basis" to move discharged patients from the medical center to skid row and that other private ambulance companies also taken patients to the area. He said the hospital appeared to have made "no prior arrangements" for the patient he transported Sunday, according to police records.

One patient the LAPD interviewed on videotape, 62-year-old Marcus Joe Licon, told officers that he "never wanted to go" to skid row and asked that he be dropped off at his son's house. According to LAPD records, Licon said he was at the hospital because of problems with his knee and was released after they gave him "some painkillers and some medication."

John V. Fenton, president and chief executive of Los Angeles Metropolitan Medical Center, denied that his hospital had dumped patients.

Rather, he said, three of the five patients had arrived at the hospital from Volunteers of America or the nearly Lamp Community center. They gave San Julian Street addresses on their admission information, he said.

The other two, he said, had "requested to go to either another skid row facility center or Volunteers of America."

Calling ahead, Fenton said, would not have made a difference because such facilities don't take reservations.

"Why would we go there? With all of the issues, why would we send someone there who did not ask to go there? It is illogical," he said. "We don't just send people back to the streets. It's not what we are about."

But officials at Lamp and Volunteers of America said Monday that they had no record of any of the five patients having been at their facilities either before or after they were dropped off on skid row Sunday.

Moreover, the LAPD said, all five patients had stated in their interviews that they did not want to be left on skid row.

When told of the hospital's explanation, Volunteers of America's Los Angeles group director of homeless services, Jim Howat, said he was baffled.

"Somebody's wires got crossed. It doesn't really make sense to me," he said. "I don't know of anybody [at the center] that has worked with Metropolitan hospital.... We don't have case managers on duty [on Sundays]. It is not a time when we are well-equipped to accept anybody."

Though this is the LAPD's first criminal investigation of dumping, the Los Angeles city attorney's office said it was reviewing other dumping cases against some Los Angeles hospitals to determine whether civil or criminal charges could be filed.

The office also is considering asking a judge for a consent decree involving local hospitals that would establish sanctions for dumping patients.

There is no law against sending patients to skid row after they have been discharged. But the city attorney is looking at whether hospitals that engage in dumping could be penalized for violating the federal Emergency Medical Transfer and Active Labor Act, which requires medical facilities to screen and stabilize all patients and penalizes them for releasing or transferring patients who are medically unstable.

The city attorney also is examining whether hospitals that dump homeless patients can be cited for violating a state law that deals with unfair business practices. The law allows a corporation to be sued for unscrupulous behavior and has been used in the past to prosecute slumlords.

Jeff Isaacs, chief of the criminal division of the city attorney's office, said hospitals also could face more serious criminal charges if they were found to have forced people to go to skid row.

"If these people are being taken against their will, we are talking about false imprisonment and in some cases elder abuse," Isaacs said.

Shannon Jones, director of patient care at Metropolitan, said that all the patients sent to Volunteers of America on Sunday chose to go there and "were discharged in perfect health."

"We certainly were not dumping patients, nor were these patients being mistreated or placed out into the street," she said. "They didn't have any family that they had mentioned or that was involved in these particular cases."

The LAPD told a different story.

Smith said officers took Licon to his family's home, where his niece told them that she was not notified of his release and didn't understand why he had been taken to Volunteers of America.

Another patient, Johny Williams, 60, told police that he wanted to be taken to a Pasadena convalescent home.

The ambulance driver said he would instead take Williams to skid row, the Pasadena man told police in a videotaped interview. "This is where they dumped me off at."

Williams eventually was taken to Pasadena by a downtown pastor.

CIVIL LAW:

Medco Settles Federal Fraud Claims For $155 Million (PHI)

By Jane M. Von Bergen

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 24, 2006

Complaints from two whistle-blowing pharmacists from Las Vegas in 1999 led to a $155 million settlement today of federal fraud claims by the nation's largest mail-order pharmacy business.

Medco Health Solutions Inc. had been accused of destroying and canceling prescriptions, soliciting kickbacks from pharmaceutical companies to favor their drugs, and paying kickbacks to health plans to obtain business.

The settlement, announced by the U.S. Attorney's Office in Philadelphia, also covers a second investigation into how the Franklin Lakes, N.J., company submitted claims to the Medicare program on behalf of its clients.

Pharmacy-benefits-management companies act as middlemen between pharmaceutical companies and health-care plans to negotiate lower drug costs. The U.S. Justice Department has been investigating conflicts of interest in the business for years.

Medco did not admit to any wrongdoing as part of the settlement.

"After nearly seven years of inquiry, these issues end as they began - with no finding of wrongdoing by Medco or any of its people," the company said in a statement. "Our business practices today are widely regarded as setting the standard for our industry."

The settlement requires the company to provide more transparency in its dealings with drug companies and with the government.

That will ultimately benefit the consumer, said James G. Sheehan, the associate U.S. attorney who handled the case.

"When you open your prescription bottle, you should know what's inside," Sheehan said. "What's inside should be what's on the label and in the same quantity. If it is a different drug, you should know it before you open the bottle."

The settlement primarily deals with conduct between 1998 and 2004. In the 1990s, the two whistle-blowing pharmacists, who remain in practice, were working out of Medco's Las Vegas facility when they noticed irregularities in how prescriptions were filled. The irregularities were occurring because of pressure to meet contract-specified deadlines.

"I think they are relieved that it's over," said Marc S. Raspanti, the Philadelphia lawyer who represented the two former Medco pharmacists, George Bradford Hunt and Walter W. Gauger.

"They felt some of the practices, and pressures, and some of the automation was being done to the detriment of the patient," Raspanti said. They are gratified by changes that the process brought to the pharmacy-benefits-management business, he said.

The men and their lawyer will get $20.16 million of the $155 million settlement. Other whistle-blowers include a doctor from northern New Jersey, Joseph Piacentile, and another former Medco employee, Karl S. Schumann. Each will receive payments as part of the settlement.

Medco, with 58 million customers, had a profit of $602 million last year on sales of $37.9 billion.

Medco Will Pay $155 Million In U.S. Kickback Case (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, October 24, 2006

Oct. 23 (Bloomberg) -- Medco Health Solutions Inc., the biggest U.S. manager of employee prescription drug benefits, agreed to pay $155 million to settle U.S. allegations it accepted kickbacks from pharmaceutical manufacturers and submitted false claims to the government.

The settlement, announced by the Justice Department in Washington, resolves two civil cases and an investigation by the U.S. attorney's office in Philadelphia. The government also accused Medco of paying kickbacks to health plans to help it obtain business.

``Millions of federal employees and Medicare beneficiaries rely on pharmacy benefit managers for their prescription drugs," said Peter Keisler, head of the civil division at the Justice Department, in a statement. ``Hidden financial agreements with drug manufacturers and health plans can influence which drugs patients receive, the price we all pay for drugs and whether pharmacists serve patients with their undivided professional judgment."

Medco, based in Franklin Lakes, New Jersey, said in May it agreed to a tentative deal with the government.

Today's action ``puts things behind us," said Soraya Balzac, a Medco spokeswoman. As part of the agreement, there were no findings of wrongdoing against the company, she added.

Medco manages prescription drug benefits for over 60 million Americans, the Justice Department said. The government complaint alleged that Medco submitted inflated bills for mail-order prescription drug services it provided.

The company also canceled valid prescriptions it couldn't fill on time to avoid paying penalties under its contract and shorted the number of pills it provided, the government complaint said. The company was also accused of sending out drugs other than those prescribed by a physician in order to earn undisclosed rebates from drug manufacturers.

The settlement is the fourth-largest in a health care false claims act case in 2006, according to Taxpayers Against Fraud, a Washington-based group that tracks such suits. The largest, for $900 million, was with Tenet Healthcare Corp.

Medco Settles Charges For $155 Million (UPI)

United Press International, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 23 (UPI) -- Medco Health Solutions has agreed to settle kickback charges by paying $155 million plus interest, the U.S. Justice Department said Monday.

The Parsippany, N.J., company submitted false claims to the government, solicited and accepted kickbacks from pharmaceutical manufacturers to favor their drugs and paid kickbacks to health plans to obtain business, federal prosecutors said. Medco, the nation's second largest pharmacy benefit management company, manages the prescription drug benefits of over 60 million U.S. residents, including millions of Medicare beneficiaries.

Prosecutors said Medco submitted false claims for mail order prescription drug services it was required by contract to provide to millions of federal employees, retirees and their families under the Federal Employee Health Benefits Program.

"Millions of federal employees and Medicare beneficiaries rely on pharmacy benefit managers for their prescription drugs," said Peter D. Keisler, a top Justice Department official.

"Hidden financial agreements with drug manufacturers and health plans can influence which drugs patients receive, the price we all pay for drugs, and whether pharmacists serve patients with their undivided professional judgment."

Government Defends 1998 Anti-Porn Law (AP)

By Maryclaire Dale, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 24, 2006

PHILADELPHIA (AP) -- Eight years after Congress passed a law aimed at protecting children from online pornography, free speech advocates and Web site publishers argued in federal court Monday that the never-enforced measure is fatally flawed.

Salon.com, Nerve.com and other plaintiffs warned that the 1998 Child Online Protection Act could be used to criminalize such things as sexual health information, erotic literature and news photographs of naked prisoners tortured at Abu Ghraib.

The law, signed by then-President Clinton, says Web site operators must prevent youngsters from seeing material "harmful to children" by demanding proof of age from computer users. It would impose a $50,000 fine and six-month prison term on commercial Web site operators that allow minors to view such content, which is to be defined by "contemporary community standards."

In a trial that opened Monday, the plaintiffs argued that "community standards" is too vague.

"As a parent, I know that what's fine for my daughter may not be appropriate even for some of her friends," testified Joan Walsh, editor in chief of Salon.com.

The law has never been enforced.

The U.S. Supreme Court has twice upheld preliminary injunctions that prevented the government from enforcing the law until a trial to determine the act's constitutionality can be held.

The American Civil Liberties Union, which represents the plaintiffs, argues that filter programs installed in home computers are more effective ways of policing the Internet.

Eric Beane, a government attorney, acknowledged that it is tempting to defer to families on the question of what is appropriate for children, but said the filters used by parents do not work.

"The evidence will show that a shocking amount of pornography slips through to children," Beane said in opening statements.

ACLU attorney Chris Hansen said that the government is essentially arguing that "parents are too stupid to use filters."

In preparing for its defense of the law, the Justice Department sought internal files from search engine companies and Internet service providers on what sorts of things people search the Internet for.

Google Inc. fought one such subpoena, although it primarily cited trade secrets, not privacy issues. A federal judge in California sharply limited the amount of information Google had to surrender.

The nonjury trial in front of Senior U.S. District Judge Lowell A. Reed Jr. is expected to take about a month.

Civil Action Continues Against City Of Denton (NTD)

By Abel Prado

North Texas Daily, October 24, 2006

Citizens accuse fire department of racism

Citizens of Denton are officially moving forward with legal action against the Denton Fire Department with accusations of racial discrimination through the NAACP and the Justice Department.

More than 26 minorities applied for one of the 15 open positions in the Denton Fire Department in 2006 but none were hired, said Willie Hudspeth, leader of the suit against Denton Fire Department.

Suspicions of racial injustice arose around 1999 when Hudspeth, along with other community members, said the city of Denton hired only one minority, which was the librarian. Seven years later, the number of minorities working for the city is still low, but it is not because of lack of applicants, Hudspeth said.

"This bias is more pronounced in the fire department," Hudspeth said. "They are over-qualified and have all the credentials. At this point I see no reason other than race that explains why these applicants did not get hired."

Several calls to the Denton Fire Administration and Prevention precinct and City Council officials seeking comment were not returned.

Applicants who wish to obtain a position in the Denton Fire Department have to take a Civil Service Exam, which tests a person's academic ability in math and science, his or her physical strength and proficiency in reading, writing, English and other foreign languages.

"The evidence is there," Hudspeth said. "And I hate that it is. As of now we are in contact with the NAACP and the Justice Department. They are each reviewing the case and deciding on a proper course of action. We should hear back from them in the coming days after which appropriate fundraisers will ensue."

Hudspeth claims to have uncovered evidence of an Asian American who scored in the 98th percentile and was not hired. He said he knows of another minority applicant who scored in the 91st percentile and did not get hired.

Several applicants, meanwhile, scored significantly lower than those applicants but were given a post in the department.

"It is my understanding that they could have a solid case," said Danny Garris, whose Utah-based law firm specializes in class action lawsuits and legal matters. "If the charges that Mr. Hudspeth is leveling are true and there are minority applicants who are outscoring those getting hired then there could be a legitimate grievance here. You would think that this situation is a thing of the past but, sadly, it isn't."

Driver Retried In Texas Smuggling Deaths (FINDLAW/AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0085677

AP, October 24, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-A truck driver accused of being responsible for the nation's deadliest human smuggling attempt could again face the death penalty.

Tyrone Williams was convicted last year on 38 counts of transporting illegal immigrants, but the verdict was overturned on appeal. Opening statements were set for Monday in his retrial.

Prosecutors say Williams failed to help the more than 70 illegal immigrants who had been packed into his tractor-trailer in stifling heat in 2003. Nineteen died.

Jury selection in his retrial took more than two weeks because potential jurors were questioned individually about their views of illegal immigration and the death penalty.

Williams, 35, avoided the death sentence in his first trial because the jury couldn't decide whether he was directly responsible for the deaths. The judge removed the death penalty as an option. Prosecutors appealed.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ordered a new trial and that the previous judge be removed from the case because of the case's "extraordinary history" and the judge's complaints about a crowded docket.

"I'm disappointed because the first jury reached a fair verdict," defense attorney Craig Washington said. "To have to do it again is disheartening. At the end of the day, the result will be the same as the last trial."

Prosecutors are not commenting on the case outside the courtroom. But during a hearing last week, Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez reiterated the government's contention that Williams was responsible for the immigrants' deaths because he ignored their cries for help and failed to turn on the air conditioning unit on his tractor-trailer.

"This unit could have had a significant, major impact in the survivability of these individuals," Rodriguez said. "If they were caught in time, serious injury could have been prevented."

Williams is the only one of 14 people charged in the case who is facing the death penalty. Seven people have been sentenced to prison, sentencing of three others is pending, charges against two were dismissed and one man is a fugitive.

Men Who Transported Immigrants Sentenced (SAST)

By Jayna Boyle

San Angelo (TX) Standard-Times, October 24, 2006

Two men caught transporting illegal immigrants near San Angelo after a rollover in the spring that killed one of the immigrants have been sentenced in federal court in Lubbock.

Jorge Luis Castro-Garcia was sentenced to 71 months imprisonment, while Jesse Cano received 87 months, according to a Justice Department news release from the Northern District of Texas.

The sentencing was announced Friday.

Castro-Garcia, Cano and co-defendant Agustin Anorga each pleaded guilty in July to one count of transporting illegal immigrants for private financial gain and aiding and abetting. Anorga is scheduled to be sentenced Nov. 3.

The charge against each man carries a possible penalty of as long as 10 years in prison, said Kathy Colvin, public information officer for the Northern District. She said the duration of Castro-Garcia and Cano's sentences was based on presentencing reports and investigations.

According to the news release, Castro-Garcia, a citizen of Mexico lawfully residing in the United States, recruited Cano and Anorga, both U.S. citizens, - Anorga, 20, lives in Cleburne - to transport illegal immigrants for money. The three had been in contact with the 11 to 13 Mexican nationals and picked them up near Del Rio after they had illegally crossed into the United States.

The immigrants were to pay $1,500 each to be taken to Cleburne, according to the release. Cleburne, south of Fort Worth, is about 210 miles east-northeast of San Angelo.

Castro-Garcia, Cano and Anorga drove separate vehicles to pick up the immigrants on March 19. After picking them up, the three men had the immigrants walk around the immigration checkpoint on U.S. Highway 277 near Del Rio to avoid getting caught. They picked up the immigrants after passing through the checkpoint, according to the news release.

Seven people were in Anorga's red Ford Explorer when it crashed on Farm Road 864 in Schleicher County about 8:40 a.m., according to the report filed by the Texas Department of Public Safety in San Angelo. The SUV's right rear tire blew out, causing Anorga to lose control of the vehicle, which rolled over one and a half times, landing on its top and ejecting two people, according to the accident report.

E.J. Martinez Juan Manuel Chavis Reinaga, 18, of Alaquines, Mexico, died in the crash, according to the report. Other immigrants hid in nearby brush, but some were eventually found, the news release stated.

Anorga and Cano tried to aid the injured immigrants and went to a nearby ranch to get help, according to the news release.

DOJ_NMG_0085678

Castro-Garcia went to where the crash occurred but left when law enforcement officers arrived. Cano and Anorga also then left, according to the release.

Cano and Castro-Garcia were later traveling on a small highway near the crash site to avoid getting caught when officers with the Schleicher County Sheriff's Department stopped them, according to the release.

Anorga continued to Cleburne in the vehicle originally driven by Cano. It is unclear when he was picked up by law enforcement officers.

The Explorer that Anorga drove was owned by another Cleburne resident.

According to data collected by the Center for Immigration Studies, in the United States, nearly half of post-2000 immigrants - 3.7 million people - are estimated to be illegal immigrants. Texas is among the states in the country to see the highest increase in immigration in the last decade.

Egyptian Nationals Sentenced For Slavery (UPI)

UPI, October 24, 2006

Two Egyptian nationals received prison sentences Monday for forcing a 10-year-old girl to act as their servant for two years at their California home.

While Amal Ahmed Ewis-abd El Motelib received a 22-month prison sentence for enslaving the young girl at their Orange County home, her now ex-husband Abdel Nasser Youssef Ibrahim was handed a 36-month sentence by the court Monday, the U.S. Justice Department said.

Back in June, the couple had pled guilty to the four counts laid against them regarding their illegal enslavement of the victim through both physical and verbal abuse.

In addition to the their prison sentences, both individuals were ordered to pay the victim more than $70,000, a figure representative of the payment the victim would have received as a legal employee.

"This young victim was robbed of something intensely precious -- her youth," Civil Rights Division Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim said.

Feds Ease Limits On Same-Sex Classrooms (AP)

AP, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Bush administration is giving public schools wider latitude to teach boys and girls separately in what is considered the biggest change to coed classrooms in more than three decades.

After a two-year wait, the Education Department was changing rules Tuesday in how it would enforce the Title IX landmark anti-discrimination law. Under the change, which takes effect Nov. 24, local school leaders will have discretion to create same-sex classes for subjects such as math, a grade level or even an entire school.

"Single-sex classes may provide benefits to some students under some circumstances," said Stephanie Monroe, the department's assistant secretary for civil rights. "These regulation changes will make it easier for schools that wish to use single-sex schools to do so where students would benefit."

Education officials initially proposed the rules in early 2004, pointing in part to U.S. research suggesting better student achievement and fewer discipline problems in single-sex classes including math and foreign languages.

After receiving 5,600 public comments, education officials said they were moving forward with the plan with some wording tweaks and assurances from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that it was legally sound.

Critics who compare the plan to "separate but equal" segregation-era classrooms haven't been so sure.

The National Organization for Women says it creates the risk of breeding second-class citizens. The American Association of University Women has said it would "throw out the most basic legal standards prohibiting sex discrimination in education."

A school board in southeastern Louisiana dropped plans last month to segregate two middle schools by sex after meeting with a federal judge and attorneys for the American Civil Liberties Union, which opposed the plan.

Since current rules began in 1975, single-sex classes have been allowed only in limited cases, such as sex education courses or gym classes involving contact sports.

Under the new rules, schools could separate genders for a variety of subjects if they believed it offered educational benefits, such as promoting greater student comfort or higher attendance. In all cases, enrollment in a single-sex class would be voluntary.

If a school creates a single-sex class, it would not be required to offer the other gender its own similar class, but it would have to offer a coed version of it.

The rules also make it easier to create single-sex schools, as long as the district can demonstrate that it also provides coed schools with "substantially equal" benefits to the excluded sex.

DOJ_NMG_0085679

The changes affect elementary and secondary education, but not colleges. The current ban on single-sex vocational education in both classes and schools at the K-12 level will remain in effect.

The new regulations also require that school districts evaluated their single-sex classes at least every two years to ensure compliance with the Title IX law.

"The department's office for civil rights is responsible for investigating any complaints in discrimination. We take that charge very seriously and will continue to fully investigate any allegation," Monroe said.

Education officials said some districts were interested in single-sex schools but said they don't expect a rush to make wholesale changes. In most cases, local school leaders will probably wait until at least the next semester to ponder moves, they said.

Single-sex classrooms have become more common in recent years. In 1998, only four public schools had them, compared to at least 228 this year, according to the National Association for Single Sex Public Education.

Fight Over Voting Rights Act Expected To Reach High Court (GANNETT)

By Ana Radelat, Gannett News Service

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger/Gannett, October 24, 2006

Challenged provision requires federal approval for election changes

WASHINGTON — A small water district in Austin, Texas, has become the new battleground over the voting rights of minorities.

Bill Ferguson, president of Northwest Austin Municipal Utility District No. 1, said he was approached by a lawyer last year who persuaded him to sue the federal government, challenging a provision of the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

That provision requires jurisdictions with a history of discrimination at the polls to obtain permission from the Justice Department before making any change - no matter how small - in voting procedures.

Civil rights groups say overturning the "preclearance" provision would strip minorities of key protections at the ballot box.

"This is an effort by people who are longstanding enemies of the Voting Rights Act," said Julie Fernandes, an attorney with the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. "They lost in Congress and are now looking to the courts."

The utility district filed its suit shortly after Congress reauthorized the Voting Rights Act last summer.

The suit is expected to reach the Supreme Court. If the utility district prevails, the country would see the biggest change in voting rights law in more than 40 years.

The preclearance provision affects all or parts of 16 states, mostly Southern, including Mississippi.

Rob McDuff is a Jackson lawyer who testified at a May congressional hearing on the Voting Rights Act. He said "in the end the law is going to be upheld" as is.

AT A GLANCE

A key provision in the Voting Rights Act that requires eight states and dozens of counties and cities in other states to seek Justice Department approval for any electoral changes is being challenged in court.

The "preclearance" provision dates to approval of the Voting Rights Act in 1965 and is aimed at preventing disenfranchisement of minority voters in jurisdictions with a history of discrimination.

Under the provision:

Any electoral change, from changing the look of a ballot to changing the shape of a voting district, "requires proof that the proposed voting change does not deny or abridge the right to vote on account of race, color, or membership in a language minority group."

The Justice Department says more than 15,000 proposed changes are submitted under the act each year.

"We've made a lot of progress in the last few years, but we still have a long way to go to eradicate ... racial discrimination," McDuff said Sunday night. "The preclearance provision still has an important role to play in that struggle."

Supporters of the suit say the preclearance provision is outdated and poses a burden for counties and towns that have long since evolved beyond their discriminatory pasts.

It "makes us look backward," Ferguson said. "This thing should go away, certainly by now."

The Austin utility district was founded in the late 1980s to provide water, sewage and other services to about 1,300 homes and a few building and apartments. It's a diverse community, with many Hispanic, black and Asian families.

Four years ago, the district decided to move its only polling place from a garage to a nearby school.

Because Texas is one of the states affected by the preclearance provision, that wasn't so easy. The district had to pay a lawyer $1,250 to file a letter with the Justice Department and wait two months for permission.

Ferguson said he was persuaded by Austin lawyer Greg Coleman, a former law clerk to Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas, to file suit challenging the constitutionality of the preclearance requirement.

The requirement may be just an inconvenience for the utility district, he said, "but if you multiply it by the thousands of municipalities that have to do this, then you're talking about a significant burden."

Conservatives fighting to change the Voting Rights Act say the nation has changed since the law was first approved in 1965, when there were widespread attempts to keep blacks, Hispanics and other minorities from the polls.

"America has moved far past the days of Jim Crow," said Edward Blum, a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute.

Blum, a leader in challenges to the Voting Rights Act, said the preclearance provision has resulted in the creation of majority-black and Hispanic political districts that actually hurt minority political power by creating "segregated racial homelands."

He is confident federal courts will find the preclearance requirement unconstitutional. To bolster that chance, he said, he may seek to file new challenges.

But Nina Perales, an attorney with the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, said courts have consistently deemed preclearance constitutional.

Her group and the NAACP Legal Defense Fund joined the legal fray Thursday on behalf of two couples - one Hispanic and one black - who have filed countersuits to the utility board suit.

Those countersuits say victory by the utility board would jeopardize the couples' voting rights in a state with a history of "racially polarizing voting patterns."

Fernandes said there's no need to challenge the Voting Rights Act in court because jurisdictions that can prove they haven't discriminated at the polls for at least 10 years can ask to be exempted from preclearance.

"It's the places that have problems that are complaining the most," she said. Contact Ana Radelat at aradelat@gns.gannett.com.

Embattled OC Candidate Claims Meaning Lost In Translation (AP)

By Peter Prengaman, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 24, 2006

Los Angeles (AP) -- A Republican congressional candidate linked to a threatening mailing targeting Hispanics claims the intent of a letter he did not authorize was lost in translation.

Tan Nguyen, whose campaign headquarters and house have been searched in a widening voting rights probe, told reporters Sunday that the media had poorly translated the Spanish-language letter sent by a campaign manager to 14,000 Hispanic families in Orange County.

Nguyen said the word "emigrado," translated by the media as "immigrant," actually referred to a legal permanent resident, or green card holder.

So, Nguyen's argument went, the sentence warning that immigrants could be jailed or deported for voting referred to green card holders who cannot vote, and not immigrants who have become naturalized U.S. citizens. Only U.S. citizens can vote.

Nguyen declined to say who came up with the idea for the letter or who translated it into Spanish, but argued the controversy amounted to a "debate over translation."

According to Spanish-language experts, and the Royal Spanish Academy dictionary, the word "emigrado" comes from the verb emigrar, which means to emigrate. It's mostly used in the past participle form, for example, "ellos han emigrado de Mexico," or "they have emigrated from Mexico."

The way the letter uses it — "si es emigrado," or "if you are emigrated" — is an awkward construction. But regardless, someone who has emigrated from his or her native country, and is now in a foreign country, is an immigrant.

"The word 'emigrado' in this usage has to mean immigrant. It can't mean anything else," said Roberto Ignacio Diaz, chair of the Spanish and Portuguese department at the University of Southern California.

U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, the federal agency charged with issuing immigrant visas, doesn't use the term "emigrado" to refer to any particular immigration status, said agency spokeswoman Marie Sebrechts.

Nguyen, a Vietnamese immigrant who has made illegal immigration a centerpiece of his campaign, is challenging Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a Democrat representing California's 47th Congressional District.

His explanation of the letter, which on Sunday included handing out copies of what he said was the original English text, only created more questions that he declined to answer.

"It's starting to seem a little bit like a circus," said Jose Solario, Santa Ana city councilman and Democratic candidate for the 69th Assembly District seat. Solario, a U.S. citizen whose parents brought him from Mexico as a baby, was one of the thousands receiving the letter.

Among issues raised by the letter is its contention that the government is creating a "new computerized system" to verify the names of "all new registered voters" participating in this election?

DOJ_NMG_0085681

Under the Help America Vote Act, states are revamping their voting systems, but for all registered voters, not just new ones.

The letter also says that "organizations against immigration will be able to request information from this new computer system."

Much voter information can generally be accessed by the public, but there is no way to verify a voter's claimed U.S. citizenship status just by looking at a registration form.

In addition, the letter singles out Mexico, along the way slamming the American voting system.

"Unlike in Mexico, here there is no incentive to vote," it reads.

Then there is the question of the letterhead, which resembles that of the California Coalition for Immigration Reform, a Southern California anti-illegal immigration group that has said it had nothing to do with the mailing.

And who is Sergio Ramirez, the person whose name comes at the end of the letter?

Though Nguyen hasn't been forthcoming with explanations, the investigation has clearly focused on him and his campaign.

"Tan Nguyen has admitted that his campaign is responsible for the letter. The only person suggesting that the letter applies only to illegal immigrants is Tan Nguyen," said Department of Justice spokesman Nathan Barankin.

Associated Press Writers Don Thompson in Sacramento and Gillian Flaccus in Santa Ana contributed to this report.

The Don't Show Me State (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

People in the good state of Missouri need photo identification to cash a check, board a plane or apply for food stamps. But the state Supreme Court has ruled that a photo ID requirement to vote is too great a burden on the elderly and the poor. Go figure.

Public polls consistently show that an overwhelming majority of Americans -- regardless of age, race, ethnicity or socioeconomic status -- favor voter ID laws. And nearly half of the nation's states have passed them. Yet a string of recent court decisions has blocked their implementation in some places, thus siding with Democrats and liberal special interest groups who would rather turn a blind eye to voter fraud.

A Georgia judge ruled a voter ID law unconstitutional in September. Earlier this month, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals blocked enforcement of a similar law in Arizona, only to be unanimously reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court on Friday. (While the Supremes didn't decide on the merits, their willingness to let the ID requirement be enforced in next month's election suggests some encouraging deference to state officials who want to protect the integrity of the ballot.) Also this month, a Seventh Circuit appeals panel heard arguments in a case concerning Indiana's voter ID requirements. And the Michigan Supreme Court will consider a voter ID challenge in November.

Missouri's dispute shows what's at stake and why the laws are under attack. The state passed its new voting requirements in May in response to problems at the polls in 2000 and 2004, and the IDs were made available at no charge. The law was to be implemented over a two-year period, and people who lacked proper identification would be permitted to cast a provisional vote next month.

Despite these good faith efforts to ensure legitimate ballot access, however, opponents charge that photo ID requirements are overly burdensome and tantamount to a poll tax. The Missouri Democratic Party, which challenged the law, said that while the ID itself is free, the underlying documents -- such as a birth certificate -- required to obtain the necessary identification cost money. And state judges were sympathetic to the argument.

In a 6-1 decision striking down the law as a violation of the state constitution, the Missouri Supreme Court said that requiring the "between 3 and 4 percent of Missourians who lack the requisite photo ID" to obtain one for voting purposes "creates a heavy burden on the fundamental right to vote." How so? "Specific Missouri voters testified that to acquire the requisite photo ID, at the very least they will have to incur the costs associated with birth certificates, which in Missouri costs $15."

In his dissenting opinion, Judge Stephen Limbaugh Jr. took issue with the fact that the majority opinion actually played down the existence of vote fraud. "Although the majority agrees that there is some evidence of voter fraud at the voter registration stage, they discount that evidence as if it had no connection with fraud at the polling place," wrote Judge Limbaugh. "But why else does voter registration fraud occur if not to vote persons fraudulently registered?"

That's a good question. And both the majority ruling and the political left duck it. They'd rather equate a $15 nominal fee for a birth certificate with a poll tax, which is as ridiculous as the paternalistic view that senior and minority voters are incapable of meeting simple self-identification requirements that they manage to meet in other contexts every day.

Showing ID is an incidental cost of voting, like having to buy a postage stamp for an absentee ballot, or feed the parking meter when you go to the polling booth. Poll taxes, by contrast, required a person to pay a fee every time he voted and were adopted for racially discriminatory purposes.

But there's a reason that Democrat partisans are more interested in raising the specter of Jim Crow than in protecting the integrity of the voting process. And here's a clue: While the Missouri Supreme Court was preparing its decision earlier this month, the Kansas City Star and St. Louis Post-Dispatch ran front-page stories about the thousands of fraudulent voter registrations submitted by Acorn, a national left-wing group financed in part by organized labor.

According to the Star, Acorn's voter registration drive generated some 35,000 applications, "but thousands of them appear to be duplicates or contain dubious data." The report went on to note that "[n]ear the top of the fishy list would be a man named Mark who apparently registered seven times over a three-day period using his mother's home address and phone number." Mom told the paper he hadn't lived there in six years.

Acorn and its affiliates have been among the most active and vocal opponents of voter ID laws in Missouri and nationwide. Now we know why.

ANTITRUST:

IBM Sues Amazon In Patent Dispute (FT)

By Richard Waters In San Francisco

Financial Times, October 24, 2006

IBM mounted a rare legal action against Amazon.com on Monday, accusing it of breaching intellectual property rights that underpin the e-commerce company's fundamental online business model.

The case marks an unusual venture into the courts for Big Blue, which has worked hard to paint itself as a fair and willing licenser of its own intellectual property, rather than an aggressive defender of its industry-leading bank of 40,000 patents.

It also carries an ironic twist for Amazon, since the e-commerce company has itself become notorious in the internet industry for its aggressive defence of so-called business method patents. Its attempt to enforce its "one-click" checkout method in a lawsuit against rival Barnesandnoble.com in 1999 has come to be used as a prime example by critics of the US patent system.

IBM said it had filed two cases in Federal court in the Eastern district of Texas accusing Amazon of breaching five of its patents. The patents cover what it claims are a number of fundamental practices in networking and e-commerce, including the use of hypertext links to make recommendations to a customer, methods of presenting and linking to online adverts, and networking architecture for delivering online content faster.

Given how fundamental the patents are, Amazon has "built much if not all of their business on top of our intellectual property", said John Kelly, IBM's senior vice-president for intellectual property.

An Amazon spokesperson said the company had not yet been served with the lawsuits, and so could not comment.

Mr Kelly said IBM had mounted only two other patent lawsuits this decade and that it had only taken action now after trying for four years to persuade Amazon to take out a licence.

IBM Hits Amazon With E-Commerce Patent Suit (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle And Suein Hwang

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

International Business Machines Corp. sued Amazon.com Inc., alleging that the giant Internet retailer is infringing on five IBM patents that a company executive calls "seminal" to electronic commerce.

IBM, Armonk, N.Y., filed two suits seeking unspecified damages in U.S. federal courts in Texas, regarded as a jurisdiction friendly to patent holders. The public tussle is unusual for IBM, which has a massive patent portfolio but rarely appears as a plaintiff in patent suits. Instead, IBM prefers negotiating licensing agreements.

John E. Kelly III, IBM's top intellectual-property executive, said IBM has been engaged in a back-and-forth with Seattle-based Amazon since 2002 but that negotiations broke off a few weeks ago.

The suits tap into the long-simmering debate over whether patents on methods of doing business should apply on the Internet, where ideas are easily replicated. Critics say patents smother high-tech innovation by cutting out healthy competition, while proponents say they give companies a reason to invest in new technology without fear that it will be immediately copied.

IBM says the five patents at issue -- including one titled "Ordering Items Using an Electronic Catalogue" -- cover a broad swath of Internet shopping's back-office mechanics, encompassing such things as displaying targeted advertising and recommending items for purchase. The latter is one of Amazon's notable features.

An Amazon spokeswoman said she hadn't seen the complaint and declined to comment.

The patents "do apply fundamentally to most, if not all, of e-commerce," Mr. Kelly said. He added that IBM has signed licensing agreements with "many, many other companies," though he declined to name any. IBM brings in about $1 billion each year from licensing deals.

IBM didn't specify damages in its legal filings, but a company spokesman said damages were "potentially in the hundreds of millions of dollars."

In recent years, IBM has walked a thin line on intellectual property. The company has taken a friendly approach to open-source computer programmers wary of patents, by agreeing to donate intellectual property to their efforts. It has also led a public charge aimed at raising quality and paring back the number of duplicative or overbroad patents granted. At the same time, IBM raked in nearly 3,000 patents last year, and for years it has been the nation's biggest recipient of patents.

Amazon itself was on the other end of a well-known patent lawsuit that also addressed issues of how so-called business-method patents apply to the Internet. In 1999, it received a patent for a "one-click" method of shopping online and sued Barnes & Noble.com Inc., claiming the rival infringed on it. The suit was settled in 2002.

Marc Kaufman, a lawyer at Nixon Peabody LLP who isn't involved in the case, says one point tending to IBM's favor is that some patents "have a rather early date for this type of technology." The electronic-catalog patent, for instance, was issued in 1994. That may make it harder for Amazon to claim the technology was widely in use and hence the patents aren't valid.

Mr. Kaufman says IBM has asserted at least some of the patents against other electronic-commerce players -- he cites one that claims to cover product-recommendation systems and another for displaying advertisements -- and has been successful in securing licensing arrangements. He says he can't name the other companies.

Patent attorneys said IBM's move reflects how valuable patent portfolios generally have become to major corporations. Paul R. Gupta, a partner at Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe, said, "We're starting to see an accelerating trend where major companies are suing other major companies."

Shell In $6.9bn Oilsands Move (FT)

By Ed Crooks In London

Financial Times, October 24, 2006

Royal Dutch Shell has delivered a vote of confidence in the potential of Canada's oilsands by offering to buy out the 22 per cent of its Shell Canada subsidiary that it does not already own at a price 22 per cent higher than last Friday's close.

Shell said the purpose of the C$7.7bn ($6.9bn) offer was to continue the simplification of its structure that began with last year's company unification.

Jeroen van der Veer, chief executive, said the deal was an opportunity to integrate Shell Canada fully with its parent company's strategy and operations.

Until now, he said, it had been pursuing the interests of its shareholders, which did not necessarily fit with Royal Dutch Shell's global plans.

The deal will add to Shell's investment in Canadian oilsands, which have this year been hit by concerns over rising costs and the falling price of oil.

Reserves in Alberta are second only to Saudi Arabia's and an increasingly important source of oil for the US. But heavy investment in the region has driven up costs for producers and raised fears over the viability of some projects, particularly if the price of oil falls further.

James Neale, an analyst at Citigroup in London, said: "Shell is, in essence, taking the high commodity price view. It is formulating a strategy based on the implicit view that oil will stay at around its current levels."

Shell has set a target ofproducing 10-15 per cent of its output in "unconventional oil", which includes oilsands and heavy oil, by 2015.

DOJ_NMG_0085684

Shell Canada raised eyebrows this year by offering C$2.4bn for BlackRock Ventures, which is expanding production in the Peace River area. The price amounted to about C$4 a barrel of reserves, compared with the C$1.25 that Total paid last year when it acquired Deer Creek Energy.

Analysts said Shell's confidence in these higher-cost sources of oil could be justified because it was a fully integrated company with its own downstream operations to refinethe oil and market the products.

Bob Fryklund of IHS, a consultancy, said: "Down the value chain from in the ground to in the car, you don't know where most value will come: it can depend on complex fiscal regimes. Companies that don't have an integrated approach are going to be a lot more exposed."

Shell is offering C$40 a share for the minority interest in Shell Canada: a 22 per cent premium to Friday's closing price.

Shell Canada shares rose C$9.41, or 29 per cent, to C$42.22 at midday on the Toronto Stock Exchange. Royal Dutch Shell closed 7p lower at 1,810p.

Oil Sands Are A Hot Commodity (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Royal Dutch Shell PLC yesterday offered to pay $6.8 billion for the outstanding shares of Shell Canada Ltd. and gain a greater stake in Canada's oil sands.

The offer is the latest move by major international oil companies to bolster their positions in Canada's oil sands despite high development costs, environmental challenges and high operating costs.

Shell Canada, which is 78 percent owned by Royal Dutch Shell, operates an oil-sands project in the Athabasca region of northeastern Alberta province.

Shell is already producing more than 100,000 barrels a day of oil from the tar-like sands, and the company's share of production there could grow to 500,000 barrels a day within a decade or so.

John Hofmeister, president of Shell Oil Co., the U.S. subsidiary of Royal Dutch/Shell Group, said in Washington yesterday that the oil sands would be a "great boost" to the company and a "great supply source for the United States." Although many analysts have said that oil sands projects are only profitable if oil prices are more than $30 to $35 a barrel, relatively high by industry standards, Hofmeister said that "the easy oil is running out."

The reserves of Canada's oil sands are second in size only to Saudi Arabia's reserves, but extracting the oil is expensive and messy. The oil sands are sand grains surrounded by bitumen, a form of crude oil with the consistency of molasses. Companies either strip-mine the sands, then heat them to extract crude, or they heat the oil sands in the ground and suck up the crude that runs off. Total production from Canada's oil sands is about 1 million barrels a day and oil companies expect that volume to triple or quadruple over time.

Hofmeister also said that the company would be better able to plan across the U.S.-Canada border. That could become more important in the future, when the company may need to ship oil to U.S. refineries capable of turning the heavy oil sands crude into petroleum products such as gasoline or heating oil.

The acquisition also boosts future oil production for Royal Dutch Shell, which in January 2004 wrote down 40 percent of its oil and gas reserves after an audit revealed booking errors. By the end of 2005, Shell's reserves had declined an additional 3.8 percent. Although the Securities and Exchange Commission does not let companies count oil sands as "proved reserves," they are part of Shell's "probable" reserves and are already producing real barrels.

Other big oil companies are also chasing oil sands projects. ConocoPhillips Co. and EnCana Corp. said this month that they would spend more than $10 billion to increase output from the oil sands, and last year Total SA bought another Canadian oil sands producer for $1.7 billion.

Royal Dutch Shell said it would pay $35.32 a share for Shell Canada, 22 percent more than the closing price of the unit's stock at the end of last week. Shell Canada also refines and markets petroleum products and produces natural gas.

Shell Makes Offer To Buy Out Holders In Canadian Unit (WSJ)

By Chip Cummins

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

LONDON -- Royal Dutch Shell PLC's $6.84 billion offer to buy out its main Canadian affiliate's minority shareholders, who may hold out for a better deal, will be a major road test for Chief Executive Jeroen van der Veer and his retooled version of the Anglo-Dutch oil company.

DOJ_NMG_0085685

In its first big bid under Mr. van der Veer and new Chairman Jorma Ollila, Shell said it had approached the board of Shell Canada Ltd. with an intention to offer shareholders 40 Canadian dollars (US$35.55) a share for the approximately 22% of the Canadian oil producer that the parent company doesn't own.

The move on Shell Canada, a big player in Canada's booming oil-sands developments, is relatively small potatoes for the global oil industry and for Shell, which last year reported a profit of $25.3 billion. And Shell executives have signed far more-complex deals in volatile, oil-rich regions like Nigeria and Russia. Shell Canada's shareholders could put up a drawn-out fight for more cash, testing negotiators at Shell headquarters in The Hague, Netherlands.

In Toronto trading, Shell Canada shares zoomed higher on the Shell approach, gaining 30%, or C$9.75, to C$42.55, above Shell's offer price. That makes it more likely that Shell will have to bump up its offer if it wants to prevent a drawn-out fight with minority shareholders. Shell officials declined to comment on how they feel investors will react to the offer.

"The offer is full and fair," Mr. van der Veer said in an interview.

Shell has posted a spotty record during the years in North American deal making. In 1985, Shell rankled U.S. shareholders with what many considered a poorly executed deal for full ownership of its main American unit, Shell Oil. Shareholder litigation dragged on for years. In 2001, Shell lost a high-profile auction for U.S. natural-gas producer Barrett Resources Corp. to Williams Cos.

Mr. van der Veer was named to the top post at Shell in 2004 amid a scandal over energy-reserves accounting. He led a shake-up of the company, consolidating its two boards and creating for himself a U.S.-style CEO role. A smooth Shell Canada deal could help persuade shareholders that he has simplified Shell's corporate structure, which critics blamed for slowing down decision-making and obscuring accountability.

It would also be the first big deal under Mr. Ollila, the former Nokia Corp. chief executive brought in to monitor how well Shell executes on its turnaround promises.

Amid high oil prices, Mr. van der Veer has outspent his industry peers investing in promising -- but unconventional and costly -- sources of hydrocarbons. One of Shell's favorite regions for expansion has been Western Canada. The company is a leader among the handful of big oil companies that have increased investment in the country's reserves of heavy oil. The deposits are much harder and more expensive to exploit than conventional oil, but in today's high oil-price environment, they have made economic sense.

Shell asked yesterday that Shell Canada establish a special committee of independent directors to supervise a formal, outside valuation and to review the Shell offer and make a recommendation regarding it. Shell said it might not pursue the offer if it doesn't win the support of the Canadian board. Shell said any offer would be conditioned on obtaining more than 50% of the outstanding shares held by minority shareholders.

Last year, Shell Canada reported net income of C$2.01 billion on revenue of C$14.39 billion.

Court Sends Back Ruling In Qualcomm Patent Case (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

Finnish cellphone maker Nokia Corp. won a minor legal victory against Qualcomm Inc. when an appeals court sent back for review a U.S. district court's decision to deny Nokia's motion to stay their patent dispute.

The ruling could potentially delay the legal proceedings if U.S. District Judge Rudi Brewster decides to grant Nokia's motion to stay for further arbitration. In November, Qualcomm sued Nokia for patent infringement despite a patent agreement in place between the two companies.

Qualcomm, of San Diego, dismissed the ruling. "This is a nonsubstantive ruling regarding Nokia's claim," said spokeswoman Emily Kilpatrick. "Nokia is working very hard to delay this case and obstruct with nonsubstantive issues."

Nokia is seeking to have an arbitrator rule on several issues.

Macquarie Bank Makes Hostile Bid For Techem (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

Australia's Macquarie Bank Ltd., which recently bought U.K. utility Thames Water, unveiled a €1.1 billion ($1.4 billion) hostile bid for German utility-services company Techem AG.

Macquarie, Australia's biggest securities company, said Techem rejected the bid, and Macquarie has approached Techem's shareholders directly. A spokesman for Techem declined to comment on Macquarie's statements, but said several investors have shown interest in the company, citing previous statements by Techem Chief Executive Horst Enzelmüller.

Martin Stanley, executive director of the Macquarie subsidiary that launched the takeover bid, Macquarie European Infrastructure Fund II, said in a statement that the bank has approached Techem's shareholders directly, offering them the chance to decide on the transaction.

The Australian bank doesn't plan to change the business model of the energy-metering-services provider and doesn't aim to yield synergies from the potential takeover, Mr. Stanley said. He added that Macquarie's interest is based on Techem's good business model and long-term stable cash flow.

Macquarie said its MEIF II unit offered €44 a share for Techem. The bank and its fund already hold a 17% stake in the Eschborn-based company. Macquarie's offer comes after Techem said last week that it would reject a possible approach by financial investors in case of any offer.

Shares in Techem rose 17% to €49.31 on the DAX.

Techem monitors energy and water use for about six million houses and apartments in Germany and elsewhere in Europe. It also provides sales and rentals of water meters, heating-system maintenance and bill collection.

The takeover offer comes a week after a group led by Macquarie won the battle to buy Thames Water from Germany's biggest power company RWE AG for £4.8 billion ($9 billion), excluding debt.

Merrill Buys Boutique Investment Bank (FT)

By James Politi

Financial Times, October 24, 2006

Merrill Lynch on Monday agreed to buy Petrie Parkman, a boutique investment bank specialising in advisory work on oil and gas deals in North America with more than $100m in annual revenues.

The deal represents a big bet by Merrill on the continuation of high energy prices, which have fuelled a string of mergers and acquisitions, stock listings and debt offerings among US exploration and production companies.

Although the terms of the acquisition were not disclosed, David Trone, an analyst at Fox Pitt-Kelton, said he believed Merrill paid between $500m and $600m.

Petrie, which is based in Colorado and employs 26 senior bankers, last month filed with US regulators to seek a stock market listing, making it the latest in a string of boutique banks to pursue an initial public offering.

Its combination with Merrill could become an alternative model for small banks looking at ways to cash in on their recent growth, although one rival on Monday suggested that the cultural fit might not be ideal. “A lot of these guys are there because they don’t fit well in the bulge-bracket firms,” he said.

Tom Petrie, the 61-year old former US Army captain and First Boston oil analyst who has run Petrie since it was founded in 1989 and owns 38 per cent of the company, will become a vice-chairman at Merrill and a member of the Executive Client Coverage Group.

“We look forward to expanding our client coverage and bringing our enhanced capabilities to the marketplace,” said Victor Nesi, head of Americas investment banking at Merrill.

Merrill already has a strong energy trading and commodities business, and some of those products could be sold to Petrie’s investment banking clients.

Merrill has struggled in the US energy and power M&A rankings this year. According to Thomson Financial, it advised on 13 deals worth a total of $9.6bn. This placed it 13th in the league table, below Petrie which worked on 8 deals worth a total of $10.3bn. Last year, Merrill was in 6th place, while Petrie was in 12th place.

Last year, Petrie generated $75m in revenues, making $4m in net income.

Merrill represented itself in the deal, while Keefe Bruyette advised Petrie.

Separately, Keefe Bruyette, the financial services investment bank, set the price range at which it expects to sell shares to the public in an IPO that could value it as highly as $670m. Keefe Bruyette is offering shares at between $19 and $21 each.

'Rambus' Ruling Is A Standards Landmark (NLJ)

By Pamela A. MacLean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, October 24, 2006

With a single stroke, the Federal Trade Commission may have restored the value of the handshake and good-faith promise among high-tech competitors, yet opened the doors to potential new litigation.

The commission recently issued a landmark decision -- for the first time holding a company liable for an antitrust violation because it used its patents to subvert the process relied on by thousands of companies to set industry standards for products.

The most mundane items of daily life -- from the size of the electric plug to the specifications for computer memory chips -- are standardized through voluntary, nongovernment groups known as standard-setting organizations (SSO). The engineers who meet to establish specifications for new products are encouraged to standardize, both to avoid competitive battles to the death and to satisfy consumer demands that products work together.

Historically, lawyers have had limited roles in SSOs, producing broad agreements to share information that have been vague on future patent obligations.

Then in the 1990s, Rambus Inc. tried to corner the memory chip market by securing key DRAM memory chip patents after it learned what the SSO group would choose as the industry standards. Trust among SSO participants evaporated.

REVERSAL OF FORTUNE

Following years of litigation that went in favor of Rambus, the Federal Trade Commission issued a landmark decision last month that Rambus Inc., a semiconductor technology company, violated antitrust law by secretly securing patents on what it knew would become the industry standard for DRAM memory chips. Rambus, a Los Altos, Calif., memory chip developer, had used the patents to sue for infringement the very companies that adopted the standard. In the Matter of Rambus Inc. (FTC docket 9302).

The FTC antitrust finding against Rambus was a reversal of fortunes for the standard-setting organizations.

What remains unclear in the wake of the FTC's Rambus decision is what the standard-setting organizations will do now with their newfound power.

Two emerging trends would have some SSOs stick with vague promises that members will only seek "reasonable and nondiscriminatory" (RAND) licensing royalties to pay for patents covered in new standards, while others want to negotiate potential licensing fees upfront, before a standard is set, which is known as "ex ante" terms.

"This decision was the first by the FTC imposing antitrust liability on a single company for its conduct in subverting a standard-setting organization," said Sean Royall, former deputy director of the FTC's Bureau of Competition and lead attorney in the case against Rambus. Royall is a co-chairman of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher's antitrust practice and divides time between the Los Angeles firm's Dallas and Washington offices.

The members of the Joint Electron Device Engineering Council "unknowingly helped create and then walked into an extremely expensive trap laid by Rambus," wrote Andrew Updegrove, an attorney with Boston's Gesmer Updegrove in urging the FTC to hold Rambus liable for antitrust violations. He represented a dozen SSOs in amicus papers.

The role of SSOs is particularly critical in high-tech fields where intellectual property rights are at stake. For JEDEC, it dictated a standard of design for millions of DRAM chips worth billions of dollars in royalties for anyone with design patents.

The groups have no police power to enforce member conduct but have relied on good-faith member pledges or loose agreements to disclose potential patent claims prior to standard setting. Members may also be asked to promise to license patents on a reasonable and nondiscriminatory basis.

But the danger of participants in standards groups running afoul of antitrust law by discussing specific patent royalties or how the patent might be licensed creates skittishness about ex ante licensing negotiation.

This is particularly important in some products covered by multiple patents, such as cellphones, that may have photo, video, recording and other capabilities that all may require patent royalty payments.

"A lot of organizations seem reluctant to adopt clear standards regulating IP that covers the standard," said Mark Lemley, a Stanford Law School professor and authority on standard-setting issues.

"Some organizations have expressed worries that they might be liable for antitrust if they agree to royalty rates, although the FTC made clear last year that is not a big problem," Lemley said.

He said: If an organization requires members to agree to license for RAND terms, does that mean any future disputes will be over what is a reasonable price?

"That is a contract fight," Lemley said. "Or is that just an organizational rule and a patent owner still can sue for reasonable royalties? Does the patent owner decide the royalty or is it set by a court?"

"Does the patent owner get to bring tools of patent infringement to bear and seek treble damages ... and attorney fees? That is a much more powerful threat ... rather than to sue for reasonable terms," he said. These are substantial issues not yet addressed by appeals courts, Lemley said.

Royall noted that "[c]ompanies that operate in good faith have nothing to fear. I don't think SSOs need to fear that their routine activities suddenly are going to become subject to antitrust inquiries or government intervention. The Rambus case had extreme facts."

Douglas Melamed, an antitrust attorney in Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr's Washington office who has represented Rambus and other high-tech firms, said that "A lot of people were very surprised by the commission's decision and saw it as far reaching."

He said standards bodies seem to be requiring members to commit to RAND disclosure. He doesn't believe the Rambus decision affected that trend.

"The whole area of antitrust in standard setting is an area of uncertainty in the law. It is just beginning to be sorted out by the courts and that will continue for a number of years," he said.

Whether standards groups will prefer more general promises to "be reasonable" under RAND terms, rather than more specific fixed terms under ex ante negotiation that hold antitrust risks, Royall could not predict. But he pointed out that the chairman of the FTC "has suggested ex ante discussion is not likely to be per se unlawful."

PUSH FOR EX ANTE

Five big companies, Cisco Systems Inc., Sun Microsystems Inc., International Business Machines Corp., Apple Corp. and Hewlett Packard Co. have been pushing the U.S. Department of Justice to approve ex ante licensing, according to Updegrove.

Gil Ohana, director of antitrust and competition for Cisco, said that his company, along with Sun and H-P, are strong proponents of ex ante licensing so members know upfront the licensing cost of a patent.

"Our hope is that SSOs both improve the rules on patent and patent applications so it is clearer they have to be disclosed, but also on ex ante permission, to encourage or require it when intellectual property is disclosed," he said.

Current SSO rules bar disclosure of licensing terms beyond RAND, which hurts the process, he said.

Ohana said there's a growing consensus among standard-setting participants that "these rules should change to permit patentees to state the terms on which they will license their patents in detail before a standard is adopted."

He urged government antitrust enforcers to publicly reject the view that SSOs must limit disclosure of terms to RAND to protect themselves.

He pointed to the recent New Jersey antitrust suit by Broadcom Corp. against Qualcomm Inc., two wireless communications companies. Qualcomm argued that it made a RAND commitment for patents in its standard-setting group but that did not prevent it from charging what the market would bear for patents, he said.

U.S. District Judge Mary L. Cooper threw out Broadcom's federal antitrust claims but held that remaining state law unfair competition and breach of contract claims could be pursued in state court. Broadcom v. Qualcomm, No. C05-3350MLC (D.N.J.).

"What this means in my view, if a company is relying on RAND commitment to indicate a patent will be available on favorable terms, that may not be right. You need to get something more explicit," Ohana said.

The Rambus decision means there may be a duty of good faith on the part of a patent holder, even if it strictly complies with an organization's disclosure rules, he said. "There has already been an uptick in the assertion of defenses [to patent infringement claims] on this theory," he said.

Royall noted, "I would advise companies to be careful of what is expected of them in standards organizations. To the extent there are unwritten expectations, don't participate in standard-setting activity unless you are prepared to do what is required."

2 Groups Challenge Easing Of Media Rules (FINDLAW/AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 24, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Easing government rules to allow more media consolidation would push out niche radio programming such as classical, jazz and gospel music while doing little to improve local TV coverage, new studies say.

Reports released Monday by two public interest groups, the Benton Foundation and the Social Science Research Council, challenged the Federal Communications Commission's argument that media consolidation would improve local coverage and programming due to synergy effects.

The FCC is reviewing the issue following a failed 2003 attempt to loosen media ownership restrictions.

"These studies make clear that there is no support for the contention that media consolidation correlates with better, more local or more diverse media content," said Gloria Tristani, a former FCC commissioner and president of the Benton Foundation.

The FCC in June reopened the hotly disputed issue of ownership limits, including the number of radio and television stations that one owner can have and restrictions on cross-ownership between newspapers and broadcasters.

Former FCC Chairman Michael Powell pushed through loosened rules in 2003, but a federal appeals court threw them out on grounds that the FCC compiled an insufficient record to justify them.

The 2003 changes would have let one corporation own - in a single community - up to three TV stations, eight radio stations, the cable system, the only daily newspaper and the biggest Internet provider, according to Democratic commissioners who opposed the plan.

According to the studies released Monday:

DOJ_NMG_0085689

-A radio company that owns more stations in a local market was less likely to offer niche formats such as easy listening, bluegrass, tejano and classical music, despite the company's greater opportunities, given its size, to do so.

-Cross-owned TV stations were more likely to offer local news, in part because larger news stations were usually the ones targeted for acquisition by newspapers. But when factoring out market size, the cross-owned ones did not provide more news than other stations in the local news business.

-Media ownership opportunities for women and minority groups remained limited. Of the 12,844 radio and television stations that filed reports with the FCC in 2005, women own 3.4 percent and minorities own 3.6 percent.

Many of the broadcast television networks and large media companies including the Tribune Co., Gannett Co. and the New York Times Co. have supported loosened rules, saying current restrictions are outmoded in a digital age in which consumers also have the Internet and cable TV to choose from.

The FCC has scheduled several hearings and allowed 120 days for public comment, which expires Monday. Current FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has supported eliminating the three-decade-old flat ban on cross-ownership.

The fate of media ownership proposals could be determined in part by the November congressional elections.

A switch to Democratic control in the House would likely hamper any attempts to let media conglomerates own more TV stations. In the Senate, Democrats such as John Kerry of Massachusetts and Barack Obama of Illinois - two possible 2008 presidential contenders - have called on the agency to consider diversity when reviewing ownership rules.

The FCC and its staff declined to predict how long the review process will take. The agency held its first public hearing in Los Angeles earlier this month.

Crossed Lines Bitter Battle By Telecom Titans In Europe Heads To U.S. Courts (WSJ)

By Leila Abboud And Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

Vivendi, Stymied in Poland By Deutsche Telekom, Files a RICO Lawsuit Wealthy Partner Shifts Sides

On a cold afternoon in March of last year, security guards stormed the Warsaw offices of Polish mobile-phone firm Polska Telefonia Cyfrowa Sp. z o.o. The guards, armed with pistols, rounded up three top executives from French media giant Vivendi SA, a part-owner of the Polish company, and pushed them into the street. When one Vivendi manager locked himself in his office, the guards broke down the door.

"It was complete chaos. It was like a siege," says Philippe Houdouin, Vivendi's top official in Poland, who witnessed the events from the sidewalk after rushing to the scene. Mr. Houdouin says that back at his own office elsewhere in Warsaw, he had to protect a stack of documents with his body when the guards sought to cart them away.

For Vivendi, it was a disastrous turn in what so far has been a losing seven-year battle to recoup a major investment in Poland. Vivendi executives haven't been able to get back into their offices at the Warsaw cellphone firm, known as PTC, since last year's raid. Their former business partners in Poland have turned into enemies. And despite some 50 court cases in several European countries, Vivendi hasn't been able to recover a trace of the $2.5 billion it has put into PTC over the years.

Vivendi now is upping the legal stakes. Yesterday it filed suit in U.S. District Court in Seattle against its two rivals for control of the Polish investment: German telephone giant Deutsche Telekom AG and a wealthy Polish investor named Zygmunt Solorz-Zak. Vivendi filed the civil suit under the U.S. RICO law, originally designed to nab gangsters, accusing the defendants of conspiring to seize control of the Polish cellphone company by stealing Vivendi's stake in it. The suit asks for $7.5 billion in damages, or three times Vivendi's investment, because RICO -- the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations law -- permits a tripling of damages.

The battle shows how hotly contested the world's telecom markets have been for Western phone giants, as their fortunes weaken at home. The fight is especially important for Vivendi as it tries to shake off the vestiges of a troubled past under a former chief executive, Jean-Marie Messier, who launched an ill-fated $100 billion acquisition spree. The acquisitions turned the French environmental and water company into the telecom and entertainment business it is now. Along the way, Vivendi owned Universal Studios before selling it to General Electric Co. in 2002.

Over the years, Vivendi has tried to sell, litigate and negotiate its way out of the mess in Poland, to no avail. If Vivendi can reclaim what it says is its rightful share of the Polish mobile-phone company or recover some of its investment, it could further its international expansion plans. But losing would deal Vivendi a major blow, ceding one of Europe's fastest-growing markets to a competitor.

"We can't let improper behavior take over a legitimate business and defy legal principles," says Chief Executive Jean-Bernard Lévy. "Two billion euros went out of the Vivendi door. They have to come back in."

A spokesman for Deutsche Telekom, speaking shortly before the suit was filed, said any allegation that the German company acted outside the law was "absurd." The spokesman, Andreas Leigers, accused Vivendi of "slanderous" actions and maintained that numerous court rulings hold that Deutsche Telekom is the rightful owner of the Polish cellphone company. Asked about the suit after it was filed late yesterday, Mr. Leigers said he hadn't seen the filing and couldn't immediately comment on it.

Mr. Solorz-Zak wasn't available to respond to Vivendi's allegations, said a spokeswoman for Elektrim SA, a Polish holding company that he controls. The spokeswoman, Ewa Bojar, said Vivendi "disregards, ignores and distorts" court rulings that have gone against it in the long-running legal battle.

Vivendi got wind of an opportunity in Poland in 1999. Elektrim, the Polish conglomerate now controlled by Mr. Solorz-Zak, held 37% of PTC. It needed cash to buy out some minority shareholders and increase its stake. Vivendi offered to invest €1.8 billion in a company that it and Elektrim would jointly own. The joint venture would control 51% of PTC shares.

Vivendi had high hopes for the Polish market. It "was still very underdeveloped," says Mr. Houdouin. Poland was to be one of the pillars of Vivendi's push abroad.

Deutsche Telekom already owned 22.5% of PTC. The German company was making an aggressive bet on Poland, and it soon bought out minority shareholders to double its stake to just under 50%. Vivendi's entrance represented a threat, and Deutsche Telekom tried to stop the French firm.

Deutsche Telekom argued that under a longstanding shareholder pact, Elektrim couldn't bring in a new partner without the unanimous approval of PTC's supervisory board. It also maintained that Elektrim's misstep triggered a right that Deutsche Telekom had to acquire Elektrim's stake in PTC at book value. That would give Deutsche Telekom control of the Polish company.

The parties took the dispute to an arbitrator in Vienna. Meanwhile, PTC was run by a CEO and two other executives chosen by Vivendi and Elektrim, as well as by two executives named by the Germans. On PTC's board were four members each from the Deutsche Telekom and the Elektrim-Vivendi sides plus an independent.

Mr. Houdouin recalls the period fondly: "PTC was doing very well. We focused on ... marketing innovation and growth. My job was to make the company as profitable and valuable as possible." But by 2003, he says, "we could see that things were changing."

Elektrim had been taken over by Mr. Solorz-Zak. One of Poland's richest men, Mr. Solorz-Zak had begun as an importer. After the communist era ended in Poland in 1989, he started what became Poland's biggest private television channel, Polsat, giving him wide influence.

PTC's Polish, French and German managers began to bicker. Vivendi blames Mr. Solorz-Zak for the tension, saying that after he joined PTC's supervisory board, tussles over strategy, refinancing and the distribution of dividends followed. "Our life in PTC became hell. Every decision was hostile," Mr. Houdouin says.

In early 2004, Mr. Solorz-Zak fired the law firm that represented Vivendi and Elektrim in the Vienna arbitration against Deutsche Telekom. He hired his own lawyers instead. A month later, he sent a terse letter informing Vivendi that he considered the joint-venture pact that Vivendi and Elektrim had signed in 1999 to be void.

Vivendi was perplexed. At first, "we just thought he wanted more money," says Bruno Curis, a lawyer for Vivendi, noting that Elektrim was under pressure from its bondholders. But Vivendi took the letter as a clear sign its Poland investment was in trouble and decided to cut the cord. It began negotiations toward a settlement with Deutsche Telekom.

In mid-2004, according to Vivendi, terms were drafted in which Deutsche Telekom would buy out Elektrim and Vivendi's stakes in PTC for €1.3 billion. Vivendi would end up booking a loss of around €1 billion on its investment. Vivendi says it was willing to swallow this bitter pill to put behind it one of the missteps of the Messier era. According to Vivendi, Deutsche Telekom Chief Financial Officer Karl-Gerhard Eick in late August 2004 told his Vivendi counterpart, Jacques Espinasse, that they had a deal and "you can put champagne in the fridge."

But in early September, Mr. Eick sent Mr. Espinasse a one-line letter saying, "We are unable to conclude your proposed transaction at this time." Vivendi's Mr. Curis says, "We were distraught. We were confused. We just didn't understand what had happened. It was extremely frustrating for those of us who had spent months on the negotiations."

Deutsche Telekom's spokesman said that no deal had ever been reached. He denied that Mr. Eick had made the comment about champagne.

The French company says that a few weeks later it got a clue about what was going on. A Vivendi executive, Michel Picot, was invited to meet a former Elektrim executive for breakfast at the Hotel George V in Paris. According to Vivendi, the Elektrim man said his company had received a tip that the arbitrators in Vienna would rule invalid the 1999 share transfer that created the Elektrim-Vivendi joint venture. He said Elektrim planned to use the ruling to get out of the joint-venture obligations it had to Vivendi, according to an affidavit by Mr. Picot.

Deutsche Telekom's spokesman said any implication that the German company benefited from insider knowledge of an arbitration tribunal's deliberations is "absurd." In any case, in November 2004, the Vienna arbitration panel did indeed rule that Elektrim hadn't been in a position to transfer shares to the joint venture in 1999.

But the arbitrators also said they didn't have any jurisdiction over the joint venture. Deutsche Telekom and Vivendi both claimed victory. Vivendi says it was so unclear what the arbitration decision actually meant that it hired 10 different law firms to analyze it. It also filed an appeal to the Commercial Court in Austria.

The arbitration ruling needed to be ratified by a Warsaw court. At a hearing in the Warsaw courtroom in early 2005, Vivendi says it had its worst suspicions confirmed: Lawyers for its former partner Elektrim sided with Deutsche Telekom to argue that Vivendi had no right to PTC shares. "We knew that day that Elektrim had betrayed us," Mr. Curis says.

Elektrim didn't respond to requests to characterize its relationship with Deutsche Telekom.

Representatives of Deutsche Telekom and Elektrim then rewrote PTC's shareholder registry, wiping out Vivendi's stake on paper. It was a few days later that PTC's security guards physically removed the French company's executives from the premises.

Since then, court cases have proliferated and appeals have multiplied in several European countries, with the warring sides claiming victories on different fronts. Earlier this year, Vivendi thought it was close to resolving the matter. It says Elektrim and Deutsche Telekom had accepted a proposal that Vivendi and Deutsche Telekom buy out Elektrim and run PTC as a 50/50 joint venture.

On March 29, Vivendi says, lawyers for the three companies sat in a Warsaw office putting the finishing touches on the documents as Vivendi's Mr. Lévy prepared to fly to Poland for a celebratory news conference. Then word arrived of a Polish court ruling in favor of Deutsche Telekom. The German negotiators quickly packed up and left the building without signing the final document.

The Deutsche Telekom spokesman, Mr. Leigers, declined to get into specifics but said that a deal had never been reached. He accused Vivendi of regularly misrepresenting events in the longstanding dispute over PTC.

The battle intensified this fall. Deutsche Telekom said in September it had exercised its right to buy Elektrim's stake -- boosting its PTC holding to 97% -- and had installed a chief executive at the Polish company.

Vivendi dismissed the move as illegal and followed up by offering Deutsche Telekom €2.5 billion for its undisputed 49% stake in PTC.

So exactly who owns what part of PTC remains a mystery: Despite its public statement that it has 97%, Deutsche Telekom recognizes only a 49% stake on its own books.

The German company says it made an initial payment of €600 million for Elektrim's stake in October. It won't say to whom it paid the money, citing the continuing litigation. Elektrim, which is in bankruptcy proceedings in Poland after defaulting on bond payments, is staying mum.

Mr. Houdouin's business card still says the Vivendi executive heads the management board of PTC. But he is watching the Warsaw company from afar as his former German colleagues at PTC run it. Interviewed at a Paris hotel, Mr. Houdouin says, "I have to believe that things will turn around."

Legal experts said it could be difficult to convince a judge that a RICO case involving European companies should be heard on U.S. soil. "Judges have a natural resistance to having a case brought to them that has been tried elsewhere and has been bogged down," said John Coffee, a professor at Columbia Law School.

Lanny Davis, a former White House special counsel whom Vivendi has hired to pursue the RICO case, maintained that U.S. courts have jurisdiction because Deutsche Telekom has both a stock listing in the U.S. and significant U.S. business: the wireless unit T-Mobile USA, based in Bellevue, Wash. Should the case be allowed to proceed, Vivendi would gain subpoena and "discovery" powers that would give it access to internal documents of Deutsche Telekom and Mr. Solorz-Zak.

2 Men Arrested On A Ledge At NOAA Building (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0085692

A pair of environmentalists, protesting what they said are attempts to suppress evidence of global warming, were arrested yesterday after spending several hours perched on a ledge at a National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration building in Silver Spring.

After 8 a.m., the two men used an extension ladder to climb to a roughly 25-foot-high ledge at the building, in the 1300 block of East West Highway, an associate said. They carried a banner reading, "Bush: Let NOAA Tell the Truth" and brought food and drink with them. Other protesters stayed on the sidewalk below.

Authorities tried, without success, to persuade the protesters to leave the ledge, said Lucille Baur, a Montgomery County police spokeswoman. Shortly after noon, officers borrowed a cherry picker from a construction site and brought the men down without a struggle, she said.

The two protesters were charged with disorderly conduct, reckless endangerment and trespassing, Baur said. They were identified as Paul E. Burman, 24, of Arlington and John Theodore Glick, 57, of Bloomfield, N.J.

The two men are members of a group called the U.S. Climate Emergency Council, said Mike Tidwell, the group's director. The group contends that NOAA officials are playing down scientists' findings about the dangers of global warming, including its connection to extreme weather events such as hurricanes and heat waves.

"They are failing at their job," Tidwell said. "They are suppressing scientific information because it is inconvenient data for the Bush administration's fossil-fuel constituency."

A More Efficient US? Energy Agency Prods Only A Bit. (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, October 24, 2006

Under pressure to find new ways to save energy, the US Department of Energy is speeding adoption of new efficiency standards for devices ranging from pool heaters to microwave ovens. President Bush is apparently on board, too, pushing the need for energy conservation in a speech earlier this month.

That's good news for energy advocates and states that have sued DOE for lagging years behind schedule on new appliance standards, which could curb the nation's rising appetite for electricity.

But in the three standards it has proposed itself, the department has set a far lower bar than efficiency advocates had wanted. Two of the standards are so low that even some industry officials are complaining. Earlier this month, DOE surprised nearly everyone by nixing on technical grounds a proposal for home boilers backed by industry and consumer groups.

"It's never happened before that they've rejected a negotiated standard," says Charles Samuels, a Boston lawyer who often represents the Association of Home Appliance Manufacturers.

Such moves are causing many observers - from efficiency advocates to members of Congress - to question how deeply DOE is committed to energy efficiency, despite Mr. Bush's rhetoric.

"We need to continue what we're doing at the federal level, which is ... to find new ways to power our economy, new ways to conserve, new ways to protect the environment through new technologies," he told a renewable energy conference in St. Louis two weeks ago.

Deep-sixing the home-boiler standard has caused the most surprise. Home boilers are used in hot-water and steam heating systems. The efficiency standard that industry and consumer groups had negotiated would have saved users of those systems a total of some $2.6 billion in energy costs through 2030. But in an Oct. 6 response, DOE said: "The Department has determined that the recommended standards are beyond the scope of its legal authority." Instead, it proposed a lower standard expected to save consumers an estimated $1.2 billion through 2030.

Efficiency advocates were upset. So was industry. "We were surprised and disappointed by the decision," says Joseph Mattingly, vice president and general counsel for the Gas Appliance Manufacturers Association. "I've looked into the legislative history. They [DOE officials] have their interpretation of the law. But I haven't found anything to support it."

Admittedly, setting standards is complex, because it involves balancing many factors.

For example: On the same day the DOE rejected the boiler standard, for example, it also rebuffed a tough proposed standard for home furnaces. The American Council for an Energy Efficient Economy was pushing for standards it claims would save about $8 billion of furnace energy over 20 years. Instead, the DOE proposed a standard that 99 percent of furnaces sold in the US already meet.

The reason? The DOE said the more aggressive proposal crossed a legal line. The plan called for regional standards - a tough one for northern states, an easier one in southern states - while the law calls for a single nationwide standard, it argued.

"We have to follow our statutory requirements when evaluating where the current standards are," says David Rodgers, acting deputy assistant secretary for technology development in the DOE's energy efficiency office. "We propose the maximum technology that is feasible and economically justified."

The ACEEE is crying foul. "This is just letting an overly narrow view of the law get in the way of achieving the purpose of the act," says Steve Nadel, the group's executive director.

Some analysts say the department's choices may be the best possible given the pressure from industry and sniping from energy advocates.

"What plaintiffs in those [standards lawsuits] against DOE are still unwilling to accept is that it is really their own actions, along with those of industry, that are piling up legislation and rulemaking agreements," says Mr. Samuels, the Boston lawyer. With dozens of complex rulemakings, the DOE reached gridlock last year, he adds. "The resources were never close to handling the load."

Other analysts, however, note that it took the Bush administration six years to propose its first efficiency standard - for transformers, in August. Even there, the DOE sidestepped several tough standards that were much more energy and cost-effective than the one it proposed.

Executives of nine large electric utilities upbraided the department for not taking a tougher stand. "Given the energy challenges which face the nation, now is not the time to back away from energy savings shown by the DOE to be cost effective," they wrote Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman in a Sept. 26 letter. "We strongly urge you to strengthen the proposed ... transformer standard."

Utility executives were joined by New Mexico's two senators, Pete Domenici (R) and Jeff Bingaman (D), who sit on a committee that oversees the DOE. They chided the department in an Oct. 6 letter for passing over a stronger standard they say would have saved 50 percent more energy.

"At a time when improvements in energy efficiency are critical to our energy security, we believe it does not make sense to ignore these cost-effective energy savings," they wrote.

Frustrated by the DOE's pace, Congress itself rammed through efficiency standards on clothes washers, ceiling fans, and more than a dozen other appliances as part of the Energy Policy Act of 2005, observers say.

An Energy Ruling That's Simply Hot Air (WP)

By Cindy Skrzycki

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

The Energy Department has decided to keep the home fires burning at about the same level as they are now, even in the face of lobbying by both energy conservation groups and some manufacturers.

A proposed "energy conservation standard" that the department unveiled Oct. 6 moved the energy-efficiency needle almost imperceptibly for home gas furnaces -- to 80 percent from 78 percent, the standard set in 1989. The agency rejected an option to raise the standard to 90 percent, which would have saved more energy and trimmed heating bills for consumers in colder climates.

The long-awaited announcement frustrated energy groups that lobbied for a significant increase in efficiency, as well as parts of the industry that wanted to see more robust standards for some heating units.

Department officials said a higher standard wouldn't have been cost-effective for those in states with mild winters to have only the option of buying a furnace that is 90 percent efficient, which means it turns 90 percent of the fuel into heat.

The department also turned down some innovative ideas from energy groups and manufacturers, saying it didn't have the authority to act. The agency rejected the idea of a regional standard, which would make the highest efficiency rating applicable only to the coldest states. Instead, it said states could apply for exemptions to the rule if they wanted a tougher standard.

The regulators also gave thumbs down to a plan advanced by the boiler industry and energy groups to increase efficiency in gas models. They proposed eliminating pilot lights and installing a reset mechanism that automatically adjusts to the outside air temperature.

Setting the standard at 80 percent represents virtually no change, since almost all new regular gas furnaces are at least that efficient.

Furnace makers such as Trane, a division of American Standard Cos. ; Carrier Corp., a division of United Technologies Corp. ; and Lennox International Inc. also sell products that are more than 90 percent efficient. Sales of those models have been brisk in Northeastern states. And three states -- Vermont, Massachusetts and Rhode Island -- have passed laws setting the requirement for gas furnaces at 90 percent, a standard that has to be approved by federal regulators.

Massachusetts residents would pay about $540 more for a furnace rated 90 percent than for a basic unit, yet they could save $125 a year on energy use, according to estimates by the Appliance Standards Awareness Project , a business and consumer-advocacy group in Boston.

The Energy Department "seems to be looking for the narrowest possible way to comply with the law, and cost-effective energy savings were clearly of secondary importance," said Steven Nadel , executive director of the American Council for an Energy-Efficient Economy , a nonprofit research group based in the District.

There is intense interest in the proposal because 3.5 million gas furnaces and 300,000 residential boilers were sold last year.

Department officials said that in rejecting a higher standard, they took into account manufacturers' concerns that there were potential condensation and venting problems when efficiency ratings are set between 80 and 90 percent.

"The department's proposal sets a national standard but still gives states as much flexibility as we can under the statute," said David Rodgers , acting deputy assistant secretary for technology development in the department's Office of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy .

Rodgers said the law requires the agency to consider standards that are economically justifiable and technologically feasible and that save a significant amount of energy.

Under the Energy Policy and Conservation Act, the Energy Department is charged with reviewing the efficiency of commercial and residential appliances and equipment, including refrigerators, washers and dryers, air conditioning and furnaces.

The agency has fallen years behind in issuing the efficiency standards and is under pressure from Congress to get on a schedule and stick with it. In September 2005, the Natural Resources Defense Council , a national environmental group, joined with 15 states and two consumer organizations in going to court in New York. They asked that the department face a legally binding deadline for issuing 22 energy-efficiency standards -- including this one.

In a report to Congress last January, the agency said it is committed to addressing the backlog and has set "firm and achievable" schedules.

In the case of furnaces and boilers, work on a new standard began in 1993 but didn't receive priority status at the Energy Department until 2001. The first published notice of a rulemaking came in July 2004, and the department expects to complete the rule sometime next year. Much to the chagrin of energy advocates, it said the effective date won't be until Jan. 1, 2015.

"It's absurd to set such a weak standard and not implement until 2015," said Andrew deLaski , executive director of the Appliance Standards Awareness Project.

Joseph Mattingly , general counsel for the Gas Appliance Manufacturers Association in Arlington, said the industry urged setting the standard at 80 percent because that level avoids safety concerns.

"In a perfect world, the units would be installed according to manufacturers' instructions, so we have to have something that is forgiving of less-than-perfect installation," Mattingly said. He said consumers who don't live in cold-weather states were not likely to need a high-efficiency furnace.

Energy advocates tried to address cost and safety issues by supporting a regional standard: 90 percent for cold Northern states and 80 percent for warmer states.

The industry opposed that and likes the idea of states setting their own standards even less. It told the Energy Department that encouraging states to override the federal standard is "an abuse of discretion."

A big disappointment for both sides was the department's rejection of an agreement among 28 manufacturers of oil and gas boilers and four energy-efficiency organizations.

"DOE at every juncture finds a reason to follow a less energy-efficient path," deLaski said. "Even when business says, 'Give us more efficiency,' they say no."

Mattingly said the industry will ask the department to make a "limited policy exemption" to accept the agreement. Energy groups said adopting it would save twice as much energy for gas boilers than the standard the department proposed.

Risky Renewable Business (WT)

By Charles Vinick

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

Five years ago, when developers applied for a federal permit to build the world's largest offshore wind-energy project off the Cape Cod coast, a widely held presumption was that the project ought to go forward because wind power is inherently good and that Nantucket Sound was as good a place as any to begin the off-shore renewable energy movement.

But the Cape Wind project hasn't moved forward and remains mired in controversy as evidence piles up that its developers chose perhaps the worst location. So, instead of leading the renewable energy movement into the future, Cape Wind may be imperiling that very movement by ignoring legitimate and serious flaws in its project.

Consider the record now confronting this project:

n In a study released Sept. 28, the Department of Defense announced that wind plants can interfere with military radar systems if built in the radar's line of sight. The early warning radar (PAVE PAWS) at Cape Cod Air Force Station is one of only two such systems in the continental U.S. and is near the site selected by Cape Wind for their proposed complex of 130 turbines, each now 440 feet in height. Early warning radars are necessary to detect and track objects at extreme ranges, with high confidence and accuracy, and are critical to national security.

n Earlier this year, Congress mandated that the Coast Guard assess navigation hazards posed by the Cape Wind project in Nantucket Sound because the project's location, which is in a very high vessel traffic area within a triangle bordered by ferry routes and the main shipping lane, clearly puts passenger travel and general maritime traffic at risk.

n The developer finally disclosed in a recent report to the federal Minerals Management Service (MMS), now responsible for the federal permit review process, that if its storage tanks holding 40,000 gallons of transformer oil are breached and spill their contents into Nantucket Sound, the oil has a better than 90 percent chance of reaching and soiling Sound-facing beaches (not to mention the devastating impact on wildlife).

n More than 400,000 flights a year through Nantucket Sound airspace would have to pass just above a field of 130 turbines, each 440 feet tall, just 60 feet short of the 500-foot floor that small aircraft fly above. Cape Approach air traffic controllers long ago dubbed this project "an accident waiting to happen." The Defense Department study acknowledges the need for the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) to undertake additional testing of radar interference with air traffic control radar systems.

And still Cape Wind shrugs its shoulders, implying that there are no serious issues.

When Rep. William Delahunt, Massachusetts Democrat, called for the FAA to study radar interference and the project's potential risk to aviation, Cape Wind dismissed the request as "desperate" and "suspect."

The very same government that promotes the development of renewable energy must also make assessments along the way about the appropriateness of individual projects and whether or not the public's best interests are being served or whether the projects pose unacceptable risks. That is neither desperate nor suspect, but a responsible reaction when lives are potentially at risk.

Saying no to Cape Wind is not saying no to offshore wind energy; it is simply an acknowledgement that legitimate concerns over public safety, wildlife endangerment and economic impacts -- to name a few of the leading concerns -- outweigh any benefits that might come from siting Cape Wind in Nantucket Sound.

And there was nothing desperate or suspect when Cape and Island communities insisted on a legitimate assessment of oil spill risk even though the developer dragged its heels on producing such an assessment. It is no wonder that they wouldn't want communities to know that 40,000 gallons of a potentially toxic substance sits just off their beaches, but we have a right to know and they have a duty to tell us.

Cape Wind long ago tried to frame this as a battle between wealthy landowners and a benevolent developer trying to lead the country to energy independence. But this has always been about whether that developer should be allowed to enrich himself from publicly owned land and publicly funded subsidies and tax credits in the middle of a state-protected marine sanctuary while putting our safety and our very culture at risk.

It appears that Cape Wind has finally reached the tipping point, and that the answer is no. We need to view the $1.3 billion in state and federal subsidies that Cape Wind would reap from this project as our money, our investment in renewable energy, and take that off the table so we can look to more viable projects in which to invest public funds and resources.

Lead Poisoning Eyed As Threat To California Condor (USAT)

By John Ritter

USA Today, October 24, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — One of the great feel-good environmental stories of the past 30 years is the recovery of the majestic California condor, North America's largest bird, a scavenger-turned-billboard for the campaign to save endangered species.

On the brink of extinction, saved by a captive-breeding program, the condor population has grown from just 22 birds in 1982 to 289 today; 135 are in the wild and more are released every year.

Even so, condors have failed to gain a secure foothold in the hills and deserts of California and Arizona because of lead poisoning, the most often diagnosed cause of death, environmentalists say.

Environmental groups say the most likely source is condors' eating of game that was shot by hunters using lead bullets. Frustrated that most hunters have not switched to substitutes, the Natural Resources Defense Council (NRDC) and other groups notified California officials in July that they will sue under the Endangered Species Act to force a ban.

At a meeting of state fish and game staff this month to discuss potential hunting-rule changes to recommend, the groups again asked for a ban on lead ammunition. A decision is likely early next year. Lead shot used in shotguns to hunt waterfowl has been prohibited since the 1980s.

Andrew Wexler of the NRDC's endangered species project says, “The commissioners have a historic opportunity. It's a mystery why they've resisted a ban because the scientific evidence is so overwhelming.”

That evidence isn't conclusive, says Steve Williams, president of the Wildlife Management Institute, whose goal is to restore North American wildlife. “There are other potential pathways for lead,” says Williams, a former director of the Fish and Wildlife Service in the Bush administration. “I wouldn't speculate on what those other sources may be.” He's “happy to learn that hunters are taking action on their own” but says more study is needed.

Many hunters who have tried alternatives, mainly copper bullets that don't poison wildlife, find them as good or better than traditional ammunition, though more expensive. A high-performance copper bullet costs $2 to $2.50, about $1 more than lead.

At a “free shoot” last weekend at a range near Pinnacles National Monument in Central California — prime condor habitat — hunters and ranchers were invited to try copper bullets. In questionnaires filled out afterward, more than 90% approved.

Some groups, such as the National Shooting Sports Foundation, oppose a ban, though they support efforts to reduce lead exposure in condors and other animals that feed on carrion, eagles among them. These groups say voluntary hunting practices would achieve the same goal, including removing carcasses from the field and burying “gut piles,” an animal's inedible portions.

“Clearly hunters have shown in studies that they're very willing to adopt one of those management steps,” says Rick Patterson, director of the shooting foundation, which sets standards for firearms and ammunition manufacturing. He says studies have shown that some hunters resist the added cost of copper bullets.

The coalition that threatened the lawsuit says a July study that analyzed blood of condors in the wild and compared it with blood of captive birds proves that lead from bullets is poisoning and killing condors.

The study in the journal Environmental Science & Technology was the first to identify a lead isotope in bullets bought at retail outlets in condor country and then match it to lead found in condor blood. Twenty of 26 condors sampled had high lead levels, and many exceeded levels toxic to humans.

“It's very analogous to situations we still encounter with kids who eat chips of lead-based paint,” says Donald Smith, a professor of environmental toxicology at the University of California, Santa Cruz, who worked on the study. “The chip might be small but have very high levels of lead in it, and it doesn't take much to cause lead poisoning.”

Supporters of a lead ban say hunters and their families also are at risk. Studies in Greenland and Canada have found elevated lead levels in people who eat seabirds and other animals shot with lead ammunition. On contact, a lead bullet fragments into tiny pieces and powder that disperses well beyond the wound.

“Subsistence hunters especially who hunt for most of their protein, if they have kids in the household, to me that's a significant potential risk,” Smith says.

Condors, flying as high as 15,000 feet with 9-foot wingspans, spot a meal and go straight to the bullet wound, because that's the easiest place to feed. They'll eat almost any dead mammal, from a squirrel to a cow.

California's fish and game commission last year rejected an emergency ban on lead bullets, and bills in the Legislature to outlaw them in hunting died twice. Groups such as Ventana Wildlife Society urge an approach like Arizona's. The state offered free non-lead bullets to hunters last year in areas frequented by condors. Nearly two-thirds accepted them, and condor lead-exposure rates fell 40% from 2004, according to Arizona's game and fish department.

Ventana wants California lawmakers to approve $200,000 a year for five years to pay for coupons that hunters could redeem for free or reduced-price non-lead bullets. “That's a million bucks. Big deal,” says Ventana's president, Kelly Sorenson. “Compared to the total cost we're spending on the condor recovery program, it's a small price to pay.”

That program, involving state and federal agencies, zoos, foundations and universities, has cost at least $40 million, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service says.

USA's Trees Under Relentless Attack From Bugs, Blight (USAT)

By Patrick O'driscoll

USA Today, October 24, 2006

DENVER — Some of the USA's most treasured tree species, from ash and aspen to white pine and Hawaii's native wiliwili, are under attack by insects and diseases in a growing assault coast to coast.

Some of the killers are foreign pests brought here in cargo or by travelers. Others are homegrown insects at epidemic levels because of drought and unusual warmth. This year has been the warmest on record.

The Agriculture Department's Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service finished adopting new rules this summer barring cargo from abroad unless crates and pallets are treated with chemicals or heat to kill any bugs in the wood.

DOJ_NMG_0085697

"We're at one of those points in time where it's all happening at once," says Wayne Shepperd of the U.S. Forest Service.

The mountain pine beetle, a native, has ravaged millions of acres of Western forests. Trees were weakened by drought or subjected to worse infestations because warmer temperatures allowed the bugs to multiply faster. The emerald ash borer from Asia is killing species that have no natural defenses.

Ash borers can spread in diseased trees cut up for firewood. The Agriculture Department airs radio ads in eight states and has billboards that warn: "Pack marshmallows, not firewood."

California's Big Sur region and Sonoma and Humboldt counties have "tons of new mortality this year" from sudden oak death, another disease, says Katie Palmieri of the California Oak Mortality Task Force. "Entire hillsides are just gone."

A nursery shipment is blamed for spreading the hemlock woolly adelgid into Great Smoky Mountains National Park in Tennessee and North Carolina. The park hopes to save older hemlocks by using insecticides and beetles that eat the aphid-like bugs.

Scientists don't yet know what is killing aspens across much of the West. "This die-back just occurs, boom, and we're not seeing new sprouting" of trees, Shepperd says. He says drought is a possible cause, but "we see (aspen) dying in wet areas, too, so I'm not convinced it's drought alone."

A study this year in BioScience said exotic bugs and diseases "pose the most serious current threat to the forests of eastern North America."

At This Gathering, The Only Alternative Is To Be Alternative (NYT)

By Patricia Leigh Brown

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

SAN RAFAEL, Calif., Oct. 21 — Along with Santa Ana winds and ripe persimmons, fall here brings with it a migratory phenomenon known as The Bioneers, a three-day pep rally for environmentalists, lefty political activists and young people with "Renewable Energy is Homeland Security" bumper stickers that transforms the Marin Civic Center here into something of a megachurch for the Prius set.

For some 3,200 true believers, and about 10,000 others who were beamed in by satellite from simultaneous conferences in Logan, Utah; Honolulu and other far-flung places, the Bioneers is part tribal gathering and part support group that encourages adherents to connect with their inner Al Gore. (The name is a play on biodiversity and pioneers).

Students, organic farmers, architects, advocates for Pacific dolphins, and a growing number of entrepreneurs looking to invest in green technology come to hear the latest thinking on global warming (code word: Katrina) and keeping the food supply safe (buzzword: spinach). Alternative energy, Bioremediation and environmental justice, once-fringy issues, have over the course of the conference's 17-year history become part of the national dialog.

"It's biology as a metaphor for social change," said Paul Hawken, the author founder of Smith & Hawken. Mr. Hawken double-dipped, speaking at a satellite conference in Marion, Mass., and then flying back to Marin. "It's a parallel universe," he said.

It's a universe unto its own, all right. Paul E. Stamets, a mycologist and the founder of Fungi Perfecti, a mail-order mushroom business, lectured on "myco-remediation," or using fungi to restore toxic waste sites. Mr. Stamets also announced a new patent for a household pesticide that uses the mold state of the Cordyceps mushroom to kill 100,000 to 200,000 species of insects — a new eco- spin on the old Roach Motel.

Mr. Stamets shared the stage with Jay Harman, an Australian-born naturalist who is now the chief executive of Pax Scientific, an engineering company rooted in "biomimicry," a fledgling science that takes its inspiration from nature's designs and processes.

Mr. Harman showed a small device capable of circulating five million gallons of water, using only a light bulb's worth of electricity. "It's all about flow," he said, adding that the technology can be applied it to aircraft, fans, pumps and water circulators for reservoirs.

Activists talking about the environmental exploitation of native lands for oil and gas development — or what Clayton Thomas-Muller, a Canadian organizer for the Indigenous Environmental Network called "energy genocide" — communed with vendors from the Elixir Café who were doling out $2 hits of "Lavender Bliss, a viscous purple liquid billed as a decongestant for "blocked energy."

The conference is the brainchild of Kenny Ausubel, a 57-year old writer and filmmaker who was co-founder of the organic seed company Seeds of Change, and Nina Simons, the former president of the company and a former marketing director for Odwalla. Since 1990, they have operated from an old schoolhouse in Lamy, N.M., outside Santa Fe. They credit their experience with Seeds of Change, since sold, with convincing them that a fledgling political movement could be forged from issues like sustainable agriculture and green technology — fields, Mr. Ausubel said, "that in 1990 were like talking about U.F.O.'s."

Since then, the culture has in some ways caught up. For instance, Mr. Ausubel has been an adviser to the actor Leonardo DiCaprio, whose forthcoming feature-length documentary on global warming, "The 11th Hour," was filmed extensively at last year's Bioneers conference.

"The issues they were raising a decade ago, from local food to rooftop power, have moved into the mainstream," said Bill McKibben, a writer who spoke at last year's conference. "The Bioneers has been consistently ahead of the curve. It began as a gathering place for a fairly small number of like-minded people but is now a hatchery for the next wave of important ideas that five years hence people will be talking about in Rotary Clubs."

The ground troops of the environmental movement, Mr. Harman said, "are not business-savvy — they want to make a difference but don't know how to do it." So they came to learn sophisticated tactics from people like Tzeporah Berman, the program director of ForestEthics, a nonprofit organization founded in 1994 to protect endangered forests. It successfully pressured Office Depot and Staples to phase out supply paper made from endangered old growth forests and persuaded Ikea not to use wood from the temperate rain forest now known as Great Bear, in British Columbia.

John Maus, a 67 year old contractor from Littleton, Colo., who builds Starbucks stored — which he defended as "meeting places" — came to the conference for the latest intelligence on green building. "The industry is slow to change and uses huge amounts of natural resources," Mr. Maus said. "We need to develop a conscience."

Despite its mantra of biodiversity, the conclave itself can sometimes feel a bit like a monoculture, a love-fest between graying activists and youthful idealists with blond dreadlocks and veggie-fueled cars, most of them Caucasian. "It's a conference of privilege," said Brennan Manoakeesick, 28, an Oji-cree from Winnipeg who is working with low-income neighborhoods. "We're here to provide a context, to give face to the faceless."

William Casey, an eye surgeon and olive grower from St. Helena in the Napa Valley, stood out in a button-down shirt. He came with his wife, Rachel, to keep tabs on the latest trends in integrative pest management. Inspired by last year's Bioneers, they put up songbird houses and added carnivorous plants in their olive groves to control the olive fruit fly. South African guinea fowl now roam the premises destroying larvae.

"We get tremendous energy from it," Mr. Casey said of the gathering. "It's like the Big Bang."

Danbury News Times, October 23, 2006

A Brooklyn man who federal prosecutors said provided a Danbury drug ring with powder and crack cocaine has been sentenced to 15 years in prison by a federal judge.

Jose Adames, 33, was the principal supplier to the ring, headed by Danbury resident Alex Luna, before the operation was smashed by local police and federal investigators last year. He pleaded guilty to conspiring to distribute up to 150 kilograms of cocaine in May in U.S. District Court in Bridgeport.

Adames was sentenced Friday by Judge Stefan Underhill.

U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said Adames and other individuals "made frequent trips from New York City to Danbury" to deliver kilogram-sized quantities of the drugs to Luna and other members of Luna's organization. In making the deliveries, Adames and his associates used vehicles with secret compartments designed to conceal the narcotics from authorities.

Local ring members also would go to meeting places in the Bronx, Brooklyn and Manhattan to pick up cocaine from Adames, authorities said.

Members of the Danbury police Special Investigations Division, working with federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents and Bridgeport police, broke up the operation in February 2005, and arrested 24 people.

Luna and several other defendants haven't yet been sentenced, O'Connor said.

Longview Man Sentenced To 30 Years In Methamphetamine Case (NJ)

News Journal, October 24, 2006

A 25-year-old Longview man, who was among seven people arrested in a 2003 drug investigation, was sentenced Monday to 30 years in federal prison.

Christopher Jack Collum was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Leonard Davis, Tyler, according to U.S. Attorney Matthew D. Orwig.

DOJ_NMG_0085699

According to information presented in court, an investigation began in January 2003 into the distribution of "ice" methamphetamine in East Texas. The investigation resulted in the arrest of seven people. A 14-count indictment was returned by a federal grand jury in January 2005, charging Collum and six co-defendants with federal drug violations.

Collum pleaded guilty to conspiring to possess with intent to distribute methamphetamine.

This case was investigated by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the Gregg County Sheriff's Department and the Gregg County CODE Unit.

Man Gets 7-year Sentence In Ecstasy Case (LCJ)

Louisville Courier-Journal, October 23, 2006

A 30-year-old man was sentenced to more than seven years in prison Monday in U.S. District Court for his part in an ecstasy-distribution ring in Louisville.

Thao Hoang Lai had previously pleaded guilty to conspiring to possess with the intent to distribute and distributing the drug ecstasy in 2003 and 2004, according to the U.S. Attorney's office.

Lai, a U.S. citizen who has lived in Louisville and Philadelphia, also admitted in a guilty plea that he possessed the drug with the intent to distribute it on Jan. 12, 2005.

He was apprehended by the DEA that day after driving to Louisville to deliver 5,000 tablets of ecstasy — tablets that were found in his hotel room, according to court testimony.

About 51,000 ecstasy pills with a street value of more than $1 million were involved in all of the charges, attorneys said.

Two others have been sentenced to prison in the drug conspiracy with Lai — Vinh Ngoc Ha received to more than 12½ years and Hoang Van Nguyen nearly six years.

Eight people were arrested in January and February of 2004 in an ecstasy investigation by the DEA. Six more were arrested in the months afterward.

"We knew there was a lot of ecstasy out there, but this surprised us," Tony H. King, head of the DEA in Louisville, said at the time the 14 indictments were handed down. "Louisville was a major distribution point for this drug in Kentucky and surrounding areas."

Florida Man Gets 13 Years In Lipitor Case (KCBIZ)

The Kansas City Business Journal, October 24, 2006

A Florida man was sentenced in federal court in Kansas City on Monday for his role in a multimillion-dollar conspiracy to sell counterfeit, illegally imported and misbranded Lipitor and other drugs.

U.S. District Judge Ortrie Smith sentenced Julio Cesar Cruz, 43, a Cuban citizen who was living in Miami, to 13 years and six months in federal prison without parole, Bradley Schlozman, U.S. attorney for the Western District of Missouri, said in a release.

"Cruz was a key player in an international, multimillion-dollar conspiracy," Schlozman said. "Cruz made millions of dollars during the criminal scheme, but he will not be allowed to enjoy any of those profits."

Cruz pleaded guilty on Jan. 21, 2005, to selling counterfeit drugs and to participating in a conspiracy to buy and sell counterfeit, misbranded and illegally imported drugs from February 2002 until at least April 2003.

The court sentenced Cruz to eight years and six months for the criminal conspiracy and revoked the term of supervised release that Cruz was serving for an unrelated federal offense for cocaine trafficking at the time he committed this offense, Schlozman said.

The five-year sentence for violating his supervised release must be served consecutively with the sentence in the criminal conspiracy.

As part of his plea agreement, Cruz has forfeited $2 million to the government, which represents proceeds from the conspiracy.

The court also ordered Cruz to pay $1.8 million in restitution to Pfizer Inc. He is liable for that restitution along with several other defendants in separate but related cases, Schlozman said. The restitution will be paid by a $2.2 million civil forfeiture that H.D. Smith Wholesale Drug Co. agreed to pay to the federal government on May 10.

Cruz is one of several defendants who were involved in the conspiracy and have been sentenced in separate, but related, cases:

Domingo Gonzalez, 43, of Hialeah, Fla., was sentenced on June 30 to nine years and six months in federal prison without parole. Gonzalez's principal role was to supervise and direct how the South American and counterfeit prescription drugs were smuggled into the United States. He also played a key role in controlling warehouses where the South American and counterfeit prescription drugs were stored in Miami, and getting the drugs packaged for shipment out of Miami to various locations in the United States for repackaging.

Iggy Santisteban, 52, of Miami, was sentenced to three years and one month in federal prison without parole. Santisteban was convicted by a federal jury on Feb. 17 for his role in the conspiracy. Between October and November 2002, Santisteban printed counterfeit drug labels for Lipitor and other drugs. The labels were placed on bottles containing counterfeit, illegally imported and diverted tablets, which were distributed throughout the United States. Santisteban sub-contracted with other Miami-area printers for some of the labels. His printing company, Iggy Prints, went bankrupt in March 2003.

Robert Goodman, 42, of Miami, was sentenced on Sept. 14, to two years in federal prison without parole. Goodman pleaded guilty on March 31, 2005, to his role in the conspiracy, which involved transporting the counterfeit prescription drugs from the airport to a bonded warehouse. Rather than transporting the cargo directly from the airport to the bonded warehouse, as required by law, Goodman delivered the containers to another warehouse where they were opened and the counterfeit drugs removed and replaced with Epsom salts. The containers were then resealed and delivered to the bonded warehouse.

Senior Litigation Counsel Gene Porter prosecuted the cases, which were investigated by the Office of Criminal Investigations of the U.S. Food and Drug Administration.

Pot Clinics, Cards Up For Votes City Expected To Ban Dispensaries; County Will Decide On Issuing IDs (MB)

Modesto Bee, October 23, 2006

The City Council is expected to vote Tuesday night on permanently banning medical marijuana dispensaries, three weeks after the federal Drug Enforcement Administration shut down Modesto's only pot clinic.

That same day, the Stanislaus County Board of Supervisors is scheduled to vote on installing a program to issue medical marijuana cards through the state Department of Health Services.

It could be a long day for medical marijuana supporters, with officials at both meetings lining up against pot dispensaries.

"I'm opposed to the medical marijuana card in the first place," Supervisor Ray Simon said. "I am concerned about its abuse and the great potential for abuse."

State law permits sick people to use medical marijuana; federal law does not. Cities and counties have been trying to balance the two since California approved its Compassionate Use Act 10 years ago.

The Modesto council 10 months ago tried to close the McHenry Avenue clinic by banning for-profit cannabis dispensaries, but the California Healthcare Collective was a nonprofit and remained open.

The council had to overrule the city's Planning Commission to implement its first law. This time, the commission supports banning dispensaries.

Chairwoman Alita Roberts said she and other planning commissioners changed their minds after seeing police reports that described healthy people getting the drug from the clinic.

Police contend some people easily obtained fake doctor's recommendations to buy marijuana at the collective, and others purchased cannabis on the street from the patients.

"I wish there were a way that it could be made available to people who are really, really sick, but somehow it just didn't seem to work the way the city of Modesto had it," Roberts said.

The Police Department and the DEA say the clinic was a front to sell marijuana to people who didn't need it.

Directors pleaded innocent

People who worked or shopped at the Modesto collective said directors took pains to check doctor's recommendations and keep out people who didn't have cards for use of the drug.

Its directors, Ricardo Montes and Luke Scarmazzo, on Oct. 13 pleaded innocent to federal drug distribution charges. Their lawyer has maintained that they opened a legal business in compliance with state law.

Medical marijuana supporters say the city could avoid some of the problems it encountered by regulating the clinics more closely.

"Well-controlled regulations are much more preferable to a ban," said Aaron Smith, a statewide coordinator for Safe Access Now. "You're basically throwing patients on the streets, saying 'You can use medical marijuana but you have to go to some street corner to a drug dealer.'"

Smith said one tool to regulate the drug in the county could be the medical marijuana cards that supervisor Simon opposes.

"This gives the legitimate patients an option to make sure that, whoever they show this card to, that it is backed up and verified by the county," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0085701

The state requires counties to issue cards, but three counties are suing the attorney general's office to overturn the law. The counties — Merced, San Diego and Riverside — argue the state is forcing them to break a federal law. A court hearing is scheduled Nov. 16.

Simon said he wants to see what happens with that lawsuit before installing the card program.

Mary Ann Lee, managing director of the county Health Services Agency, said her department wants direction from supervisors about whether to proceed.

If the supervisors tell the county to implement the cards, Lee's department would be responsible for verifying doctor's recommendations for medical marijuana use and then forwarding information to the state health agency, which would issue the cards.

Cops opposed to cards

Smith said the cards would make it easier for police to determine who has justifiable need for medical marijuana, but Stanislaus County's top cops oppose the cards.

Modesto Police Chief Roy Wasden wrote a letter to supervisors in August lobbying against the cards. The Stanislaus County Sheriff's Department also wants supervisors to hold off on the program, Assistant Sheriff Bill Heyne said.

"We're not opposed to people using a drug that benefits them because of their physical ailment; that's not the issue," Heyne said. "What this is leading to is abuse by anyone and everyone."

The Stanislaus County Board of Supervisors meets at 9 a.m. Tuesday in the basement chamber at Tenth Street Place, Modesto. The Modesto City Council meets at 5:30 p.m. Tuesday in the basement chamber of Tenth Street Place.

Lawyer: Merriman Drug Test Stems From Supplement (AP)

By Bernie Wilson, Associated Press

AP, October 23, 2006

SAN DIEGO – Shawne Merriman's attorney said the Chargers' star linebacker failed a drug test because of a tainted supplement and will continue to play while appealing his four-game suspension.

Attorney David Cornwell said he believed Merriman tested positive for the steroid nandrolone, which is prohibited under the NFL's substance abuse policy. Cornwell said the substance was in a supplement Merriman has been taking.

“He did not go into the back alley somewhere and put a needle in his butt for steroids,” Cornwell said at a news conference Monday, nearly two hours after Merriman practiced with the Chargers following Sunday's 30-27 loss at Kansas City.

Merriman said he spoke with his teammates and coaches earlier in the day, and “apologized to them for this being a distraction, especially the critical time we're going through as a team.”

“Hopefully nobody makes any kind of judgment or anything that basically makes me guilty for anything because nothing has been done wrong on my part,” Merriman said. “And I will try to get it straightened out as soon as possible. As of right now I'm not missing any time.”

The 22-year-old Merriman was last year's NFL Defensive Rookie of the Year and started in the Pro Bowl after leading the Chargers with 10 sacks. Merriman is second on the team with 5½ sacks.

“I have no reason to do anything wrong, especially when I'm already in the spotlight and doing things and trying to present to people the right and wrong way to go about things,” Merriman said. “This is obviously a mistake that has to be dealt with correctly.”

Cornwell said nandrolone “is the primary culprit in tainted supplements.”

“I know that people get tired of hearing it, but it is a fact and it is not going to go away until the Congress of the United States deals with it,” Cornwell said. “Supplements are not regulated and it is a dirty fact of this industry that many of them are tainted with prohibited substances and men like Shawne get hooked up and get penalized for taking something that they didn't know was present in the supplement.

“That's why this is such an evil process,” the attorney said. “He has been playing, unwittingly, Russian roulette with his career because he's been taking the same supplements, and it has been subjected to testing, and hasn't yielded a positive test. So he thought the supplements that he was taking were as safe.”

Besides Merriman's suspension, the Chargers have had five separate off-field issues dating back to April.

Outside linebacker Steve Foley was shot three times outside his suburban home on Sept. 3 by an off-duty police officer who suspected him of drunk driving. Foley will miss the entire season and was charged with two counts of DUI.

Safety Terrence Kiel was arrested on five felony drug counts in September and has pleaded not guilty.

Cornerback Markus Curry, who had been demoted to the practice squad, was released on Oct. 9, just hours after he was arrested on suspicion of committing domestic violence.

DOJ_NMG_0085702

Foley and linebacker Shaun Phillips were each arrested for scuffling with San Diego police officers a week apart in April. Neither was charged.

Trial Put Off For Mosque Raid Figure (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 24, 2006

A convicted rapist whose arrest on illegal weapons charges caused a stir at a North Side mosque in June was set to go on trial yesterday in Utah, but the case has been postponed.

A federal judge in Salt Lake City has pushed back the trial date for Larry M. Williams, 33, of Lincoln-Lemington, to Feb. 19.

He was charged federally with illegal possession of a pistol and ammunition following a traffic stop in Utah on June 27.

His case caused a controversy on the North Side three days later when the FBI and the Pittsburgh police arrested him at the Light of the Age Mosque at Hemlock and Boyle streets. Authorities have not conceded that the building is a true mosque, and some have described it as a flophouse.

But those living there or visiting at the time of the arrest said it is a house of worship and decried the police action during Friday prayer services as an "invasion."

Mr. Williams, reportedly a member of the mosque, was taken into custody on the street, and agents and police said they searched only one room of the house. Federal authorities said the arrest had nothing to do with any activities at the mosque, but rather occurred because Mr. Williams was a dangerous fugitive.

Court papers filed in Utah indicate agents and police were executing an arrest warrant for Mr. Williams based on his weapons charge and the fact that he did not register as a sex offender after his rape conviction in the state of Washington. A Pennsylvania State Police Megan's Law form shows his address as 1373 Montezuma St.

During the June 27 traffic stop, the Utah Highway Patrol said Mr. Williams had a .45-caliber pistol, 15 rounds of ammo and a magazine for an assault weapon. The trooper seized the gun and the bullets, but let Mr. Williams keep the clip and allowed him to leave, not realizing he could be arrested on federal weapons charges.

Federal agents then tracked him down to the house on the North Side three days later.

Mr. Williams is being prosecuted in Utah under Project Safe Neighborhoods, a U.S. Justice Department initiative to combat illegal guns and gun violence.

Because Mr. Williams has felony convictions for rape and robbery, he isn't allowed to have a gun and could go to federal prison for at least five years.

His lawyer has filed a motion to throw out the case by challenging the reason for the initial traffic stop. The trooper said he pulled over Mr. Williams because his car had tinted windows, a violation of Utah law.

IMMIGRATION:

Number Of Illegal Immigrants On Prisoner Flights Jumps (MCT)

By Michael Doyle

McClatchy Newspapers, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON - Con Air is becoming big business, thanks to illegal immigrants and criminal aliens.

And this is one flight you definitely want to miss.

Federal officials flew 95,876 incarcerated illegal immigrants and criminal aliens around the country in 2005, a 28 percent increase since 2000. Those foreign nationals now account for nearly half of all the passengers flown on the highly guarded federal flights, a new audit found, and tougher border security efforts will boost numbers even higher.

Unfortunately, the auditors warn, the flights could outpace federal planning. Officials haven't been looking far enough into the future, leaving the program vulnerable to nasty surprises.

"(Officials) could be caught off-guard by changes in demand and customers," the Justice Department Office of Inspector General auditors caution in the new report.

Popularized as "Con Air" in a Hollywood movie of the same name, the prisoner flights are coordinated by the U.S. Marshals Service through a Kansas City, Mo., office, and carried a total of 181,948 prisoners in 2005.

The passengers shuttle among about 40 domestic and international cities, and they come in many different stripes.

Some are being extradited, or transported to their new federal prison homes. Many illegal immigrants or criminal aliens are heading to deportation centers, and then to their home countries.

DOJ_NMG_0085703

Since 1995, the number of undocumented immigrants and criminal aliens flown under guard has grown 826 percent. Most are now being returned to Honduras, Guatemala, El Salvador and the Dominican Republic.

"Now we're at 115,000 (prisoners transported) and counting this year," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told reporters at a briefing in August. "It will be a record year for us with the total number of movements."

The Marshals Service officials who run the flight program said they can simply lease more planes and hire more guards as needed. The Office of Inspector General is skeptical.

"Leasing additional planes on an emergency basis is not only reactive," the auditors cautioned, "but is also more expensive compared to longer-term aircraft leases."

Buying a new Boeing 737 would cost $540 million over 30 years. Leasing the same aircraft would cost $840 million over the same period. But because of year-to-year budgeting, the lease appears cheaper in the short term.

Marshals Service spokeswoman Nikki Credic said Monday that officials found the new 118-page audit "helpful" and indicated that they will follow up on the key recommendations, including improving long-term planning.

"Major changes need to be implemented to enhance the program," Credic said.

The Marshals Service owns three airplanes and leases six more for the flights. Even this doesn't handle all the traffic. Immigration authorities in 2005 had to charter airplanes or buy individual tickets to handle an additional 62,017 illegal immigrant and criminal alien passengers - at a cost of $63 million.

Costs pile up in other ways. Immigration and Customs Enforcement must pay for round-trip deportation flights to foreign countries even though the return flight is usually empty.

Domestic flights likewise can take off with too many empty seats. Every weekday afternoon, for instance, a plane leaves Mesa, Ariz., to pick up undocumented immigrants and criminal aliens in California and other Western states. Two out of three seats are empty on these flights, and auditors suggest flying less often but with fuller planes.

Immigration officials explained they didn't have enough lead time to use the same scheduling system as other federal agencies.

The auditors kept secret how many guards are supposed to be on each plane run by what's formally called the Justice Prisoner and Alien Transportation System. They cautioned, though, that the ratio of prisoners to guards was too high in 13 percent of the flights studied. Hangar guards are also frequently shorthanded, the auditors found.

Ceremony To Accompany Border Fence Bill Signing (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

Congress yesterday sent the bill to build 700 miles of fencing on the U.S.-Mexico border to President Bush, who will sign it in a ceremony Thursday morning in the White House Roosevelt Room.

The decision to have a public ceremony is a reversal for the Bush administration, which had appeared reluctant to tie itself so publicly to the enforcement-only measure. Although Mr. Bush had committed to signing the bill, aides had said consistently over the past few weeks there would not be a signing ceremony.

But Republicans in Congress had demanded a public signing, with leaders saying the bill is a major accomplishment that will help their re-election prospects.

"The American people demand a secure border, and this Republican Congress has responded to the American people's demand for a secure border by increasing the physical barriers and infrastructure along the border and by providing state of the art monitoring technology," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, said in a joint statement trumpeting the bill's official transmission yesterday morning.

They had held onto the bill in order to guarantee Mr. Bush's signature closer to the election, when it would have the biggest impact. Aides said they were also holding out for a signing ceremony, to use the presidential pulpit for maximum attention.

By yesterday evening, several congressional offices said they received invitations to a signing ceremony on Thursday at the White House, and House Republicans said the bill signing is vindication for their enforcement-only approach.

"For all those people who spoke disparagingly of the hearings that were held over the summer on border security, this bill represents a victory -- both a grass-roots victory and a public relations victory -- for the Congress," said one House Republican leadership aide.

The double-layer, reinforced fence has been a point of contention between the White House and Republicans in Congress. Mr. Bush had pushed for a broad immigration bill that offered a guest-worker plan and citizenship rights for most illegal aliens, in addition to increased enforcement.

The Department of Homeland Security has questioned the value of that much fencing, and the administration argues that only about 370 miles of fencing is needed on the 2,000-mile-long border. Officials say the rest can be covered through ground radar, sensors and increased manpower.

"You talk to the members of Congress about the 700 miles, and there's not a single member who can give you a plausible explanation of how they arrived at 700 miles," a senior administration official told The Washington Times last week. "We'll build every mile of fence that is useful and necessary to build, and if they tell us to build 700, we'll find a way to build 700 miles of fence, but let's not kid ourselves."

The White House official said last week there wouldn't be a big public signing ceremony. In Arizona earlier this month, Mr. Bush signed the 2007 homeland security spending bill, which includes a down payment for some fencing as well as increases in the number of U.S. Border Patrol agents and detention beds to hold illegal aliens awaiting deportation.

Congressional Republicans, including Mr. Frist and Mr. Hastert, say the bill is a key dividing point between Republicans and Democrats -- one voters should remember at the polls next month.

"Democrat leader [Nancy] Pelosi voted against the Secure Fence Act because she has never been to the border to understand that it is a national security emergency. The Democrat leadership must think that border security is about adding more security guards at Borders Book Stores," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Mr. Hastert.

Inside Politics (WT)

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

Actor's ad

His body visibly racked by tremors, actor Michael J. Fox speaks out for Missouri Democratic Senate candidate Claire McCaskill in a television ad that promotes her support for embryonic stem-cell research.

"As you might know, I care deeply about stem-cell research," says the 45-year-old actor, who has struggled with Parkinson's disease for more than a decade. "In Missouri, you can elect Claire McCaskill, who shares my hope for cures."

Mrs. McCaskill has made support for the research a key part of her campaign to unseat Sen. Jim Talent. The new ad debuted prominently Saturday night during Game 1 of the World Series between the St. Louis Cardinals and the Detroit Tigers and will continue airing statewide this week, a campaign spokeswoman said.

Debate over embryonic stem-cell research looms large in the state, where voters are considering a ballot measure that would amend the state constitution to protect all federally allowed forms of the research. Critics say the measure would allow human cloning.

"Unfortunately, Senator Jim Talent opposes expanding stem-cell research," Mr. Fox says in the 30-second spot. "Senator Talent even wanted to criminalize the science that gives us a chance for hope."

Mr. Talent's campaign called the ad a false attack, the Associated Press reports.

"Senator Talent supports medical research including stem-cell research that doesn't involve cloning or destroying a human embryo," said Talent spokesman Rich Chrismer.

Face-off

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, accused her Republican challenger of getting into "swampy territory" after he was quoted yesterday as saying that Mrs. Clinton was unattractive when she was younger and that she had a lot of work done on herself.

The tabloid quoted Mr. Spencer as saying: "You ever see a picture of her back then? Whew. I don't know why Bill married her."

Mr. Spencer, former mayor of the New York City suburb of Yonkers, was also quoted as saying that Mrs. Clinton underwent millions of dollars of "work" and "looks good now."

During a campaign stop at a senior citizens center in Watervliet, just outside Albany, Mrs. Clinton said: "It's unfortunate that when you don't have anything positive to say about the issues that we can get off in some pretty swampy territory."

After the newspaper came out, Mr. Spencer said the comments were "a fabrication."

"I would never call Hillary Clinton ugly. That's outrageous. I didn't do it," he said.

The reporter, Ben Smith, spoke with Mr. Spencer during a flight Friday from New York City to Rochester. He told the Associated Press that Mr. Spencer made the comments as Mr. Spencer, his wife and Mr. Smith sat together. He said he did not tape-record the comments but took notes on a BlackBerry.

'Lawyering up'

"Everyone is speculating about which party will control Congress after next month's voting. But we may not know for a while. We could see either party pursue the kind of lawsuits that Al Gore unleashed in Florida in 2000 and contest any number of tight races that are within the 'margin of litigation,' " John Fund writes at www.opinionjournal.com.

"Recounts and even seating challenges in Congress could stretch on for weeks -- another endless election. 'We're waiting for the day that pols can cut out the middleman and settle all elections in court,' jokes the political newsletter Hotline.

" 'In 2000 in Florida, we broke a psychic barrier,' says Doug Chapin, director of the nonpartisan Election Reform Information Project. 'Election night is not necessarily the finish line anymore. Both sides are lawyering up.' Indeed, in 1998 the number of court cases challenging elections totaled 104, by 2004 that number had climbed to 361."

Border protectors

A group opposed to illegal immigration has inducted 125 House members and 20 senators into the U.S. Border Control Hall of Fame for the 109th Congress.

"The members of the 109th Congressional Hall of Fame have listened to the overwhelming majority of their constituents who want an end of open borders, amnesty and welfare benefits for illegal aliens," said Edward I. Nelson, chairman of the citizens group U.S. Border Control.

Among those cited by the group were Sen. Rick Santorum, Pennsylvania Republican, and Sen. Conrad Burns, Montana Republican, both of whom are trailing in races for re-election.

The House scorecard is based on 12 votes on immigration issues, including deploying troops on the border, ending the visa lottery and fining employers who hire illegals. The Senate scorecard is also based on 12 votes, including opposition to amnesty, preservation of Social Security for American citizens and making English the official language.

The voting record for each member of Congress can be found at http://www.usbc.org by clicking on the Border Alert Scoreboard Issue or Election Central.

Race narrows

Florida's gubernatorial race between Republican Charlie Crist and Democrat Rep. Jim Davis has narrowed, with the two candidates running just about even, according to a poll released yesterday as early voting began in the state.

Mr. Crist, the state attorney general, had enjoyed double-digit leads in previous polls. The new Quinnipiac University Poll found him favored by 46 percent of likely voters to 44 percent for Mr. Davis, with 8 percent undecided. That is within the error margin of 3.4 percentage points. Eleven percent of respondents indicated they could still change their minds.

Earlier this month, Mr. Crist was favored 53 percent to 43 percent in a similar sampling by the Connecticut-based polling institute. Gov. Jeb Bush is prohibited by law from seeking a third consecutive term.

Mr. Davis didn't start his television advertising until early October and has made inroads among independent voters and women since then, the Associated Press reports.

Fright fest

Novelist Stephen King is the master of all things weird and spooky. So what better for the author of "Carrie" and "The Shining" to do than promote MoveOn.org?

"If I know anything, I know scary. And giving this president and this out-of-control Congress two more years ... is downright terrifying. Thankfully, this national nightmare is one we can end with -- literally -- a wake-up call," the horror writer says in an e-mail sent yesterday by the liberal Internet group's political action committee.

"My friends at MoveOn.org Political Action are organizing pre-Halloween phone parties this weekend, Oct. 28 and 29. We'll be calling progressive voters in key districts who may not turn out unless they get a friendly reminder or two. ...

"The polls are telling us that this November is our best shot in over a decade to turn things around, and we've got to make the most of it."

Fighting For Legal Status; Drama In Orange County (WSJ)

By Aaron Rutkoff

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

Border Lines is a regular look at the best writing on the immigration debate from around the Web. (Some links may require registration or subscription.) * * *

NON-CITIZEN SOLDIERS: Many commentators and politicians have proposed the idea of a pathway for the undocumented to achieve legal status in the U.S. In a joint Washington Post op-ed, conservative hawk Max Boot and centrist Democrat Michael O'Hanlon suggest a four-year term of military service1 as one way that foreigners -- even illegal immigrants in the U.S. -- could earn American citizenship.

Their proposal, although grounded in the debate over immigration, takes as its primary justification the manpower crunch now plaguing the U.S. military. A service-for-citizenship system "could solve the No. 1 problem facing the Army and Marine Corps: the fact that these services need to grow to meet current commitments yet cannot easily do so (absent a draft) given the current recruiting environment," they write. As a bonus, foreign soldiers could be recruited from key regions in which our all-volunteer force lacks language and cultural skills. To the objection that recruits without green cards would be nothing more than mercenaries, the authors point out that "we already rely on tens of thousands of real mercenaries: the security contractors the U.S. government employs from Colombia to Iraq to make up for lack of troops."

Although Messrs. Boot and O'Hanlon present their proposal as a common sense solution for strengthening the military, the hawkish bloggers at National Review Online staged a daylong debate on the topic that featured a good deal of skepticism. A "divided" Stanley Kurtz ultimately calls2 it "the first serious idea for a solution I've seen in years," but his conservative colleagues were quick to disagree. "I think it's a horrible idea," replied John Derbyshire3, an immigrant himself. "If the USA can no longer muster enough citizens to staff our armies, then we are doomed, doomed, and should just go down giggling and give someone else a shot at being Top Dog."

Mark Kirkorian, a strong opponent of illegal immigration, also sounded a circumspect note:4 "If there's a problem in persuading enough Americans to fill the ranks, then the problem may be that our foreign policy is not in line with our national character." In a follow-up post, he also warned5 that opening the military to foreign recruits may "turn soldiering into yet another 'job Americans won't do.'" * * *

O.C. SCARE MAIL: A Republican congressional candidate from Orange County, Calif., is under fire from the state attorney general6, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger7 and even his county's Republican organization8 (all Los Angeles Times links) over his campaign's involvement in an apparent voter-suppression mailing. The Spanish-language letter, sent to 14,000 registered Democrats with Latino surnames, warned "that if your residence in this country is illegal or you are an immigrant, voting in a federal election is a crime that could result in jail time." (Naturalized immigrants can vote, although it is a crime for illegal immigrants to cast ballots in elections.)

At the center of the controversy is Tan Nguyen, a Vietnamese immigrant and hard-line opponent of illegal immigration trying to unseat Democratic incumbent Rep. Loretta Sanchez. As the scandal broke last week and investigators traced the letter back to Mr. Nguyen's office, he fired a staffer implicated in the illegal mailing and denied any prior knowledge -- even as the chairman of Orange County's Republican Party told the press of Mr. Nguyen's direct involvement and urged him to withdraw from the race.

After days of mounting criticism and a raid by state agents on his offices, Mr. Nguyen reversed course on Sunday9, announcing at a sidewalk press conference that he now wished to rehire the still unidentified staff member he had fired and telling reporters that he believes the mailing was fair. "I am innocent, and there is no way in hell that I am going to withdraw," he said.

Amy Taxin, an Orange County Register reporter, quotes Nguyen campaign spokesman Bill Braniff admitting the campaign's role in composing the letter10. "I acknowledge that somebody connected with the campaign did draft it," he said. The problem, Mr. Braniff insisted, was faulty Spanish-to-English translation: "The Spanish mailer used the word emigrado, which is defined as someone living outside his or her country," Ms. Taxin reports. "Braniff claimed that the word has been incorrectly translated as 'immigrant' by the public." * * *

(STILL) SITTING ON THE FENCE: For nearly a month, bloggers, pundits and political observers have been puzzled over the fate of the Secure Fence Act, a bill passed by Congress on Sept. 29 mandating the construction of a 700-mile double-layered border fence. To date, it seems, the bill has not so much as been delivered to the White House for a presidential signature. (See previous Border Lines coverage here11 and here12.) Now, as Washington Times reporter Stephen Dinan reports, the White House is "pleading"13 with members of Congress to turn over the bill. "Send us the damn bill," one unnamed senior administration official told Mr. Dinan. "We'd like to autograph it."

To Congressional Republicans, however, the Secure Fence Act is potent political weapon that needs to be reserved until closer to the midterm elections on Nov. 7. "It's a timing issue," an aide to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) explained to Mr. Dinan. "We want it signed closer to the election when folks are paying attention."

It may be that a disagreement over ceremony, not timing, stands at the center of this Capitol Hill conflict. President Bush, Mr. Dinan reports, "has said he will sign it, though in private, without a signing ceremony." The unnamed official quoted in the piece also rejected the idea of signing ceremony. In part, Mr. Dinan suggests, this reluctance stems from Mr. Bush's lingering resentment that members of his own party defeated comprehensive reform legislation -- including a guest-worker program -- that the president had championed. * * *

NOT VICTIMLESS: Those who argue that illegal immigration is a victimless crime, writes Jonathan Gurwitz in a San Antonio Express-News commentary, should first visit the house where 51 migrants were found packed into three rooms -- all sharing a single filthy bathroom14. "Does anyone believe this is the only human warehouse in San Antonio?" he asks. "In South Texas?"

Mr. Gurwitz notes that both supporters and detractors of illegal immigrants may have an interest in ignoring the frequent crimes done against migrants. To opponents, he writes, illegal immigrants who break the law by crossing the border are hardly entitled to seek its protection. And those supporting decriminalization tend to overlook the abuse meted out by human smugglers, who are almost always fellow immigrants, he says.

"The effort to whitewash the criminality of illegal immigration, to look the other way as people trespass the border, enables predators to victimize in obscurity," Mr. Gurwitz says. "Advocates who transform illegal immigration into a victimless crime enhance the prospects that illegal immigrants will be the victims of crime."

The common-ground solution, he suggests, is both more control over the border -- including fences -- as well as a more open legal system to absorb people seeking better life. Implemented together, it may just put the smugglers out of business. * * *

COMPLEXION COMPENSATION: Skin tone can outweigh education in its impact on an immigrant's earnings in the U.S., according to a new study. Joni Hersch, a Vanderbilt University economist, crunched the numbers15 from a federally-funded 2003 survey of over 2,000 legal immigrants, which included a face-to-face interview in which respondents' skin color was measured on an 11-point scale. Her analysis controlled for race, nation of origin and a slew of other factors that can influence income, such as work history, language skills, a visa type.

Washington Post's Richard Morin16, who summarized Ms. Hersch findings in his column, writes that "[i]mmigrants with the lightest complexions earned, on average, about 8 to 15 percent more than those with the darkest skin tone." For a particularly dark-skinned immigrant, this disadvantage can counteract the income-generating power of education.

Mr. Morin emailed Ms. Hersch for her take on these results. "I don't think that any explanation other than discrimination is possible -- and I am not one to draw such inferences lightly," she replied. But racism is not the only bias at work: Ms. Hersch's anaylsis also found that taller immigrants consistently earn more than their shorter counterparts. * * *

UNREST AHEAD? An editorial in Investor's Business Daily17 looks ahead to the consequences of the U.S. fence on Mexico's stability and finds cause for concern. Official ambivalence over the measure -- which has prompted both diplomatic protests18 and support from the governor of Mexico's Central Bank19 -- makes sense given the nation's dire straights on immigration: Mexico needs help retaining its human capital, but faces likely unrest if the U.S. fence is implemented.

"If a wall were built, and the U.S. is no longer a social-pressure valve for Mexican labor, those workers just might revolt," IBD's editors warn. The problem is thrown into even starker relief by a 2005 study conducted by Mexico's Central Bank. According to its findings, Mexican states that receive more remittances from expatriate workers in the U.S. also show less overall economic development. "The bank even went so far as to suggest poverty was caused by the dependency, not the other way around."

Worse still, IBD's editorial says, Mexico's highest-remittance states border regions of the country already mired in violent unrest.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Vice President's Role In Senate Is Occasionally Critical (RC)

By Donald Wolfensberger

Roll Call, October 24, 2006

Texas Democrat John Nance Garner once opined that the vice presidency is "not worth a bucket of warm spit." He was in a position to know, having gone from being Speaker of the House to being vice president under President Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Though a small-government populist, "Cactus Jack," as he was known, faithfully carried the president's New Deal water up Capitol Hill during FDR's first term. He became disenchanted with Roosevelt's policies and advisers in the second term and announced his own availability for the presidency in 1939, regardless of whether FDR ran again. Roosevelt broke the two-term precedent and handily won the nomination and re-election in 1940 with Henry Wallace as his VP. Garner quietly retired to his native Uvalde, Texas, regretting that he ever had left the Speaker's chair.

Garner's colorful metaphor came to mind recently when a foreign diplomat in Washington, D.C., asked two of my colleagues why the vice president of the United States also serves as President of the Senate. They were just as stumped as I was when they later put the question to me. I half-jokingly speculated that the framers had to give the vice president something to do while he waited around for the president to die.

In turning to James Madison's notes from the 1787 Constitutional Convention, I found Delegate Roger Sherman of Connecticut confirming my suspicion. A member of the Committee of Eleven that originated the new office, Sherman defended it as follows: "If the vice-President were not to be President of the Senate, he would be without employment." Sherman added that if the Senate elected its own President to preside over the chamber, that Senator's state would be deprived of a vote except when it came to breaking ties (since it was customary for presiding officers to remain neutral in all other instances).

The draft that preceded that of the Committee of Eleven had no vice president and instead provided that the Senate elect one of its own to preside over the body and to fill in as president of the nation when a vacancy occurred. So, the alternative of having a vice president exercise both roles solved two problems. It ensured that no Senator would be deprived of his right to vote at all times, nor have to be absent from the chamber while acting as president of the country.

Alexander Hamilton, in "Federalist No. 68," pointed out that there was nothing new about the concept of a fallback executive. The 1777 Constitution of New York state created a lieutenant governor to preside over the state Senate and take over as governor in the event of a vacancy. And no one objected to that at the time. Even in pre-revolutionary America, lieutenant governors presided over several colonial legislatures.

The role of vice president as the Senate's president could come into sharper focus again in two weeks, when Democrats are expected to gain seats or even control of the chamber. The Constitution provides that the vice president "shall have no vote, unless [the Senators] be equally divided." The smaller the majority's edge, the more likely the vice president will be called upon to break ties. Garner cast only three tie-breaking votes during his eight years as vice president, when Democrats never held fewer than 59 of 96 Senate seats.

On the other hand, our first vice president, John Adams, still holds the record with 29 tie-breakers during George Washington's presidency. Adams also actively participated in Senate debates, lecturing Senators like a school marm. (One Senator wrote in his diary, "For forty minutes he harangued us from the chair.") Eventually he was threatened with a motion to silence him. He subsequently confined himself to procedural utterances only when circumstances required it. Adams' tie-breaking votes included preventing the capital from remaining in New York two more years, blocking war with Britain and ensuring that the president have sole authority to fire his Cabinet appointees (without Senate concurrence).

No vice president since the beginning of the 20th century has cast more than eight tie-breaking votes. However, Vice President Cheney already has cast seven tie-breakers in his nearly six years in office. It was Cheney's very presence as President of the Senate that gave control of the 50-50 chamber to the Republicans for organizational purposes during those critical first months of the Bush presidency, from Jan. 21 until June 6, 2001 (when control flipped to the Democrats with Sen. Jim Jeffords' resignation from the Republican Conference to become an Independent).

During that initial period of Republican control, Cheney cast two tie-breakers on amendments relating to prescription drugs and the marriage penalty tax. Even when Republicans regained control of the Senate in 2003 by a 51-49 margin, Cheney had to cast three tie-breaking votes in that year alone — all on important budget and tax matters. In the current Congress, with Republicans holding a more comfortable 55-45 margin, Cheney has cast just one tie-breaking vote, albeit an important one on the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 2005.

Lest I leave the misimpression that the vice president's only official role is to preside over the Senate and break ties, there is one other duty under the Constitution worth mentioning. The vice president also is charged with counting the electoral votes for president and vice president and announcing the winners. That will be one of Cheney's last official acts in office in January 2009. It is doubtful, though, that Cheney will be viewed by historians as a mere bucket-toting, tie-breaking, electoral vote-counting VP. As we have seen, the office can be as big as the president wants it to be.

Teacher Bonuses Go To Well-paid Teachers In Struggling Districts (AP)

By Andrew Welsh-huggins

AP, October 24, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio - The Bush administration is rewarding teachers with performance bonuses at four of Ohio's biggest, poorest and most academically challenged districts where teacher pay is already well above the state average.

Coming just two weeks before a challenging election for Republicans, the grants are the first federal effort to reward the classroom performance of teachers who raise student test scores.

Ohio's funding - $5.5 million this year and a total of $20 million over five years - was announced Monday, the first of 16 grants totaling $42 million. South Carolina also is to receive statewide grants. The other states to receive money weren't announced.

The government hopes the money will help counter what Education Secretary Margaret Spellings called a "dirty little secret" in American education, that the most experienced teachers often teach in the least challenging classrooms.

The money is a reward for teachers "when you put yourself on the line every day and teach in some of the nation's most challenging schools and get great results," Spellings said Monday.

The department will release the remaining grants in the coming weeks, falling right before the Nov. 7 elections in which a reeling Republican Party is eager for good news. Spellings said the election had no bearing on the timing.

Democrats are savoring the thought of regaining control of the House, especially in light of the ongoing congressional page scandal. In Ohio, Democrats are poised to retake the governor's office after 16 years, while two-term Republican Sen. Mike DeWine is in a tight race with Democratic challenger Sherrod Brown.

Brown called the announcement "cynical politics at its worst."

Schools in Cleveland, Cincinnati, Columbus and Toledo will share the Ohio grants.

Teacher pay in Cleveland, Cincinnati and Columbus is well above the state average of $50,772, including $60,688 in Cleveland, a chronically struggling district of just under 60,000 students in the nation's poorest city.

The average teacher salary in Toledo, which also has the best academic standing of the four districts, is $49,859, according to the most recent data from the state Department of Education.

The money will help districts reward experienced teachers who help train younger colleagues as well as provide incentive for schools to boost their test scores, said Ohio state schools superintendent Susan Tave Zelman.

"This is more than pay for performance," Zelman said Monday. "This is about making the teaching profession more valued and honored."

Cincinnati and Toledo already have incentive programs for teachers, and any new money must look at a broad range of improvements and not just test scores, said Tom Mooney, president of the Ohio Federation of Teachers.

"When you already have trouble attracting teachers to the most challenging schools, what you don't want to do is tell them their families' livelihood depends on tests that were invented yesterday and they're already talking about changing them tomorrow," he said.

The National Education Association on Monday said grants were unnecessary and duplicated existing programs. The union called on the government to put money into underfunded programs created through Bush's No Child Left Behind initiative.

The president of the Columbus teachers' union said she supported the grants because they would help expand existing programs negotiated by the union that reward both individual teachers and entire school staffs for helping students improve.

"Nobody is punished if they don't make the gains," said Rhonda Johnson, president of the Columbus Education Association. "You're not losing any pay, you're only gaining pay when you show you've made gains."

The nationwide grants will range from about $1 million to $30 million. Another $43 million will be awarded next spring.

Bush To Trumpet Strength Of The Economy (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, October 24, 2006

President Bush on Monday trumpeted the strength of the economy, an important issue in about two dozen congressional races that will determine whether Republicans retain control of the House.

Faced with difficult midterm elections and a deteriorating situation in Iraq, Bush is stressing the positive.

"The strength of this economy depends upon the strength of the small business sector," Bush said at a round-table where he talked about his administration's role in reducing taxes and limiting regulation and lawsuits that he says impede the entrepreneurial spirit in America.

"The role of the government, it seems to me, is to make sure that dreamers are rewarded for their hard work and their ingenuity and success. And the best way to do that is to reduce taxes on people," Bush said.

White House advisers, who think the president should get more credit for recent positive economic news, insist that Bush is not trying to change the subject away from the unpopular war. The president will continue to talk about Iraq and the war on terrorism as the Nov. 7 election nears, they said.

Eighty-eight percent of likely voters say the economy is an important issue — on a par with the percentage of people who view the situation in Iraq and terrorism as crucial matters, according to an Associated Press-Ipsos poll earlier this month. The poll found that 37 percent of likely voters say they approve of Bush's handling of Iraq overall. More voters — 42 percent — approve of his handling of the economy.

Overall, the economy grew at a 2.6 percent pace from April through June, compared with a 5.6 percent pace over the first three months of the year, which was the strongest spurt in 2 1/2 years. Still, voters remain uneasy even though gasoline prices have started dropping, the stock market is hitting record highs, and interest rates on credit cards and adjustable mortgages are leveling off.

Rising hopes for strong third-quarter earnings lifted the Dow Jones industrial average past 12,000 for the first time on Wednesday. The Conference Board's index of U.S. leading economic indicators rose last month, and the government reported last week that consumer prices fell in September by the largest amount in 10 months.

Democrats contend the middle class isn't enjoying the benefits of recent U.S. economic gains. They say sluggish median earnings show paychecks have failed to keep pace with inflation, and they note rising health care and energy costs.

White House political director Sara Taylor said that the economy is a key issue in about two dozen House races, including campaigns in Pennsylvania, Minnesota, Ohio and Washington state. Democrats need a 15-seat pickup to regain the House and a gain of six seats to reclaim the Senate.

"It's going to have an important impact on certain races around the country," Taylor said. "I think it's an important issue that's not getting a ton of attention."

Bush participated in a round-table with three small- to medium-sized businesses that have taken advantage of community banking services to expand in the Washington area. The event was held at Urban Trust Bank. The bank, set up to provide mortgages, student loans and investment opportunities mainly to minorities, was founded by Robert Louis Johnson, who started BET — formerly Black Entertainment Television.

On Tuesday, the president will speak about the economy again at a campaign appearance in Sarasota, Fla., for businessman Vern Buchanan, who is in a tight House race against Democrat Christine Jennings, a former bank executive. The prospect of losing Florida's conservative 13th District to Democrats brought high-profile Republicans — Gov. Jeb Bush, Sen. Mel Martinez and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney — to the area last week.

Bush Tries To Switch Focus To Economy (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, October 24, 2006

President George W. Bush on Monday sought to change the subject from the deteriorating situation in Iraq by focusing on the strength of the US economy just two weeks before America goes to the polls in midterm congressional elections.

Citing strong US job growth and improving wages, Mr Bush dismissed polls that suggested the Republican party was on course to lose control of the House of Representatives on November 7 and possibly also the Senate. The president will on Tuesday give a speech in Florida on the economy.

“The economy is strong and we have a plan for victory in Iraq,” Mr Bush told CNBC, the US business TV channel. “The other folks [Democratic party] will raise the taxes and they don’t have a plan for victory in Iraq. My advice is: let’s watch what happens in the poll that actually matters on November 7.”

Mr Bush’s comments, which coincided with the Dow Jones stock index closing at a record high of 12,116 on Monday, follow several weeks in which the Republicans have been on the defensive because of the situation in Iraq and a series of corruption scandals.

But Republican strategists are confident that there is enough time remaining in the mid-term campaign to refocus voter attention on the strength of the economy. Mr Bush on Monday downplayed concerns that the economy was not performing well for the middle classes. He said that wages had grown by an average of 2.2 per cent in the past year and that this had boosted disposable income.

However, he did not directly address the continuing stagnation in median wages, which are a more accurate measure of the economic “squeeze” the Democrats claim the middle classes are experiencing. Instead, he emphasised that the US economy had added 6.6m new jobs since August 2003.

The president’s focus on the economy is likely to add to the quiet confidence among senior Republican strategists that the ruling party can turn the situation around in the 30 or 40 Congressional districts that are considered competitive – of a total of 435. The Democrats need to add 15 to their tally to gain control of the house.

In spite of being behind in the polls, Republicans retain two advantages: the party has more spending power and it can draw on a sophisticated national data base that enables it to squeeze as many votes as possible out of its support base in the heartlands. The Democrats concede they are outmatched on both counts.

Bush Aims To Boost News About Economy (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

DOJ_NMG_0085711

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

President Bush is on a two-day push to draw attention to the economy, with the White House arguing that the administration's accomplishments and the booming stock market have not received enough attention in the run-up to the Nov. 7 midterm elections.

Yesterday, Mr. Bush toured the Urban Trust Bank in Washington to underscore the increase in jobs and wages in the past few years, and to warn against miring the economy with new regulations and taxes.

"It's been hard to get people to report on" the nation's economic progress, said White House spokesman Tony Snow.

"You take a look at consumer confidence levels, they're skyrocketing. People are feeling good about the economy. And if you take a look at the news coverage of it, it's been overwhelmingly negative at a time when you do have just an extraordinary situation," he said.

Democrats said the administration is turning to the economy because the war in Iraq is not rallying voters anymore.

The office of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said the economy still isn't a bright spot for Republicans because it falls short of the levels under Presidents Reagan and Clinton. A statement pointed in particular to slower growth in personal income after inflation and taxes.

Meanwhile, the administration defended its Iraq policy, said no major course change is on the horizon and disputed speculation that it is setting deadlines and timetables for the Iraqi government to take more control.

In a morning blitz of television appearances, White House counselor Dan Bartlett said the administration has been working with the Iraqi government to set milestones and benchmarks.

Republicans across the nation, taking cues from Democratic critics, have begun questioning the administration's plans for Iraq and demanding a change.

Mr. Bush spoke Saturday with top military and civilian leaders about adjusting tactics in Iraq, but the White House said the strategy will not change.

Mr. Snow acknowledged yesterday that efforts announced during the summer to increase security in Baghdad have failed.

"It's pretty clear that the first iteration didn't achieve the results that were desired, so that they're continuing to work through ways to improve and adjust so that you do have the security that you want," the spokesman said.

He said Mr. Bush has stopped using the phrase "stay the course" to describe his Iraq policy, because "it left the wrong impression about what was going on."

Habit-forming: Dow Hits Record Again (USAT/AP)

By Joe Bel Bruno

USA Today, October 24, 2006

NEW YORK — Wall Street extended its October rally Monday as the Dow Jones industrials crossed 12,100 for the first time and reached a new record high close.

Investors grew more confident about upcoming earnings reports, and a decline in the price of oil bolstered hopes for higher consumer spending.

Dow component Wal-Mart Stores, which pleased investors by announcing plans to cut capital spending to improve profits, helped the blue chips to their new high. Wal-Mart shares were up $1.91 to $51.28 (story, 3B).

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 114.54 points, or 1.0%, to 12,116.91. It also hit an intraday high of 12,125.16.

The Standard & Poor's 500 index rose 8.42 points, or 0.6%, to 1377.02. The Nasdaq composite rose 13.26 points, or 0.6%, to 2355.56.

Strength from IBM, Hasbro and Xerox also fed the advance. Halfway through the third-quarter earnings season, companies' generally upbeat reports have given investors a renewed sense of security about the future.

“The blue chips have outperformed most markets, and this was an extension of that trend,” says Steven Goldman, chief market strategist at Weeden & Co.

The advance came despite concerns about the Federal Reserve's two-day meeting on interest rates, which starts today. Policymakers are expected to leave interest rates unchanged, though they could sound hawkish in their accompanying economic assessment because of recent signs of rising inflation.

Treasury bonds fell on speculation the Fed will keep its benchmark rate at 5.25%. The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note rose to 4.83% from 4.79% on Friday.

A barrel of light, sweet crude oil fell 52 cents to $58.81.

Price Of Crude Drives Wall St. Rally (LAT)

By Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, October 24, 2006

The Wall Street stocks staged a strong rally today after investors welcomed another drop in crude oil prices and news that Wal-Mart Stores would rein in spending on store expansions in order to boost earnings.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 114.54 points, or nearly 1%, to end the day at a record close: 12,116.91

Other major indexes, including the Nasdaq and the S&P 500, were also higher.

The Dow, which has reached all-time highs as it continues to build on a rally that began in August, got a boost today because crude oil futures and other energy prices ticked lower. The U.S. benchmark crude fell 52 cents to $58.81 a barrel in futures trading on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Crude oil prices have plunged about 25% since midsummer, giving the economy a boost by helping slow price inflation and leaving consumers with more money to spend at stores and restaurants. That has led Wall Street investors to grow more bullish on the nation's economic prospects.

"The picture being painted is pretty easy to suggest that the pressure on the economy from higher oil prices is easing," Richard E. Cripps, chief market strategist at Stifel Nicolaus, told the Associated Press.

Today's market rally was also tied to a surge in Wal-Mart shares, which is one of the 30 companies included in the Dow Jones index. Wal-Mart stock rose $1.91 — or nearly 4% — to close at $51.28 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Wal-Mart said capital spending on new stores and other items would rise by up to 4% in fiscal 2008, compared to as much as 20% in fiscal 2007.

"We are still very committed to growth, but our real estate projects are now being subjected to a more rigorous prioritization process," said Wal-Mart Vice Chairman John Menzer in a statement. "This store selection process will enable the company to drive higher returns by focusing on locations that make the most efficient use of capital."

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

NEW YORK, Oct. 23 -- Wall Street extended its rally as investors grew more confident about coming earnings reports and as a decline in oil prices bolstered hopes for higher consumer spending. The Dow Jones industrial average crossed 12,100 for the first time and set another record-high close.

The Dow rose 114.54, or 0.95 percent, to 12,116.91. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 8.42, or 0.62 percent, to 1377.02, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 13.26, or 0.57 percent, to 2355.56.

Dow component Wal-Mart Stores, which announced plans to cut capital spending to improve profit, helped the blue chips to their new high as the average's biggest advancer. The Dow's record came just three trading days after its first close past 12,000.

Strength from International Business Machines, Hasbro and Xerox also fed the advance. Just halfway through the third-quarter earnings season, companies' generally upbeat reports have given investors a renewed sense of security.

Monday's gains came despite some concerns about the Federal Reserve's two-day meeting on interest rates, which starts Tuesday. Policymakers are expected to leave interest rates unchanged.

The price of oil, which fell to lows for the year Friday, is making investors more bullish on sectors such as retail, which could benefit if consumers have more spending money.Movers

Bulls Continue To Drive Dow To New Record (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay
The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average picked up steam after pausing Friday and surged to yet-another record amid a slew of strong profit reports and plans for slowed expansion by Wal-Mart Stores.

The Dow industrials jumped 114.54 points, or 1%, to 12116.91, the tenth record close in 15 trading sessions and up 13.1% on the year. Shares in Wal-Mart, a Dow component, rallied 3.9% after the retailer announced it will cut capital spending on new stores next year, which investors and analysts hope will translate into bigger profits.

Energy prices slipped, and bellwethers AT&T, 3M and Xerox all reported strong quarterly earnings, further boosting investors' mood.

Since the Federal Reserve held its key interest-rate target steady in August, bullish investors have been hoping the market would turn its attention more intently on corporate earnings, rather than constant speculation about the central bank's next move. Built into their rosy outlook was the assumption that the economy, though growth is slowing, is still strong enough to generate good corporate results for the third-quarter earnings season now under way.

Most Wall Street pros expect Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his fellow policy makers to leave rates unchanged again following this week's meeting, holding at 5.25%. As has been the case following previous Fed meetings, though, Wall Street pros will closely dissect the Fed's written statement due out tomorrow for any signs of increased skittishness about inflation.

Worried that such concerns will keep the Fed from cutting rates anytime soon, bond investors sent prices lower and yields higher yesterday, in a session that contrasted with the stock market's euphoria. "The bond market is more focused on the near-term risks in the economy," said strategist Jack Caffrey of J.P. Morgan Private Bank.

Stock investors watch interest rates closely because a decline in rates lowers borrowing costs and makes more money available to spend and invest.

Other stock measures rallied along with the Dow. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 0.6%, or 8.42 points, to 1377.02, up 10.3% on the year. The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.6%, or 13.26 points, to 2355.56, up 6.8% on the year.

To guard against slower growth in the U.S. economy, many bullish stock investors currently favor big-name companies they believe are better equipped to do well if business conditions worsen unexpectedly. To these investors, an economy saddled with falling housing prices and other bugaboos isn't necessarily such a bad thing, as long as the pullback is gradual and doesn't cut into employment, consumer spending or corporate bottom lines.

With third-quarter earnings reports trickling in, that scenario seems to be playing out for now, said Duncan Richardson, chief equity investment officer at Eaton Vance Corp. "Ultimately, earnings are what moves the market," he said. "So far, they've been looking pretty good for this quarter."

Gold prices tumbled, hurt by a strengthening U.S. dollar. Because gold is still viewed as an alternative form of currency in some countries, it often moves in the opposite direction of the greenback when investors lose faith in paper money as a reliable store of value.

Gold contracts for October delivery fell $13.30, or 2.2%, to $579.70 a troy ounce, up 12.1% on the year on the Comex division of the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Crude-oil futures fell 52 cents a barrel, or 0.9%, to $58.81, off 3.7% this year.

Outside the U.S., stocks rose in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, eked out a gain of 0.1%, or 0.11 point, to 226.12.

In major U.S. market action:

DOJ_NMG_0085714

Stocks rose. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.4 billion shares, as 1,919 stocks advanced and 1,368 fell.

Bond prices fell. The 10-year Treasury note fell 10/32 point, or $3.125 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.828%. The 30-year bond fell 20/32 to yield 4.952%.

The dollar strengthened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 119.33 yen, compared with 118.69 yen Friday. The euro fell to $1.255, compared with 1.2619.

This Time, It's Not The Economy (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

In many ways, the economy has not looked so good in a long time.

The price of gas at the pump has tumbled since midsummer. Unemployment has fallen to its lowest level in more than five years. On Wall Street, the Dow Jones industrial average has finally returned to its glory days of the late 1990's, setting records almost daily.

President Bush, in hopes of winning credit for his party's stewardship of the economy, is spending two days this week campaigning on the theme that the economy is purring. "No question that a strong economy is going to help our candidates," Mr. Bush said in a CNBC interview yesterday, "primarily because they have got something to run on, they can say our economy's good because I voted for tax relief."

But Republican candidates do not seem to be getting any traction from the glowing economic statistics with midterm elections just two weeks away.

The economy is virtually nowhere to be found among the campaign ads of embattled Republican incumbents fighting to hold onto their House or Senate seats. Nor is it showing up as a strong weapon in the arsenal of Republican governors defending their jobs from Democrats.

"I don't know of another election cycle in which the economy was so good, yet the election prospects for the incumbent party looked so bad," said Frank Luntz, a Republican strategist. "If something goes wrong, Republicans are to blame. If something goes right, Republicans don't get credit."

The only place that the economy has emerged as a major campaign theme has been in the aging industrial heartland around the Great Lakes, where the bleak economic prospects are being deployed against incumbents, Republicans and Democrats alike. But where the economic winds seem to be blowing their way, voters appear unwilling to hear that Republican policies made it so.

Disenchantment over the war in Iraq has morphed into disillusionment over the direction of the country, breeding distrust in the administration's policies, surveys suggest. Moreover, concerned by weak wage growth, costly health care and eroding benefits, many middle-class voters do not see the economy improving for them.

"Voters overwhelmingly don't approve of the president on the economy," said Amy Walter, a senior editor at the Cook Political Report, a nonpartisan firm that handicaps political races. "It comes down to the issue of credibility. And so many voters feel so pessimistic about the direction of the country."

Richard Curtin, who runs the University of Michigan's consumer surveys, has found that even as consumer confidence has improved since gasoline prices took a tumble in August, the White House has gotten no credit for the gain.

"The one indicator that didn't improve," Mr. Curtin said, "was confidence in the government's economic policies."

For many voters, the overall issue has faded in importance as the economy has managed to grow steadily in recent years. In late 2003, The New York Times/CBS News poll found, 4 in 10 voters said either the economy or jobs was the most pressing problem facing the nation. This month, only 13 percent shared that concern.

But Republicans' inability to harness an improving economy in their political favor appears mostly to be a function of the weight of other big national issues stacked against them. Prime among them are voters' growing concerns about the costs of the war in Iraq, fed by a stream of American casualties displayed every night on television.

The seeming morass in Iraq has hurt Republicans in more ways than one, analysts say, contributing to the notion that the country is heading in the wrong direction and fueling distrust in the administration of President Bush that has leaked out to other fronts — including his management of the economy.

The lack of confidence in the administration undercuts the support by voters who want to vote for Republicans on local issues.

Terris Kennedy, 59, a former military nurse who is the chief nursing officer at Shore Memorial Hospital in Nassawadox, Va., says she may well vote Democratic in the Virginia Senate race even though she plans to support the Republican incumbent, Thelma Drake, in the state's Second Congressional District, centered in Virginia Beach.

DOJ_NMG_0085715

Ms. Kennedy likes Ms. Drake because she seems interested in the challenge of how to deliver health services to diverse low-income populations.

But she said her concern over the war in Iraq and her skepticism about whether it was a good idea to stay the course there might lead her to vote for a Democrat, James Webb, over the Republican incumbent George Allen in the Senate race. "Senator Allen is very close to the President," Ms. Kennedy said.

Tim Murtaugh, Ms. Drake's campaign manager, said Iraq and immigration were the two biggest issues on the minds of voters in this military-heavy district, home to the Atlantic fleet of the Navy and Langley Air Force Base. Still, he said that the district had nearly full employment and that he believed that voters were aware that the local economy was strong.

Ms. Drake's campaign ads have suggested that her rival, Phil Kellam, will vote to raise taxes. But Ms. Kennedy disagrees with that.

"I don't see Democrats as tax-and-spend liberals," she said. She has more doubts about the government's economic track record. "Even though the deficit has come down we still have a horrible deficit," Ms. Kennedy said.

It has been some time since the public last trusted Republicans more than Democrats on economic issues.

Of voters polled in the latest New York Times/CBS News national survey this month, 60 percent rated the economy as either good or very good, up from 56 percent in September.

But voters favor Democrats over Republicans as stewards of the economy by 51 to 36 percent. The 15-point margin, which remained the same as in September, is the widest since the survey first included the question in 1984.

Republicans have a tough act to follow. President Bush pointed out yesterday that employers have added 6.6 million jobs since August 2003, finally gaining ground after a long decline in employment over most of his first term. But the figure falls well short of the nine million jobs created during the same period of the Clinton administration.

Still, the National Republican Congressional Committee believes that the improving economy provides a good issue for many Republicans to run on, and has spent money on TV commercials praising the administration's economic track record in several Midwest districts and upstate New York.

"The strategy is to run on the role of tax relief in the improvement of the economy," said Jonathan Collegio, a spokesman for the committee. "We can target the Democrats who have voiced support for repealing or letting expire the tax cuts of 2001 and 2003."

A few candidates have taken this tack, but most have done so sparingly. Some Republican challengers are using the economy as a campaign issue in places where it is doing poorly.

Dick DeVos, the Republican challenger to Jennifer Granholm in Michigan's gubernatorial race, reminded voters in campaign commercials that the state still had "the worst unemployment in the nation."

Perhaps the biggest challenge Republicans face to take credit for an improving economy is that for many voters, their economic prospects do not feel as great as overall statistics might imply. Rather than celebrate the stock market's gains and the overall growth of the economy, many voters are worried about the wages of ordinary workers, which have just started to improve after several years of falling short or barely keeping up with inflation.

The tens of millions of people lacking health insurance and the steady shrinkage in traditional pensions have also added to the sense of personal insecurity.

Consider Florida's 22nd Congressional District, stretching along the Atlantic coast in Broward and Palm Beach Counties, north of Miami. Employment in the district has grown at three times the national average over the last three years, according to an analysis by Moody's Economy.com. Unemployment there is well under the national level.

But the Republican incumbent, E. Clay Shaw Jr., running neck and neck with Ron Klein, a Democrat, has steered away from celebrating the area's sunny economic prospects. Instead, he has pointed to his record on the environment, talked about how he disagreed with President Bush's attempt to privatize Social Security, and accused Mr. Klein of being in the pocket of sugar companies.

That might be the appropriate strategy. David Hensley, who lives in Mr. Shaw's district, says he will probably vote for him, as he has before. But Mr. Hensley, 62, is not doing so out of any sense of economic prosperity.

"The economy is in the toilet no matter who is in control," Mr. Hensley said.

And concerns over how fair the prosperous economy has been to most Americans appear to be hurting Republican prospects even among those who see themselves as doing relatively well.

Ann O'Callahan, a 64-year old Irish immigrant in suburban Philadelphia, defines herself as a social conservative. She voted Republican in 2000, but switched to the Democrats in 2004. This year she plans to vote Democratic again, mainly because of the economy. "I am very disturbed by the economic policies of the Bush administration," she said.

Ms. O'Callahan's district, Pennsylvania's Seventh, is an island of relative affluence. The median income in the area, according to the Census Bureau, topped $63,000 last year, more than a third higher than the national median. According to Economy.com's analysis, based on county data, unemployment this year in the district should average 3.8 percent, well below the national average.

But, Ms. O'Callahan said, jobs were not enough. "I work with job placement so I see up close how a lot more work is demanded of people, how benefits are disappearing, how hourly rates have been stagnant throughout the Bush administration," she said. She said that jobs were plentiful, "but paying $8 an hour with no benefits."

Republican leaders might still try to use an improving economy for a final campaign push. Mr. Luntz, the Republican strategist, said economic issues should help the party in Florida, Georgia and the Carolinas.

Mr. Collegio of the National Republican Campaign Committee said the campaign group planned a flurry of advertisements warning that, as they see it, Democrats will hurt the economy by raising taxes.

Still, even that tried-and-true Republican theme may not work so well this year.

"In these races you just pray for a Republican claiming that tax cuts are the reason for the good economy," said Stanley Greenberg, a Democratic pollster. "Candidates don't do it because the public doesn't believe it. And a candidate who claimed it would seem out of touch."

Rising Stock Prices, Falling Gas Costs Seen Helping Republicans At Polls (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — The economy will likely help Republicans more than Democrats in the elections in two weeks, but that opinion is not unanimous, according to economists polled by USA TODAY.

In a survey conducted Oct. 13-18, nearly half the 45 economists who responded to a question on the election said Republicans will benefit the most from the economy in the Nov. 7 midterm elections.

"The economic performance in the last several years is some of the best in economic history," says Mike Englund, chief economist for economic consulting firm Action Economics, who expects the economy will help Republicans.

Economists who expected Republicans to benefit from the economy named lower tax rates, falling gasoline prices and rising stock prices as factors that will help Republicans.

Some of those surveyed, including those at Bank of America and the National Association of Realtors, say a low unemployment rate will aid the GOP. The unemployment rate has been 4.6% in three of the last five months, the lowest in five years.

But Wells Fargo senior economist Scott Anderson says Democrats will gain an advantage because many people are seeing little increase in pay after factoring in inflation. During the first eight months of 2006, average weekly earnings of non-supervisory workers after adjusting for inflation rose less than 1% and in some months actually fell.

Inflation-adjusted earnings jumped in September, but were somewhat skewed by a plunge in energy costs, which led to a sharp drop in inflation that is unlikely to be repeated.

"There is still a lot of frustration in the middle class," Anderson says. "We're seeing pretty solid job growth. But as long as wages lag, you are going to see a lot of pessimism on the economy."

Richard Yamarone, director of economic research at Argus Research, says neither party will gain an advantage from the economy. "The Republicans should benefit greatly because of the shape of the economy; however, that message doesn't seem to have gotten out," he says. "There are other issues that are overriding the economic issues."

Big Worries For Big Oil (WSJ)

By Chip Cummins

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

With crude prices falling and oil-field costs on the rise, major oil companies have a big problem: sustaining their phenomenal profit growth.

Exxon Mobil Corp., Royal Dutch Shell PLC and BP PLC have all relied on big oil-price jumps to fuel a streak of handsome earnings gains and, in many cases, record quarterly profits in recent years. The three companies reported combined earnings of about $25 billion in the second quarter; in the third quarter of last year, they earned about $25.4 billion.

Many of the world's biggest publicly traded oil companies report earnings this week and are expected to post strong results, thanks to high crude prices.

U.S.-benchmark oil hit a record of nearly $80 a barrel this summer. (In inflation-adjusted terms, oil was at its most expensive in 1980.) Since July, though, crude prices have fallen about 25%, sapping the momentum from short-term profit-growth potential at a time of rising costs and higher taxes. And if oil prices continue to drop, that could drive new thinking among oil executives over whether to pursue big tie-ups.

DOJ_NMG_0085717

BP, which reports earnings Tuesday, estimates West Texas crude, a benchmark oil type in the U.S., averaged about $70 a barrel for the quarter. That is still higher than the average price a year ago of about $63. But current prices are now hovering around $58. (See related article1.) U.S. natural-gas prices and gross profit margins from making refined products such as gasoline are also sharply lower than a year ago.

Even before the steep drop-off in prices, earnings had been blunted by side effects of the commodities boom. Oil-field costs have skyrocketed for many projects because of higher demand for everything from steel to software among energy companies eager to cash in on the boom. Competition for new prospects has heated up, ratcheting up auction prices for fresh exploration acreage.

If oil prices stabilize or drop further, cost inflation could also subside. But costs generally take time to catch up with swings in commodity prices. That poses a growing challenge to profitability in the short term.

Neil McMahon, a London-based oil analyst at Sanford C. Bernstein, says recent trends of lower commodity prices and higher costs mean quarterly results this time around aren't likely to offer much positive surprises for investors. In a note to clients Friday, he said he expects to see further evidence of cost pressure when companies report this week.

A handful of big companies suffered significant production shortfalls in the July-to-September quarter because of unplanned disruptions. BP partially shut down its big Alaskan oil field because of pipeline corrosion there, crimping its output and that of its biggest partners in the field, Exxon and ConocoPhillips. Shell continues to suffer partial shutdowns in Nigeria, amid violent insurgency attacks in that major oil-exporting nation.

Oppenheimer & Co. analysts expect the major oil companies to post third-quarter earnings about 10% above results from a year ago but about 10% lower than this year's second quarter because of production shortfalls, cost and tax increases and moderating oil prices.

Many companies are expected to post higher profit margins from chemical operations and from marketing, which includes sales at gasoline stations, partly compensating for lackluster commodity prices.

If prices continue falling, two other big questions for investors may emerge: Will the world's largest oil companies curb their generous share-buyback programs? And will they start looking for acquisitions, now that share prices have fallen along with commodity markets, making some targets look cheaper?

So far this year, BP has showered investors with $12.3 billion in buybacks and dividends. In July, Exxon said it would increase spending on buybacks to $7 billion in the third quarter, up from $6 billion in the second quarter.

But shareholder payouts can be sensitive to commodity-price swings. For instance, BP has said it expects to deliver about $65 billion to shareholders through 2008 if crude sticks at $60 a barrel and if U.S. natural-gas prices and refining margins stay lofty. Those expected proceeds would fall more than 20% if commodity-price assumptions were revised down to the $40-a-barrel level.

Jeroen van der Veer, Shell's chief executive, has said repeatedly that he didn't see value in making big purchases amid recent high oil prices. Monday, he announced Shell had made an approach to the board of Shell's main Canadian affiliate, with an offer to buy out minority shareholders for about C$7.7 billion, or about $6.8 billion.

In an interview, Mr. van der Veer said the timing of the approach was more about creating long-term value, not about getting a bargain at Tuesday's lower oil prices. He said the current oil price "is probably one component of a total mix" of factors determining the decision to pursue the deal, and said Shell hadn't changed its acquisition strategy.

Fanning speculation of a fresh round of oil-patch deals, Premier Oil PLC, a small British independent oil company, said Monday it had received a buyout proposal from an unnamed party. Premier, with a market capitalization of about £1 billion, or $1.9 billion, said negotiations were at "an extremely early stage."

Wave Of Change Expected On Election Day (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

The wave is coming.

At least that is what political scientists are predicting about the midterm elections on Nov. 7. The academics could be wrong, of course; they often are.

But one of the peculiar facts about American politics is that every once in a while citizens in disparate parts of the country decide in the same year to reject an unusually large number of candidates for Congress from one party and to replace them with candidates from the other party.

That kind of outpouring is known as a wave, and it last occurred 12 years ago when Republicans gained a whopping 53 seats in the House and took control of that chamber for the first time in 40 years. Polls are now showing signs that the tide of public opinion is flowing in the opposite direction and that voters could vote Republicans out of office in droves this year, returning Democrats to power in the House and possibly in the Senate as well.

"This is going to be a wave year," said Larry J. Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia. "The only question is whether it will be medium-size wave or a high wave for the Democrats."

Indiana State University's Carl Klarner and Stan Buchanan used fancy computer models in June to predict that Democrats would pick up 22 seats in the House, enough to give them 224 seats, six more than they would need for majority control. Alan I. Abramowitz of Emory University in Atlanta used his own model last month to forecast that Democrats would gain 29 House seats. The professors did not predict that Democrats would take charge of the Senate -- a six-seat gain is needed to win a majority there -- though they do envision Democratic gains in that body of two to three seats.

Nonetheless, the realization of these numbers would constitute a wave.

This year's anti-Republican swell -- if it arrives in the dimensions professors imagine -- would be a wavelet by historical standards, said Linda L. Fowler, a political scientist at Dartmouth College. Voting waves were tsunami-size in the 19th and 20th centuries. Seven times before World War II and once afterward (in 1948), 70 or more seats flipped in the House.

But no one is expecting a change of that magnitude this year.

The main reason is that most congressional districts have been carefully reconfigured in recent decades to elect candidates from one party regardless of the national mood. "Democrats have relatively few seats available to them that are now being held by the other party," said Gary C. Jacobson of the University of California at San Diego.

Incumbents also have towering advantages in both financial resources and access to communications with constituents that make them difficult to unseat. In addition, negative campaign commercials and citizens' persistent apathy toward government have tended to keep voter turnout low, which primarily helps incumbents, especially GOP incumbents, election experts agree.

But a big turnover of seats is still possible. In fact, a wave has struck Congress once or twice a decade for the past 50 years.

These have mostly come in midterm elections -- when presidential candidates were not on the ballot -- including 1958, 1966, 1974, 1986 (in the Senate) and 1994. Occasionally a wave will come in a presidential election year, as it did in 1980.

What all of these movements have in common is that they happened when most voters were unhappy with the president. "A general sense of dissatisfaction with the president and his party is often a cause of a wave, as it was in 1994 under Bill Clinton," Abramowitz said. "The lower the president's job approval rating, the more seats his party tends to lose in the House."

The party that controls the White House routinely loses at least some House seats during midterm elections. But presidents who are broadly disliked compound that effect, sometimes enough to produce waves that dash members of his party. That is why even Republicans are acknowledging the strong possibility of a wave this year; President Bush's job approval rating has dipped below 40 percent lately, a dangerously low number.

Recent waves have also coincided with highly publicized scandals (in 1974, it was Watergate) and unpopular wars (in 1966, it was Vietnam). This year Bush and his party are facing both -- the fallout from the Jack Abramoff and Mark Foley scandals as well as widespread disapproval of the war in Iraq. "With a combination of scandal and war, the makings of a wave are all there," said John J. Pitney Jr. of Claremont McKenna College in California.

Thomas F. Schaller of the University of Maryland Baltimore County said Republicans have been holding off an inevitable congressional correction for at least two election cycles because of the extraordinary circumstances surrounding the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. A welling up of patriotism kept the GOP strong. But enough time has passed since then for that to have subsided. Now, Schaller said, "the wave is ready to break."

Wave elections frequently end up being larger and they knock off more incumbents than was initially anticipated. "Typical of a wave is that there are some lawmakers who seem safe on Election Day, but they turn out to be losers on election night," Pitney said.

Then again, predictions of waves come and go, like tides themselves, and they do not always come to true. "You can tell that a wave happened afterwards," said James A. Thurber, a political scientist at American University. "That's when people amend their stories about them."

Roll Call, October 24, 2006

With only a couple of weeks until Election Day, we know there will be a Democratic wave on Nov. 7. And we can be fairly certain that by historical standards it will be high — possibly very high. But we still don't know how many Republicans once considered safe will be swept out of office.

DOJ_NMG_0085719

The national political environment currently is worse than it was in 1994, when the Democrats lost 52 House seats, eight Senate seats and 10 governorships, and when Republicans won GOP control of the House for the first time in decades.

You heard me right: It's worse this year than it was in 1994, when voters were dissatisfied with the first two years of the Bill Clinton presidency.

President Bush's approval ratings are worse than Clinton's were — Bush's are in the upper 30s, while Clinton's were in the mid-to-upper 40s — and the 16 percent approval rating for Congress in the latest NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll ranks far below where Congress stood prior to the 1994 midterms (24 percent).

Similarly, the generic ballot in the NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll was much closer back in '94, when Republicans held a 5-point edge right before the elections. Now, there's a 15-point Democratic advantage.

Moreover, the problems hounding Republican Congressional candidates — which range from a second midterm election (as compared to a less dangerous first midterm in the Clinton administration) to House scandals to an unpopular war — are far more challenging than anything Democratic Congressional candidates faced in 1994.

If you are looking for a midterm election year that is comparable to 2006, you need to move beyond 1994 to include other recent "wave" midterms, particularly 1974, 1958 and 1982. In 1974 and 1958, the president's party, in each case the Republicans, lost 48 seats. In 1982, Republicans lost 26.

Each of these three elections holds a lesson for anyone trying to understand what is likely to happen in House races on Nov. 7.

The 1994 midterm was about Clinton — particularly the Clinton health care plan, gays in the military and his perceived liberalism.

In 1982, the election was about Ronald Reagan and "his recession."

In 1974, the election was about Richard Nixon and Watergate, and then-President Gerald Ford's September pardon of the disgraced former president. To some extent, it also was about a party that too frequently seemed to defend and shield Nixon.

And the 1958 election was about a farm recession and dissatisfaction with the Eisenhower administration in a part of the country that made up a big chunk of the GOP's base.

I don't count 1966 as a midterm wave, although Democrats lost 47 seats in the House while holding the White House. Rather, that midterm was a rebound election, coming two years after the GOP's disastrous 1964 presidential election.

Given that, the past four true midterm wave elections saw the victorious party winning 52, 48, 48 and 26 seats, suggesting a reasonable range for success for Democrats this year.

Given that the political environment right now is worse for Republicans than at any time since 1974 — and that Republicans hold 232 House seats, which is far, far above their level in any of the four previous cycles — their vulnerability is great.

Of course, it matters where a party starts, since an overextended party (that is, one holding lots of seats that ought to belong to the opposition) inevitably has more seats at risk, while one that holds relatively few districts has fewer to lose.

The GOP's 48-seat loss in 1974 was stunning because the party started the election holding fewer than 200 seats. In 1982, Republicans lost 26 seats starting at roughly the same point.

While the GOP isn't overextended now, its 15-seat majority suggests it is now near the upper limit of its "normal" range. It holds a few Democratic seats, and Democrats hold a few Republican seats, but most districts are represented by the "correct" party. Still, with Republicans holding 232 seats in the House, the party has plenty of districts to lose.

So where does this leave us?

With the national environment being as it is — and given the last round of redistricting, which limits possible Democratic gains — Republicans probably are at risk to lose as few as 45 seats and as many as 60 seats, based on historical results. Given how the national mood compares to previous wave years and to the GOP's 15-seat House majority, Democratic gains almost certainly would fall to the upper end of that range.

The paucity of competitive districts limits Republican risk, but how much? Unfortunately, I don't have an answer. But if redistricting cuts that kind of wave by half, Democrats would gain between 22 and 30 seats next month. And if the new districts slice Democratic gains by a smaller but still significant one-third, Democrats would pick up from 30 to 45 seats.

Dangerously big waves can be very strong and very unpredictable. They can bring widespread destruction and chaos. Republicans now must hope that this year's midterm wave isn't as bad as national poll numbers suggest it could be, because those national numbers suggest a truly historic tidal wave.

War, Economy Sway Race (USAT)

By Susan Page And Jill Lawrence

USA Today, October 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0085720

WASHINGTON — Two weeks before Election Day, voters are more focused on national issues than in any previous congressional election, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll finds, and they express unprecedented pessimism on the war in Iraq and downbeat attitudes about the economy.

Just 19% of those surveyed say the United States is winning in Iraq, an all-time low. And 38% say their own member of Congress doesn't deserve re-election, an all-time high.

POLL RESULTS: Congress | Bush | Iraq

As Republicans face a wave of voter discontent unmatched since they won control of Congress in 1994, Democrats are pouring money into congressional contests that until recently looked out of reach. They are running TV ads in 42 districts they are trying to wrest from the GOP, three of them new targets starting today.

Republicans have bought TV time to defend 33 seats and — with the addition today of a Savannah, Ga., district — are targeting five districts held by Democrats.

As the party in control of the government, Republicans need to convince voters that President Bush and Congress are doing a good job, that the war in Iraq was the right thing to do and that the economy is on the upswing — the issues that are driving voter attitudes.

The poll, taken Friday through Sunday, shows no progress made on those fronts.

"It's been more bad news piled on top of already bad news" for Republicans, says Charles Franklin, a political scientist at the University of Wisconsin, Madison.

"Can they turn it around? In principle they can, but time is running short."

Some Republicans concede that Democrats are likely to capture at least one chamber.

"Most people think that we would have a hard time holding the House if we voted today," says Charles Black, a senior GOP strategist and consultant to the Republican National Committee (RNC). "That said, two weeks is a long time."

On one measure, Republicans did see significant improvement. Two weeks ago, likely voters favored the unnamed Democratic congressional candidate in their district over the Republican by 23 percentage points, 59%-36%. The survey was taken immediately after Florida Rep. Mark Foley resigned in the congressional page scandal.

Now, the Democratic advantage on the generic congressional ballot has narrowed to 13 points, 54%-41%.

Still, that is more than the 12-point advantage Republicans held at this point in 1994, weeks before they swept to control of the House and Senate during President Clinton's first term, and higher than the margin held by either party in elections since then.

For months, Rep. Tom Reynolds, head of the National Republican Congressional Committee and who himself is in a tough race, has insisted that GOP candidates would survive a difficult political landscape because House elections traditionally turn on local issues, not national ones.

However, in the new poll, 43% of likely voters say national issues will make the biggest difference in their vote; 24% say local or state issues. That's the first overwhelming edge for national issues since the question was first asked in a Times Mirror poll in 1994.

A cascade of Republican misfortunes, including a string of ethics scandals and escalating violence in Iraq, has set the stage for a Democratic resurgence. Only an event as dramatic as the capture of Osama bin Laden or a terrorist attack could reverse the trend toward Democrats, analysts say.

"Nobody's listening to the rhetoric anymore," says political scientist Gary Jacobson of the University of California, San Diego. "They're responding to the news."

GOP advantages dwindle

Democrats need 15 new seats in the House and six in the Senate to claim a majority. Non-partisan analysts Stuart Rothenberg and Charles Cook estimate Democrats will gain at least 18 to 20 House seats and possibly more.

Taking over the Senate is a tougher proposition. Democrats are favored to pick up four Senate seats held by Republicans and are competitive in three more in border states: Virginia, Tennessee and Missouri.

Democrats are keeping an eye on a potential pickup in Arizona, Republicans on possibilities in New Jersey or Michigan.

This year, some traditional Republican advantages "aren't quite what they seemed," says political scientist John Pitney at Claremont McKenna College in Claremont, Calif. Among them:

·Money. Republicans have raised more money than Democrats overall, but Democrats are competitive, and some candidates are experiencing a late surge.

The RNC and the GOP House and Senate campaign committees had a combined $77.6 million in cash on hand as of Sept. 30, according to federal reports. The three Democratic committees reported $67.3 million on hand.

Democratic Party committees have invested at least $12.6 million to support Senate hopefuls Claire McCaskill in Missouri, Harold Ford Jr. in Tennessee and Jim Webb in Virginia.

Republican committees have spent $8.6 million in Missouri and Tennessee, including $1.8 million Monday for TV ads against McCaskill.

Brian Nick of the National Republican Senatorial Committee says the GOP may be on the defensive in those three conservative states, but he notes Democrats have been forced to spend heavily to defend seats in New Jersey, Maryland and Michigan — three traditionally Democratic states.

"Those dollars aren't going against our incumbents or for our open seats," he says.

·Redistricting. Pitney, a former Republican congressional aide, says districts mapped after the 2000 Census to protect GOP incumbents are changing and in some cases becoming less Republican.

"We're seeing demographic shifts that are bringing formerly safe Republican seats into reach for the Democrats," he says.

Robert Lang, a demographer at Virginia Tech's Metropolitan Institute, says new, far-flung mobility patterns mean the population and politics of a congressional district can shift "over half a decade, what would seem like the blink of an eye."

Many inner suburbs become more Democratic as Republicans move to outer suburbs. That has helped put into play seats such as the one held by Rep. Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio, near Columbus.

·Economic news. Low unemployment, falling gas prices and a record-setting stock market typically would translate into warm feelings about the economy. But 55% of Americans rate the economy as only fair or poor, and 54% say it is getting worse.

In places where the economy is a top concern — including Ohio, Michigan and Pennsylvania — people are upset about lost jobs, slow-growing wages for many workers and overseas competition. Democrats lambaste their opponents for voting against hikes in the minimum wage, promising a raise if they win control.

·Turnout by conservative Christians. Leaders of conservative Christian groups, including the Family Research Council, have complained that the Republican officials their members helped elect haven't delivered on such issues as a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage. So-called values voters also have been buffeted by the scandal involving Foley's lewd computer messages to former House pages.

Democrats in several states — including Ohio, Colorado, North Carolina and Tennessee — allude to Foley and other scandals in ads on Christian radio stations.

Melissa Deckman, a Christian-politics expert at Washington College in Easton, Md., says the party may convert some listeners and encourage others to stay home.

"The more likely situation is Christian conservatives are not going to go out and vote," she says.

Foley was the third GOP House member to resign this year amid scandal. A fourth, Ohio Rep. Bob Ney, pleaded guilty to corruption charges this month. A new problem arose last week when the FBI confirmed it was investigating whether Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., used his position to help his lobbyist daughter get contracts. Two days later, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee bought $1.6 million in TV time to run negative ads against him.

'Bogged down' in war

The war in Iraq is the single most powerful issue shaping the public's mood, the survey indicates, and attitudes toward the war have soured significantly. A record 35% say the war is going "very badly" for the United States. The number that says insurgents are winning the war has more than doubled since February, to 21%.

Now, 58% of those polled say the invasion of Iraq was a mistake. Of those with that view, more than three of four are supporting the Democrat for Congress.

"Foreign policy, whether it's Iraq or in general, has become a strong issue for the Democrats, and Republicans are running away from it," New York Sen. Charles Schumer, the Democrats' Senate campaign chief, said in an interview.

Former GOP House majority leader Dick Armey says small-government conservatives don't believe the United States can create a democracy in Iraq and have become convinced the war was unnecessary. "We've gotten ourselves bogged down in a mess we can't get out of," he says.

In the survey, one-third of conservatives called the invasion a mistake, as did two-thirds of moderates and more than 8 of 10 liberals.

Some Republican candidates closely aligned with President Bush have edged away from his "stay the course" message. Virginia Sen. George Allen, facing a stiff challenge from former Navy secretary Jim Webb, has begun talking in the past week about "adapting" and "adjusting" the U.S. approach. Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., for years a staunch war supporter, said this month he is "losing faith" in how it's being fought.

Playing the fear card

Democrats call those shifts too little, too late. "Changing direction in Iraq starts with changing the people we send to Washington," Shays' challenger, Diane Farrell, said Saturday in the Democratic response to Bush's radio address.

DOJ_NMG_0085722

Democrats, who since the Vietnam War have battled voter perceptions that they are soft on defense, are finding a more receptive audience for the argument that they could do a better job of protecting America and conducting its foreign policy. In the poll, 52% say the Iraq war has made the USA less safe from terrorism.

Nonetheless, Republicans continue to view the issue of terrorism as their strongest asset — both to persuade independent-minded voters and to energize core supporters. After circulating it in an e-mail to millions of supporters, the RNC broadcast an ad Sunday and Monday that showed bin Laden and other al-Qaeda leaders making threats against Americans and then the orange fireball of an explosion. The only sound: the ticking of a bomb's timer. "These are the stakes," the ad concludes, stark white words on a black screen.

Those words echo an infamous commercial President Lyndon Johnson used against Republican Barry Goldwater in 1964. Then, a girl counting daisy petals gave way to a missile countdown and a mushroom cloud. "These are the stakes," LBJ declared.

Phil Singer of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee says the new GOP ad is a reminder that, five years after the 9/11 attacks, the Bush administration still hasn't caught bin Laden.

'Intensity of feeling' a factor

Though congressional elections customarily turn on local issues, voters by nearly 20 percentage points say national issues will make the biggest difference in their vote.

Bush, whose job approval rating remained at 37%, could be a liability for candidates. By 41%-27%, those surveyed say they are more likely to vote for a candidate who opposes the president than one who supports him.

The RNC has built a get-out-the-vote machine renowned for its sophisticated technology and targeting of potential supporters. Democrats have long relied on a combination of efforts — by labor unions, interest groups, state parties and national committees — that failed to match the GOP operation in the last three elections.

This year, analysts say the underlying landscape favors Democrats.

"The Republicans' turnout operation is better," says Curtis Gans, director of the non-partisan Center for the Study of the American Electorate. "But the intensity of feeling is on the Democratic side. The issue climate is on the Democratic side."

Some groups are trying to harness that intensity. The AFL-CIO is spending a record $40 million to contact union members and encourage them to vote. MoveOn.org is running a Web-based phone bank that matches tens of thousands of volunteers with Democratic-leaning voters in three Senate races and 50 House contests.

Eli Pariser, director of MoveOn's political arm, says the project targets people who voted in the 2004 presidential race but not in the 2002 congressional elections. Some are Democrats, and others are considered likely to support Democrats based on an analysis of consumer data such as magazine subscriptions.

"This is basically a program to deliver 5 million nudges, 5 million phone calls," Pariser says.

Strategists for both sides say that phone banks and other turnout tools can only accomplish so much. "A field program is like a sailboat," Singer says. "You can have a beautiful sailboat that can win the America's Cup, but if there's no wind, it's not going anywhere."

Superior money and turnout aren't enough to prevail this year, the GOP's Black agrees. "We still need to get the national tide to swing back our way a little bit to keep our majority," he says.

Independent Voters Favor Democrats By 2 To 1 In Poll (WP)

By Dan Balz And Jon Cohen

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Two weeks before the midterm elections, Republicans are losing the battle for independent voters, who now strongly favor Democrats on Iraq and other major issues facing the country and overwhelmingly prefer to see them take over the House in November, according to a new Washington Post-ABC News poll.

The new poll underscores how much of a drag the war threatens to be on Republican candidates in competitive races. With debate underway in Washington about possible course changes in Iraq, Americans cite the war as the most important issue in determining their vote next month more often than any other issue, and those who do favor Democrats over Republicans by 76 percent to 21 percent.

Independents are poised to play a pivotal role in next month's elections because Democrats and Republicans are basically united behind candidates of their own parties. Ninety-five percent of Democrats said they will support Democratic candidates for the House, while slightly fewer Republicans, 88 percent, said they plan to vote for their party's candidates.

The independent voters surveyed said they plan to support Democratic candidates over Republicans by roughly 2 to 1 -- 59 percent to 31 percent -- the largest margin in any Post-ABC News poll this year. Forty-five percent said it would be good if Democrats recaptured the House majority, while 10 percent said it would not be. The rest said it would not matter.

The poll also found that independents are highly pessimistic about the Iraq war and the overall state of the country. Just 23 percent said the country is heading in the right direction, compared with 75 percent who said things have gotten off track. Only a quarter of independents approve of the job Congress has done this year. Only a third say the Iraq war is worth fighting. A month before the 2004 election, independents were almost evenly split on that question.

Independent voters may strongly favor Democrats, but their vote appears motivated more by dissatisfaction with Republicans than by enthusiasm for the opposition party. About half of those independents who said they plan to vote Democratic in their district said they are doing so primarily to vote against the Republican candidate rather than to affirmatively support the Democratic candidate. Just 22 percent of independents voting for Democrats are doing so "very enthusiastically."

Among the electorate as a whole, the poll highlighted how the political climate continues to favor Democrats. President Bush's approval rating among all Americans stood at 37 percent. Two weeks ago he was at 39 percent, and in September he was at 42 percent. By more than 2 to 1, Americans disapprove of the way Congress has been doing its job.

The generic vote for the House -- a question that asks people which party they favor in their district but that does not match actual candidates against one another -- remained strongly in the Democrats' favor, 54 percent to 41 percent.

These national numbers do not translate directly into predictions of whether Democrats will gain the 15 House seats or six Senate seats they need to take control of those chambers. But an analysis of the findings sheds light on why Republicans are now deeply worried about losing their House majority and why the Senate is in play as well.

The poll showed that Democrats not only have a significant advantage in blue states -- those won in the 2004 presidential race by Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) -- but also have a narrow advantage in Bush-backing red states, which helps to explain why the number of GOP-held seats that appear competitive has increased recently.

Iraq is cited most frequently as the most important issue in the midterm elections. Two weeks ago, 26 percent of those surveyed cited the war as the single most important issue determining their vote in November, compared with 23 percent who cited the economy and 14 percent who said terrorism. In the new poll, 27 percent said Iraq, 19 percent cited the economy and 14 percent said terrorism.

Independents are almost as likely as Democrats to cite Iraq as the single most important issue in the campaign. Both groups are twice as likely as Republicans to single out the war when asked about the election's top issues.

Independents do not limit their criticism of the war's handling to the president. Fifty-five percent of independents said congressional Republicans deserve a "great deal" or a "good amount" of the blame for problems in Iraq. Fewer, 36 percent, give congressional Republicans credit for helping prevent terrorist attacks against the United States since Sept. 11, 2001.

Bush agreed last week with a commentator's suggestion that a recent surge in violence in Iraq could be equivalent to the 1968 Tet Offensive, which marked a turning point in U.S. public support for the Vietnam War. But the percentage of Americans who believe that Iraq could be another Vietnam is no higher, at 45 percent, than it was in June.

Four in 10 Americans said the war is not worth fighting, and three in four said the war has damaged the United States' image in the rest of the world. Not quite half of those surveyed said that overall, the war has helped to improve the lives of the Iraqi people, a sharp decline since June, when roughly seven in 10 believed it had.

The small decline in the economy's ranking as a top voting issue comes at a time when Americans are increasingly upbeat about the state of the national economy. Fifty-five percent of those surveyed said the economy is "good" or "excellent," a sharp jump over the past two weeks and the highest since Bush took office.

But Republicans appear to be getting little tangible benefit from the growing economic optimism, which has come amid declining gasoline prices and a record high in the Dow Jones industrial average. Those who cite the economy as the most important issue favor Democrats by 18 percentage points, 57 percent to 39 percent.

One reason is that only a quarter of those surveyed said they are getting ahead financially. About the same number said they are falling behind. Most, however, said they are just able to maintain their standard of living. Republicans have an advantage only among those who say their financial condition is improving.

Among those voting primarily on Iraq, Democrats hold a sizable lead, 76 percent to 21 percent, in voting intentions. Democrats also are favored by voters who cite health care as their most important issue, while those voting on terrorism or immigration strongly favor Republicans.

Voters also continue to trust Democrats more than Republicans to deal with the war, the economy, North Korea and ethics in government. On terrorism, the two parties are at parity.

But independents, the key swing voter group, strongly trust the Democrats on all of those issues by margins ranging from 14 percentage points on terrorism to 23 points on Iraq and North Korea and 26 points on ethics in government.

The growing independent support for Democratic House candidates represents a significant shift in attitudes since the 2004 election, when Democrats held only a slim advantage. In winning reelection, Bush narrowly lost the independent vote, 50 percent to 48 percent, and in the vote for the House, independents split 50 to 46 for Democratic candidates.

One important question that will affect the outcome of the elections is who shows up to vote. More Democrats than Republicans, 32 percent vs. 24 percent, said they are "very closely" following the campaign, and Democrats are more likely to be very enthusiastic about voting. Independents show less enthusiasm about this election than do Democrats or Republicans.

Almost three in five respondents said this congressional election is more important than past congressional elections. A higher percentage of Democrats said this election has more significance than did Republicans or independents.

Both parties are making extraordinary efforts to turn out their voters in November. Twenty-nine percent of registered voters said they had been contacted by one party or the other for their votes, and three in 10 of those said they had been contacted by advocates for both parties.

Republicans appear to be doing a better job of contacting independents. In the poll, 45 percent of those independents who said they had been contacted said they were urged to vote for Republicans, while 17 percent said they were urged to vote for Democrats. The rest said they were contacted by both sides.

The Post-ABC News poll findings are based on telephone interviews with 1,200 adults conducted Thursday through Sunday. The margin of sampling error is plus or minus three percentage points.

In Southwest, A Shifting Away From Party Ties (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

SHOW LOW, Ariz. — Political parties are like cowboy boots in many parts of the West. If one pair doesn't fit, you try on another.

Hal F. Butler is old enough to remember when the boots here in Navajo County were overwhelmingly filled by Republicans, and then, beginning in the late 1940's, how the county turned Democratic. Mr. Butler became a Democrat in the 1950's at the urging of his mother, a staunch Republican who said the Democratic Party was the party of the future for an ambitious young man.

Now Mr. Butler, who is 81 with half a century of elected and appointed office behind him, including a stint as Show Low's mayor, sees an emerging third wave: the age of the independents is here, he said, and his own family is shifting along with it.

"The independent vote is swinging everything," he said. "They're going to be the powerhouse."

Nowhere has the shift been more pronounced in recent years than in the Southwest, where Republicans have enjoyed an overwhelming advantage since the days of Barry Goldwater. Here in Arizona, people who reject the old major party labels are by far the fastest-growing category of voter, with the number of independents doubling over the last 10 years, to more than one in four.

Numbers like that are the stuff that ulcers are made of for party regulars and election prognosticators, who are trying to figure out where the new independents are coming from politically or geographically and where they might hang their hats on Election Day. No one is fully confident. Anxiety is high.

"Arizona has always had an independent streak, but these new voters are of all stripes," said Garrick Taylor, a spokesman for the Arizona Republican Party. "They're going to be a wild card."

But if the trend toward independent voters continues — and there is no sign of faltering — experts say it will lead to more competitive races not only on local and statewide levels but also in the presidential election.

As the Nov. 7 elections approach, the whole idea of party is in flux in many parts of the nation as candidates and voters reassess the connotations — in baggage or benefit — of party association. Some office seekers are omitting their party label on their lawn signs, and some dwell at length on the stump on how much they disagree with their own parties on issues like the environment or stem cell research— all to look more unaffiliated in order to lure the independent vote.

Closer elections and more balanced war chests, meanwhile, in races across the nation are elevating the role of independents regardless of their numbers — and changing as well the strategies of how to reach them, even as they turn their noses up at what the two-party system has become.

"The first message they're sending to us in the political world, and to general public, is 'Don't assume anything,' " said Michael J. Frias, director of campaigns for the Arizona Democratic Party.

Who the independents are is probably the first assumption to discard, politicians and researchers say. Polls by Arizona State University, for example, suggest that younger voters who no longer see the relevance of party membership are one of the largest engines of the growth.

But here in Arizona's First Congressional District, the growing number of independents — about 23 percent — is compounded by a surge in newcomers, especially from California and the Midwest.

A spokesman for Representative Rick Renzi, a two-term Republican, said many of the new independents were libertarians who rejected party just as they rejected intrusion by government. A spokesman for Ellen Simon, Mr. Renzi's Democrat challenger, said that the independents could not be pigeonholed and that the only reasonable campaign tactic was to talk to them — and talk and talk.

"With the independent voters, you have to talk to them more often, with more frequency and be as specific as possible," said Brandon Hall, the campaign manager for Ms. Simon.

In other races around the country, courting independent voters has coincided with a feeling that party affiliation of any kind this year could be toxic. In New Hampshire, where independent and third-party voters account for more than 40 percent of the electorate, Representative Charlie Bass, a Republican, has run television advertisements proclaiming how different he is from his party.

In Colorado's closely fought Seventh Congressional District outside Denver, lawn signs for the candidates — Ed Perlmutter, a Democrat, and Rick O'Donnell, a Republican — mostly carry no party identification. About one in three voters in Colorado are independents — in the Seventh it is even higher, 37 percent.

Some election experts are skeptical about voter statistics and say party registration as counted by most states is a poor measure of the electorate. Massachusetts, for example, has rules that encourage strategic registration, since independents can vote in any party's primary. Most national surveys have shown little change in the numbers of self-described independents since the late 1970's, but the polls tend to ask about ideological preference rather than actual party registration.

But here in the Southwest, the shift away from major party affiliation has been pronounced. Of the seven states with the fastest-growing proportion of independent or third-party voters from 2000 to 2004, four are clustered in the Southwest — Arizona, California, Nevada, and New Mexico, according to Election Data Services, a nonpartisan consulting company that tracks election information. New Hampshire had the second-fastest growth after Arizona, followed by Florida and Maryland.

And the changes in voter registration have coincided, at least in the West, with a decidedly positive turn for local Democratic candidates in states where Republicans had been dominant, either by history or in number. Four states in the eight-state Rocky Mountain region — Arizona, Montana, New Mexico and Wyoming — now have Democratic governors, up from zero in 2000. And in Colorado, Bill Ritter, a Democrat, has led Representative Bob Beauprez, a Republican, in most polls going into next month's election for governor.

Arizona had the fastest growth in the nation in no-party and third-party registration from 2000 to 2004 among the 25 states that count party numbers, up to 25.5 percent in just four years from 14.7 percent of the electorate, according to Election Data Services. Nationally, the ranks of the independent rose by 21 percent in that period among the 25 party-counting states, compared with a 7.4 percent increase for Democrats and 5.5 percent for Republicans.

Meanwhile, Republicans of Western libertarian bent have chafed as their party has held ever more tightly to the morals-based agenda of its Christian evangelical wing, said Ryan Sager, author of the recently published book "The Elephant in the Room," which chronicles the libertarian-evangelical tension.

California, with Democrats dominant but independents rising in number, also has a moderate Republican governor in Sacramento, which suggests that perhaps nonparty voters are not tilting Democratic at all, that the only certainty is that they have rejected the old labels.

"The Western image of the small-government, leave-me-alone conservative no longer fits into the modern Republican Party," Mr. Sager said in an interview. "And the Democratic Party is not as scary as it used to be."

Experts like Mr. Sager say that places like Navajo County, about three hours northeast of Phoenix, are a natural breeding ground for antiparty sentiment because party labels have always been a bit artificial, reflecting local culture more than ideology, and are therefore easier to shake off. Between the 2000 election and last month, the number of independents here rose from about 15 percent of the electorate to 22 percent heading into the November elections, according to Arizona secretary of state's office. Shifts like that are getting politicians' attention all around the country.

"Politics has become a winner-take-all game played at the expense of ordinary citizens," said Ben Westlund, a state senator from Oregon who resigned from the Republican Party this year to run for governor as an independent. But Mr. Westlund withdrew from the race in August because he said he did not want to be a spoiler candidate who would skew the election.

The deepened sense of polarization in American politics is also making the independent voters' journey harder. As recently as the 1970's, for example, many voters told pollsters that they would vote across party lines for a presidential candidate they liked. They have become much less likely to think outside the box in the years since, said Robert Y. Shapiro, a professor of political science at Columbia University.

Here in Show Low, which was named for a turn of the cards in an 1800's property dispute between two ranchers — low card takes all — hardened partisan orthodoxy is exactly the problem. "Both parties are out for themselves," said Greg Butler, Hal Butler's son, who grew up a Democrat but changed to independent in 2004 and said he was supporting candidates in both parties this year. "I think you've got a right to do what you want and a right not to be labeled — I like that," said Mr. Butler, 56.

DOJ_NMG_0085726

His son, Dusty Butler, 26, skipped the Democratic phase entirely and went right to independent when he registered for the first time. He plans to vote mostly for Republicans next month, he said.

"I asked Dad a lot of questions, and it made sense to me," he said.

Some Navajo County residents say that because lots of Democrats have voted for Republicans over the years, and vice versa, the divisions between the parties are not as pronounced here, which makes it easier to abandon the idea of a party at all.

Other people say the major parties have simply made people angry.

Hal Butler said that some of environmental protection rules under the Clinton administration, including restrictions on mining, ranching and forestry — the big three traditional industries here in Navajo County — were not popular, to say the least. But Mr. Butler said the Republicans had made no friends by promising to reverse the Clinton rules and mostly failing to follow through.

Mr. Butler said he had kept his Democratic Party membership, for now, in support of his son Gary H. Butler, a Democrat who has been the elected Navajo County sheriff for the last 18 years. When Gary Butler retires in two years, Hal Butler said, that obligation will end and he will quit the Democratic Party and turn independent.

Gary Butler, 60, said he, too, planned to resign his party membership upon retirement, though he was not sure where he would go.

"Right now, both parties are way too far apart and nobody is looking out for the good of the people," he said.

Rising Radical Center (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

HANCOCK, Mich. -- President Bush's six-year effort to create an enduring Republican majority based on a right-leaning coalition is on the verge of collapse. The way he tried to create it could have the unintended consequence of opening the way for an alternative majority.

This incipient Democratic alliance, while tilting slightly leftward, would plant its foundations firmly in the middle of the road, because its success depends on overwhelming support from moderate voters. That's why a Democratic victory in November -- defined as taking one or both houses of Congress -- would have effects far beyond a single election year.

The Democrats' dependence on moderate voters and moderate candidates belies Republican claims that a Democratic victory would bring radically liberal politics to Washington. In fact, the first imperative of Democratic congressional leaders, if their party is successful, will be finding policies, ideas and rhetoric to allow the party's progressives and moderates to get along and govern effectively together.

The strategy pursued by Bush and Karl Rove has frightened most of the political center into the arms of Democrats. Bush and Rove sought victory by building large turnouts among conservatives and cajoling just enough moderates the Republicans' way. But this approach created what may prove to be a fatal political disconnect: Adventurous policies designed to create enthusiasm on the right turned off a large number of less ideological voters.

The Democrats' lead in the polls can be thus explained by two factors: the energy of a passionate phalanx of voters desperate to use this election to rebuke Bush, and the disenchantment of moderates fed up with the failures of Bush's governing style and ideology, notably in Iraq.

A survey this month for National Public Radio in the 48 most-contested House districts makes clear that anti-Bush energy is this election's driving force. While only 22 percent of those surveyed by Public Opinion Strategies and Greenberg Quinlan Rosner strongly approved of Bush's performance in office, 44 percent strongly disapproved. This points to a huge enthusiasm deficit for the Republicans.

But the survey also showed that the Democrats' 51 to 40 percent lead in these competitive districts came not just from liberals but also from self-described moderates, who favored the Democrats by 59 percent to 34 percent. There are twice as many moderates as liberals in these key districts, so moderates are the linchpin of Democratic chances.

If a Democratic majority depends on moderate voters, it also depends on the victory of moderate candidates. In five of the seven races likely to decide control of the Senate, Democrats have nominated candidates who simply cannot be seen as conventional liberals.

That is certainly true of Harold Ford Jr. in Tennessee, Jon Tester in Montana, James Webb in Virginia and Claire McCaskill in Missouri. In Pennsylvania, Democrat Robert Casey is moderate or even moderately conservative on many social issues. In House races in more conservative states, Democrats have gone out of their way to find middle-of-the-road candidates.

But Democratic moderation this year carries a sharp edge of economic populism, and a consensus is already developing around health care, energy and corporate accountability. In one his advertisements, Montana's Tester marries fiscal conservatism with an anti-corporate appeal by promising to "stand up to oil company giveaways, no-bid contracts to Halliburton and billions in pork, including bridges to nowhere, all saddling our kids with more and more debt."

One of the Democrats' more conservative House challengers, Heath Shuler in North Carolina, declares that "it's not right when big insurance companies write health care laws and millions can't afford to see a doctor." In Michigan's 8th Congressional District, challenger Jim Marcinkowski's attacks on incumbent Republican Mike Rogers's ties to the energy and health care industries are a key part of his campaign. And Democrats of all stripes have become increasingly pointed in criticizing the president's Iraq policies.

There has long been talk about the rise of a "radical center," made up of voters essentially moderate in their philosophical leanings but radical in their disaffection with the status quo. This looks to be the year of the radical center. If it is, the Democrats will win. And if they win, their task will be to meet the aspirations of a diverse group of dissatisfied and disappointed Americans. Not an easy chore, but one that certainly beats being in the opposition.

With Two Weeks Left, Republicans Should Quit Playing Defense (RC)

By David Winston

Roll Call, October 24, 2006

In the fall of 1982, I was a young opposition researcher at the National Republican Congressional Committee. All that summer, the political environment had become increasingly difficult for Republicans.

Our election strategy had been based on then-President Ronald Reagan's economic plan to turn around the disastrous economy he inherited from former President Jimmy Carter's failed administration. When Reagan took office, interest rates were in double digits with home mortgage rates as high as 15 percent. Americans had been forced to sit in long lines at the gas pumps, only to pay exorbitant prices. Our hostages had been returned, but our national prestige had been badly damaged by Carter's weakness.

The national party's message that year was simply "stay the course" — stick with Reagan's economic policies, we asserted, and America will be strong once again. Unfortunately, party leaders misjudged voter attitudes and patience.

Despite the fact that Reagan's new supply-side economic plan had been in effect less than a year, people wanted to see still more aggressive action, not hear "stay the course." When unemployment hit 10 percent one month before the elections, it became clear that Reagan's policies would not work in time. Still, the party clung to its message, which simply flew in the face of reality. Our faith in the Reagan economic program wasn't misplaced, just mistimed.

Eventually, his policies did restore the country's economy, but not soon enough, as Republicans in the House lost 26 seats that fall. It wasn't long before the joke around town became "stay the curse." Developing election themes can be tricky. External events don't always cooperate. In 1982, it was unemployment. This year, it's the Iraq War and an unhappy electorate, which seems convinced, despite overwhelming evidence to the contrary, that the country's economy is on the wrong track.

Much like 1982, an impatient public doesn't want to hear "stay the course." They want a more activist approach focused on solving what they see as the country's problems, as well as their own. With two weeks left before the elections, Republicans ought to take the advice of former Rep. J.C. Watts (Okla.), who used to advise the Republican Conference to "stay on offense." "Stay the course" is defensive, and Republicans need to break out of their self-imposed box — and do it quickly.

Fortunately, the campaign seems to have reached a pivot point. If nothing new emerges concerning the former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) scandal, the side that defines the focus of political discourse in the last 14 days will go into Election Day with an advantage.

Republicans still have two great strengths — the economy and national security — if they are willing to follow Watts' advice and take their record on offense.

The stock market has hit new highs, which means people are likely to feel better about their retirement and college funds. Unemployment has dipped to a low 4.6 percent, which means people are working.

The Bush economic policies have created more than 6 million new jobs over the past four years, and we're beginning to see wages rise, with an increase of 4 percent over the past 12 months. Homeownership also is at record highs, and gas prices have fallen dramatically.

Thanks to a historic rebound in federal revenues, the deficit has been cut almost in half while state budgets are back in the black, as their revenues continue to grow at a fast pace. Today, Republicans can legitimately argue that a balanced budget is only three to four years away.

That's not a record that reflects stagnant policies or neglect, as Democrats charge. Republicans should take credit for a strong, steady economy that is at least as good, if not better, than the Clinton economic bubble of the late 1990s.

They also should claim credit for keeping America safe for the past five years. The bottom line is this country hasn't been attacked since Sept. 11, 2001. That fact was brought home once again when the U.S. and British governments foiled the London terror plot in September, thanks in part to the president's aggressive intelligence operations.

In September, the Republican Congress passed new port-security legislation to beef up inspections of incoming ships to America's ports. It passed a border-security bill to authorize new tools, including a fence, to stem the tide of illegal immigration and to make our borders more secure and the country safer. And over Democratic objections, Republicans in Congress took action to ensure that we can effectively interrogate terrorists who would do us great harm.

Republicans have a solid record proving they are working to solve many of the nation's most difficult problems with little or no help from Democrats. They need to jettison "stay the course" now, forcefully take their record to the voters, and make Democrats do more than carp and criticize.

Voters will see that Democrats have no real solutions other than to offer themselves up as an alternative to President Bush, an alternative devoid of real ideas. They have no serious plan for Iraq. Their economic program boils down to Rep. Charlie Rangel (D-N.Y.), the likely chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in a Democrat-controlled House, putting us on notice that there isn't a single Bush tax cut "that merits renewal." Voters need to understand that if Democrats take control of Congress, they might as well mark 2010 on their calendars for tax increases, if not sooner.

But voters don't understand. They hear "stay the course," and they instinctively reject what sounds to them like a strategy of the status quo. More to the point, it doesn't accurately represent the president's Iraq or domestic policies. While the goal remains the same, a democratic and free Iraq, strategy and tactics have changed over time to respond to the enemy and, as evidenced this past weekend, will continue to change.

Tax cuts, national security measures, a comprehensive energy plan, a Medicare prescription drug program, class-action litigation reform — these hardly are the hallmarks of a status quo domestic agenda either.

Republicans are not the party of "stay the course" and never have been. It's time they stop acting like it.

Minority Church Leaders Backing Away From GOP (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, October 24, 2006

— A major effort to draw Latinos and blacks into the Republican Party, a central element of the GOP plan to build a long-lasting majority, is in danger of collapse amid anger over the immigration debate and claims that Republican leaders have not delivered on promises to direct more money to church-based social services.

President Bush, strategist Karl Rove and other top Republicans have wooed Latino and black leaders, many of them evangelical clergy who lead large congregations, in hopes of peeling away the traditional Democratic base. But now some of the leaders who helped drive Bush to victory in 2004 are revisiting their loyalty to the Republican Party and, in some cases, abandoning it. "There is a fissure, and I doubt it will be closed in this election," said the Rev. Luis Cortes Jr., a Republican who founded the annual National Hispanic Prayer Breakfast that has featured Bush every year since 2002. His Philadelphia-based Esperanza USA boasts a national affiliate network of more than 10,000 churches.

The Latino backlash has grown so intense that one prominent, typically pro-Republican organization, the Latino Coalition, has endorsed Democrats in competitive races this year in Tennessee, Nebraska and New Jersey. The coalition is chaired by Hector Barreto, the former administrator of the Small Business Administration under Bush; its president is a former strategist for the Republican National Committee.

The disaffection comes as Republicans face a challenge in building enthusiasm for the upcoming election among white evangelicals and other conservatives, who have been the core of the GOP's political base.

Taken together, the unhappiness among these groups could threaten GOP hopes of minimizing losses in the Nov. 7 congressional election and may undercut the party's goal of keeping the presidency in 2008. The Latino Coalition, for example, has endorsed the presumed Democratic presidential front-runner, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), in her reelection bid this year.

Complaints among black pastors who had been courted by the White House — while less pronounced than those of Latino leaders — have been fueled by a tell-all book by former White House aide David Kuo. The new book says that Bush, referring to pastors from one major African American denomination, once griped: "Money. All these guys care about is money. They want money."

A White House spokeswoman said Friday that nobody there recalled hearing such a comment from the president.

The Rev. Eugene Rivers, a Boston Pentecostal minister and one of about two dozen black clergy invited to a series of White House meetings with Bush, said Friday that black leaders had been wooed with assurances that their social service groups would receive money from the president's faith-based initiative. But, Rivers said, the bulk of the money had gone to white organizations, leaving black churches on the sidelines.

Rivers plans to send a letter early this week to the White House demanding to know how much social services money has been directed to black churches under the faith-based initiative, and requesting a "new conversation" with Bush.

"There's a growing frustration and anger in the black religious community nationally as the Kuo book makes the rounds," Rivers said. "Meetings at the White House show you the door, but they don't necessarily open the door."

Bush won an estimated 44% of the Latino vote in 2004. While polling numbers vary, many analysts said that represented about a 9-percentage-point improvement from 2000, suggesting that Latinos might become a substantial pillar upholding a durable Republican majority.

But in recent months, Democratic activists who marveled at Bush's success in courting Latino voters watched with amazement as Republicans pushed into law a 700-mile fence along the Mexican border and tried to make it a felony to migrate illegally or to help undocumented immigrants. The latter provision did not become law, but it especially angered some church leaders, who said it would have criminalized their religious duty to help the least privileged in society.

Despite Bush's lobbying for an immigrant guest-worker program, favored by many Latinos, conservative lawmakers in the House refused to bend, forcing Bush to endorse the fence legislation and dimming his popularity among Latinos.

A survey released this month by the Latino Coalition found Latino registered voters supporting Democrats over Republicans 56% to 19% in congressional elections. "If Republicans nationally get 25% of the Hispanic vote, it would be a miracle," said Robert de Posada, the coalition president.

That disaffection is felt among some of the Latino clergy who were courted by the White House.

The Rev. Danny de Leon of Templo Calvario in Santa Ana, considered the biggest Latino bilingual church in the U.S., said he was so frustrated with his party's response to immigration that he was likely to stay home next month rather than vote for Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger — and that he might also sit out the 2008 election.

"A lot of people are saying, 'Forget being a Republican. I want to go to the Democratic Party,' " said De Leon. "It's a shame that one issue has divided many of us that have been in the Republican Party for a long time and has brought us to ask the question: Do I or do I not want to belong to this party?"

Pastor Luciano Padilla Jr. of the Bay Ridge Christian Center in Brooklyn said he had backed Republicans because of their views on such issues as gay marriage and abortion. But in the midst of the immigration debate, he said, "We will have to look at where we put our allegiance in the future."

Cortes, of Esperanza USA, says he continues to respect Bush but now has doubts about the GOP. "That group in the Republican Party said, 'We want your parents, your grandparents, we want anyone here without documentation, regardless of why — we want them out,' " he said. "If voting is about personal interest, how are Hispanics to vote? They will vote against those guys."

The White House now faces a symbolic choice on the border-fence legislation: Does Bush rally the GOP base with a large, pre-election signing ceremony, or does he reject such fanfare in hopes of avoiding long-term damage among Latinos?

Republican officials said their internal polls showed the party winning about 32% of the Latino voting bloc this year — similar to the 2002 results that helped the GOP gain seats in Congress.

They said the party would continue its aggressive outreach, focusing on issues such as home ownership, jobs and family values.

"We cannot maintain majority status in America without a growing share of the Latino vote," said Adrian Gray, director of strategy at the Republican National Committee. He said that "when 44% of Latinos supported President Bush in that last election, it opens the door for many of them to vote Republican in the future."

Causing new wrinkles in the White House relationship with evangelicals is the Kuo book, "Tempting Faith: An Inside Story of Political Seduction," in which he describes top White House aides embracing religious conservatives in public while calling them "nuts" behind their backs.

One leading black evangelical who has been an occasional White House guest, Bishop Harry Jackson Jr. of the Hope Christian Church in Maryland, wrote of a similar incident this month.

Jackson railed against senior administration officials who, he said, had insulted clergy at a meeting this year by dismissing their contribution to Bush's reelection in 2004. He also complained about "the GOP's failure" to react speedily to the House page scandal involving Mark Foley, the Republican congressman from Florida who resigned recently.

Jackson still supports some Republicans, including Michael Steele, an African American candidate for Senate in Maryland. But in an essay on the website townhall.com, Jackson offered a caution for the party: "Evangelicals must ask themselves if we can work in harmony with a group that takes us for granted and compromises on major moral principles."

Poll Watchers Split On Hispanic Turnout (WT)

By Keyonna Summers

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

Hispanic rights activists and immigration-policy researchers disagree on how many Hispanics will turn out to vote on Nov. 7.

Advocates say Hispanics are encouraged by rallies last spring and motivated by local government efforts to limit day-laborer practices and housing of illegal aliens. Researchers argue that the rallies had little effect.

Wilma Linares, of the immigrant advocacy group CASA of Maryland, said local politicians have ignored immigrants' concerns about affordable housing, health care, education and immigration reform, and that Hispanics will respond on Election Day.

"We want our politicians to understand that ... we have 90,000 Latinos who are capable of voting in Maryland alone and we are going to do everything we can for them to get out and vote for those candidates who are really looking to improve their response to the issues that we're interested in," Miss Linares said last week at "Your Vote Is Your Voice," a nonpartisan campaign to rally immigrant and black voters.

Researchers say many Hispanics are here illegally and represent the ethnic group with the fewest registered voters. They noted that demonstrations fizzled when legislation to grant illegals a path to citizenship stalled in Congress.

"There's no doubt that the series of events around the national mobilization ... will help serve as a stimulus for Hispanic turnout," said Adam J. Segal, director of the Hispanic Voter Project at Johns Hopkins University.

"But months later we have a situation where the only legislation that's come out of Congress has been a modestly funded and incomplete federal border security program and fence and no real resolution on the status of undocumented workers," Mr. Segal said.

So, "I think there's a real question whether [the Hispanic turnout will] be anywhere near where a lot of community activists had predicted at the time."

More than 17 million Hispanics in the U.S. are eligible to vote, a 7 percent increase from 2004, the Pew Hispanic Center reported. More than 95,000 Hispanics are eligible to vote in Maryland and more than 140,600 are eligible in Virginia.

"What they're really showing is that the number of naturalized immigrants has increased nationally," said Jack Martin, a special projects director for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, a District-based think tank that favors curbs on illegal border crossings.

"What it doesn't show is that there is likely to be any increase in voter participation."

Immigration advocates point to hot-button issues such as driver's licensing, day-laborer centers and local enforcement of federal immigration laws as reasons for Hispanics to go to the polls.

Pew figures show that Hispanic voter turnout increased from 5.5 percent of votes cast in 2000 to 6 percent in 2004.

"We've had a tremendous amount of frustration with the political clog-up on the issues and we expect a lot of voter anger in November," said Kim Propeack, a spokeswoman for CASA of Maryland.

CASA officials said they registered nearly 600 voters during the summer and that citizenship course enrollment has quadrupled.

CASA volunteers plan to knock on at least 100 doors by Election Day and help Executive Director Gustavo Torres make calls to residences. The group is asking people who use its legal, financial, language and employment services to bring at least five friends or relatives to the polls in an effort to increase participation by 30,000 voters.

The Prince George's County chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the D.C.-based African Resource Center and labor unions will join the initiative.

Mr. Segal said that may not be enough to tip the outcome of local elections.

"The most significant challenge is that a large number of Hispanic voters in Maryland are not registered or are not citizens," he said. "And while CASA has a tremendous amount of clout, the question is -- because of who they represent -- how much electoral strength can they garner?"

Control Of The U.S. Senate Down To The Wire In Two Pivatol Races (MINNST)

By Steven Thomma

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Republican Senate candidates have fought back to regain an edge in two key races, pivotal battlegrounds that could determine which party controls the Senate, according to a series of new McClatchy-MSNBC polls and a companion Virginia Poll.

DOJ_NMG_0085731

Republicans hold narrow leads in Tennessee and Virginia, two states where the party hopes to build a Southern bulwark against a Democratic tide that's threatening their Senate seats elsewhere in the country.

The new polls show Democrats leading in two states they must hold -- New Jersey and Washington -- as well as in five states now held by Republicans: Missouri, Montana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island.

Yet even if Democrats take all seven of those battleground states, they still need to win either Tennessee or Virginia to take control of the Senate. Democrats must gain six seats overall to take a majority. "Control of the Senate is going to come down to Tennessee and Virginia," said Brad Coker, the pollster for Mason-Dixon Polling & Research Inc., who conducted the surveys for McClatchy-MSNBC in eight states.

Coker noted that Tennessee and Virginia are culturally conservative states in which Republicans have won Senate campaigns for more than a decade. Also, the Republican candidates in each state appeared to find their footing in recent weeks.

In Virginia, Republican Sen. George Allen stopped losing ground after he was accused of racial insensitivity and went on the attack against his Democratic opponent, James Webb, in part charging that Webb was insensitive to women in the military.

In Tennessee, Republican candidate Bob Corker fired his top campaign staff and went on the attack against his Democratic rival, Rep. Harold Ford.

While many analysts and insiders of both major parties expect the Republicans to lose control of the House of Representatives, the Senate is viewed as a closer contest. Control of either house of Congress is crucial to passing legislation, while the Senate has sole power to confirm appointments to the federal judiciary, including the Supreme Court.

The polls revealed a shifting landscape in recent weeks, with Democrats leading in several states but Republicans not only clawing back in Tennessee and Virginia but also narrowing the gap in Montana. Democrat Jon Tester led incumbent Republican Sen. Conrad Burns by 46 percent to 43 percent. Three weeks ago, Tester led 47-40 percent.

Of the nine key battleground states, Republicans are ahead in two and within the polls' 4 percentage-point margin of error in three more.

Iraq remains the dominant issue in all but one battleground state, despite intense news coverage of the House page scandal, North Korea's nuclear test and record highs in the stock market. That hurts Republicans because those voting on Iraq break for Democrats by margins of 2 to 1 or more.

Terrorism --usually a Republican strength -- has receded as an issue, with the 9/11 anniversary now a memory. Even Republican efforts to rekindle fear of terrorism might not help in most of these Senate campaigns:

· Voters who say they are worried about a terrorist attack on the United States gave the Republican Senate candidate an edge in Montana and Tennessee.

· They favored the Democrat in Pennsylvania and Rhode Island.

· They split almost evenly between the Democrat and Republican in Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio and Washington state.

The polls partly affirmed decisions by Republican leaders to build a Southern wall to protect their Senate majority, steering campaign cash into Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia while pulling it out of states such as Montana, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

The McClatchy-MSNBC Poll is a snapshot of voter opinion at the time it was conducted. It is not a prediction of how people will vote. The poll of 625 likely voters in each state was conducted by telephone Oct. 17-21. Those interviewed were randomly selected by telephone numbers from a cross-section of telephone exchanges. That means anyone in the state with a land-phone line had the same odds of being called as anyone else. Cell phone numbers are not in the exchanges.

The margin of error was plus or minus 4 percentage points. That means that 95 percent of the time, the correct numbers could be up to 4 percentage points above the poll's percentage point findings or up to 4 percentage points below them.

The Mason-Dixon Virginia Poll was conducted for several major state newspapers and made available to McClatchy Newspapers. For the complete results of the latest McClatchy/MSNBC poll, go to www.mcclatchydc.com.

The Money Starts Talking (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

After weeks of Republican and Democratic boasting (and feinting) about what states and districts are in play, the time for bluffing is just about past.

A look at where the Republicans are spending their money makes it increasingly evident that they are choosing to focus on defending a relative handful of Senate and House seats. Democrats are trying to expand the battlefield to races that were not considered competitive even a few weeks ago.

Republicans have all but given up on Senate races in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Montana and Rhode Island. They are pinning their hopes of keeping control on Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia, and are debating whether to try to put Democrats on the defensive in New Jersey. Republicans said they would decide in the next few days whether to make a high-risk, all-out assault there on Senator Robert Menendez, to follow up on some relatively small spending done to test the waters.

In the House, Democrats have steadily increased the number of races where they are competing. By Sunday it was 40, including Republican-held seats in California, Minnesota, Nevada and New York. The Republicans have apparently pulled out of two Ohio districts, as well as once-competitive districts in Indiana, West Virginia and South Carolina. ADAM NAGOURNEY

Some Republicans Aren't Sharing The Wealth (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

Senate Republicans with enormous campaign war chests are refusing to transfer significant amounts of money to help fellow Republicans who are cash-strapped and face defeat in the final weeks of the campaign.

The stinginess alarms some of the Republican Party's top campaign strategists, especially because it is in such stark contrast to the millions of dollars that Democrats have transferred to their candidates in need.

Control of the Senate will come down to a half-dozen close races next month, and both sides agree that money will likely determine the outcome of each. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) has nearly twice as much money on hand as the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) for that final sprint to Election Day.

According to the latest figures available, the DSCC has $23 million and the NRSC has $12 million. Much of that difference stems from the disparity in late giving from sitting senators.

"Time is running out," one senior Republican aide said. "People will not want to look back and wonder what more could have been done. That would be a real shame."

The ire of some Republicans in Washington and on the campaign trail has been directed at some of the most senior Republican senators who are harboring millions in campaign cash.

For example, Republican Sens. Richard C. Shelby of Alabama and Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas both have more than $9 million in their campaign accounts, and there is no limit to how much they can legally transfer to the NRSC.

Mr. Shelby isn't up for re-election until 2010 and won his last election with 68 percent of the vote. His campaign account contains $11.6 million, but he has given $15,000 to the NRSC. If Democrats take over the Senate, Mr. Shelby will have to surrender his chairmanship of the banking committee.

"Senator Shelby is committed to expanding the Republican majority and assisting those who share his conservative philosophy," said spokeswoman Katie Boyd. "Senator Shelby's PAC, Defend America, has contributed heavily to Republican candidates throughout the country."

Mrs. Hutchison, one of the top Republican leaders in the Senate, has $9.5 million on hand, and polls in Texas show her trouncing her opponent by 20 points or more. She has given $115,000 to the NRSC, a little more than 1 percent of her campaign holdings.

Spokesman Marc Short dismissed any criticism and said she's given more than $1.5 million directly to candidates through her political action committee (PAC).

"You would be hard-pressed to find a candidate who is up for election this cycle who has given more than Senator Hutchison," he said.

But given the stakes, Republicans say it's hard not to make comparisons to Democrats who have given far more generously from their campaign accounts.

In all, five Democrats have transferred $1 million or more from their campaign accounts to the DSCC during the current two-year cycle, compared with only one Republican -- Majority Whip Mitch McConnell of Kentucky.

Far and away, the most generous Democrat is Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, who has transferred more than $2 million from her campaign account to the DSCC. Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts, Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Dianne Feinstein of California also have given $1 million or more from their campaign accounts.

"We wouldn't be in the good position we are in heading into November if we didn't have deep support from the entire Democratic caucus," Phil Singer, spokesman for the DSCC, said yesterday.

For the NRSC, spokesman Brian Nick said: "We're very pleased with the generous support we have received from our incumbents, which is essential to protecting the majority."

That money is so crucial, campaign strategists say, because it allows the party to dump huge amounts of advertising money quickly into a state that suddenly becomes winnable or suddenly becomes vulnerable.

Many point to Michigan's Senate race in which Republicans say challenger Michael Bouchard is gaining momentum against incumbent Debbie Stabenow. If Republicans had more money, they say, the state would be ripe for picking.

"That's where it hurts," said Jennifer Duffy of the Cook Political Report.

DOJ_NMG_0085733

Michigan would be "a reach, but you could make it a race if you had the money to go there."

Other Republicans who have cash on hand but aren't up for re-election or face only minor opposition this cycle are Craig Thomas of Wyoming, Sam Brownback of Kansas, and Norm Coleman of Minnesota.

Mr. Thomas has $1.1 million on hand and is expected to win easily, and Mr. Brownback has $600,000 but doesn't face re-election. Neither has transferred any funds to the NRSC. A spokesman for Mr. Brownback said he's given heavily to candidates this cycle from his PAC.

Of his $1.8 million campaign account, Mr. Coleman has transferred $15,000 to the NRSC. A spokesman said Mr. Coleman just transferred an additional $100,000 to the state party to help Republicans capture the open Senate seat there.

Allen Slightly Ahead In Va. Senate Poll (CCT)

By Bob Lewis

The Contra Costa Times, October 24, 2006

RICHMOND, Va. - Republican Sen. George Allen is slightly ahead of Democratic challenger Jim Webb in a closely watched race that could determine whether the GOP retains control of the Senate, according to a poll published Monday.

A statewide survey by Mason-Dixon Polling & Research Inc. showed that 47 percent supported Allen while 43 percent favored Webb, a former Republican and first-time candidate. Two percent supported independent Gail Parker, and 8 percent were undecided.

The results, published on the Web sites of several Virginia newspapers, are based on telephone interviews conducted Oct. 17-19 with 625 registered voters statewide.

Allen's tenuous advantage is equal to the poll's margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points. His campaign was optimistic.

"We know what we have to do and we know how to get there, and when people vote issues and issue differences, they're going to vote for George Allen," said Christopher J. LaCivita, a longtime Allen adviser.

Allen held a 16-point lead over Webb in July but saw it vanish after weeks of damaging developments beginning Aug. 11, when he called a young man of Indian descent "macaca," an obscure racial slur.

Webb's chief strategist, Steve Jarding, said he is confident the Democrat remains on track.

"We feel very good about these numbers and the numbers in other recent polls, including our own, that show Jim moving up while Allen is moving down," Jarding said. "These numbers show Allen has hit his ceiling."

GOP Attack Ad Draws Heat For Racial Overtones (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — A new Republican Party television ad featuring a scantily clad white woman winking and inviting a black candidate to "call me" is drawing charges of race-baiting, with critics saying it contradicts a landmark GOP statement last year that the party was wrong in past decades to use racial appeals to win support from white voters.

Critics said the ad, which is funded by the Republican National Committee and has aired since Friday, plays on fears of interracial relationships to scare some white voters in rural Tennessee to oppose Democratic Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. Ford is locked in a tight race, hoping to become the first African American senator since Reconstruction to represent a state in the former Confederacy.

"It is a powerful innuendo that plays to pre-existing prejudices about African American men and white women," said Hilary Shelton, head of the Washington office of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People, the country's oldest civil rights organization.

A former Republican senator, William S. Cohen of Maine, was more blunt. Cohen, who was also Defense secretary under President Clinton, said on CNN that the ad was "a very serious appeal to a racist sentiment."

The 30-second ad features fictional characters satirizing Ford.

A black woman notes that Ford "looks good" and asks, "Isn't that enough?" Others suggest Ford backs privacy for terrorists, accepts money from the pornography industry, wants to raise taxes and backs letting Canada deal with the North Korea nuclear threat.

The character who has raised complaints is a blond woman who speaks in a hushed, suggestive tone and says that she met Ford at "the Playboy party."

At the end of the ad, she reappears and says: "Harold, call me." She winks and holds her hand up as if holding a phone.

Shelton said the ad contradicted the spirit of remarks delivered at last year's NAACP convention by the Republican National Committee chairman, Ken Mehlman, in which he decried those in his party who had tried to "benefit politically from racial polarization." He was referring to the party's so-called Southern strategy of energizing white voters with race-baiting messages about integration and civil rights.

"I am here today as the Republican chairman to tell you we were wrong," Mehlman said in the July 2005 address, in which he also said the party would now use positive messages to draw African Americans to the GOP.

Ford's Republican opponent, former Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker, has asked Tennessee television stations not to run the spot, calling it "over the top." But the ad has continued to run — and on Monday the Republican National Committee was unapologetic.

"I won't even entertain the premise" that the ad is racially offensive, said Danny Diaz, a Republican Party spokesman. He said the allegation was "not fair and not serious and not accurate."

Diaz said the ad was an "independent expenditure" produced by an arm of the Republican National Committee that is legally prohibited from coordinating with Mehlman. Because of this, Diaz said, Mehlman did not see or approve the ad before its release.

Democratic strategist Donna Brazile said Monday that she was shocked by the ad. Brazile, an African American who has forged a friendship with Mehlman and White House strategist Karl Rove, said she intended to call Mehlman to request that the Republican National Committee discontinue the ad.

"With this ad, Mehlman's apology rings hollow," she said, referring to the 2005 speech.

John Geer, a Vanderbilt University political scientist who published a book this year on attack ads, "In Defense of Negativity," said he had watched the anti-Ford spot repeatedly in recent days.

"I just couldn't believe what I was seeing," he said. "I don't see how you can think it's not playing a racial card. It's making references to interracial sex. It's an ad that is in some sense breaking new lows."

For Mehlman, such criticism is unusual. He has won accolades from African American leaders for aggressive outreach efforts, speaking to more than 50 black organizations since becoming chairman in 2005.

His remarks on the Southern strategy were viewed as a milestone in the GOP effort to diversify the party base by attracting blacks with messages of economic empowerment and appeals to faith.

The party is fielding black candidates in three major races this year in Ohio, Pennsylvania and Maryland.

Ford, though, has proved a challenge for the GOP. He has run as a hawkish Democrat, opposed to amnesty for illegal immigrants and a supporter of banning gay marriage. His race with Corker is considered to be neck-and-neck.

A new response ad by Ford that began airing Monday features the candidate, talking to the camera, accusing Corker of unleashing attacks rather than talking issues.

"If I had a dog," Ford says, "he'd probably kick him too."

In Montana Race, A Yen For Change? (CSM)

By Amanda Paulson

The Christian Science Monitor, October 24, 2006

BILLINGS, MONT.

As Jon Tester crisscrosses Montana, he chats with voters about his wheat farm, discusses energy independence and healthcare, and stresses a single point: integrity.

Montana, the Democrat insists, is ready for a change from Sen. Conrad Burns, the Republican who has served the state for 18 years. Beloved for bringing home big federal dollars, Senator Burns was also the recipient of nearly $150,000 in campaign donations from convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff - and Mr. Tester is not about to let Montana voters forget it.

Tester's strategy of making Burns himself the issue seems to be working: Polls now show the farmer/state senator with a slight edge over the incumbent, lifting Democrats' hopes of adding a key seat in their quest to gain control of the US Senate.

In large part, "the election will depend on [Montanans'] evaluation of Senator Burns," says Christopher Muste, an assistant professor of political science at the University of Montana. "Whether, when they go into the voting booth, they're thinking about his problems with the Abramoff scandal and off-the-cuff embarrassing comments he's made, or if they're thinking about the material things he's brought to the state from the federal government."

A former agricultural reporter and livestock enthusiast, Burns has an easy Montana charm. He moves comfortably among his constituents - most of whom call him "Conrad" - and asks distant acquaintances about their parents and children, almost all of whom he seems to remember.

He reminds residents of the $2 billion in federal money he's brought to the state and his coveted seat on the Senate Appropriations Committee. "I've got a little investment here I want to see," he told reporters last week as he toured the new $8 million control tower at the Billings airport.

From the top, Burns admired the view and pointed out where his own house was, on "Alkali Crick." "It's not very big and it ain't very fancy, but it's somewhere to go when it's raining," he said in his drawl. "No matter where you live in Montana, we identify by the crick you live on."

That off-the-cuff style, though, has also gotten Burns into trouble. He called Arabs "ragheads" in a 1999 speech, for instance. His response to a rancher's racist comment about living in the majority-black city of Washington was hardly high-end senatorial: It's "one hell of a challenge," he replied, back in 1994.

Some Montanans shrug off his rough-hewn language with a laugh, noting he's "not a diplomat." But when Burns used crude language to dress down some Virginia firefighters in the Billings airport this summer, many people here were furious. Some admit to being tired of his comments and the Abramoff connections - and of worrying about Montana's public image.

Tester, meanwhile, is capitalizing on his Montana roots. A third-generation wheat farmer with a flat-top haircut and big belly, he hardly fits the image of the Washington senator. But in the Rocky Mountain West, that can be an advantage. "Isn't it time we make the Senate look a little bit more like Montana?" he asks in one commercial.

He's against gun control and gay marriage, and for the death penalty, which are all political requirements in Mountain states. But he's also a populist candidate who speaks eloquently about the need for opportunity and a debt-free future for children, for affordable healthcare and boosts for small businesses and the middle class, and for a plan to withdraw from Iraq.

A former music teacher and custom butcher, Tester recently took five days off from campaigning to harvest crops on his 1,800-acre farm, and has an easy laugh and smile when he meets voters - a staple of campaigning in a state where retail politics is what wins elections. But he gets serious when he starts talking about the values that he says are the background of this election.

"It's all underpinned by honesty and ethics," he says in an interview. "I think people are very concerned by the culture of corruption back in Washington, D.C."

Burns dismisses those charges angrily, telling Tester in a recent heated debate in Billings, Burns's hometown, "Jon, you've dribbled this out for the last 18 months - and there's nothing there."

But some Montanans are listening.

"Conrad Burns has embarrassed Montana long enough," says Valerie McMurtry, a special-ed teacher in Billings, wearing a Jon Tester sticker as she waits in line to see the Billings debate. She used to consider herself an Independent before Burns turned her into a Democrat, she adds. "Time magazine called him the first of the worst." Burns himself has noted his tendency toward flip comments, once joking that he "can self-destruct in one sentence - sometimes in one word."

Burns instead tries to remind constituents of his seniority in the Senate and paints his opponent as a tax-raiser who's far too liberal for Montana, which President Bush won by 20 percentage points in 2004.

"The Senate already has one Ted Kennedy, and if Tester is elected it will have a second," says Jason Klindt, Burns's spokesman. The polls, he says, don't worry him. "Voters will take a look at both candidates and see Conrad Burns is the only one with the seniority, experience, and effectiveness to get things done for Montana."

That's the case with some staunch Burns supporters, many of whom dismiss the Abramoff charges as overblown or simply a reality of politics. "If the money doesn't go to us, it'll go to New York or California," says Bernie Hedrick, a court-services worker. "We've got two very powerful people in [Democratic Senator Max] Baucus and Burns."

Still, while Montana may be "red" in presidential elections, it's demonstrated a willingness to vote for its own Mountain version of Democrats, with a popular Democratic governor and a Democratic legislature. And Tester's home-grown approach seems to be working.

"He's a rancher and hard worker and that's my style," says Jeff, a physical therapist at St. Vincent Healthcare who did not give his last name. He says that after shaking Tester's hand he's decided to vote for him. "Burns is not so much connected to Montana anymore - he's lost where he's come from."

Love Chafee, Hate Bush (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, October 24, 2006

WARWICK, R.I. — If the Rhode Island Senate race were a popularity contest, Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R) would have no trouble winning re-election.

Unfortunately for Chafee, his opponent's message that a vote for Chafee is essentially a vote in favor of President Bush seems to be resonating in the Ocean State.

Chafee successfully has transferred on to himself the voters' affection for his father and predecessor, the late Sen. John Chafee (R), who died in office in 1999.

DOJ_NMG_0085736

Rhode Islanders genuinely like the younger Chafee, who previously served as mayor of Warwick, the state's second-largest city, before being appointed to complete his father's Senate term.

Roberta Coughlin of Cranston, who waits tables at the Eddie & Son diner in downtown Providence, says she is not very political. Nonetheless she has served Chafee numerous times, as she did his father when he was alive, and finds him extremely personable.

The 53-year-old Senator brings his family into the diner — a regular stop for local pols and powerbrokers — and just comes across as a regular person, Coughlin said.

"He's very humble," she said.

And that is where the Chafee appeal lies. Even people who say they plan to vote for Sheldon Whitehouse (D), the state's former attorney general who has a slight lead in the polls, say they like Chafee.

"I don't think Lincoln Chafee is a bad guy, but it's been how long since the Democrats have had anything to say" about how the country is run, asked Pete Wilson of Narragansett, who was part of a pro-Whitehouse rally outside Toll Gate High School in Warwick last Thursday night, where the two candidates squared off in their first televised debate.

"He's a straight shooter and he does have the name," Wilson continued. "You have to look at what's best for Rhode Island. If [Chafee] ran as an Independent, I think the race would be much tougher."

As much as Chafee reminds voters that he was the only Senate Republican to oppose giving Bush the authority to invade Iraq and as much as he plays up how he differs with the national GOP, it is his party affiliation that ultimately might end his Senate career.

"I think people like Lincoln Chafee a lot, but there's so much antipathy toward Bush that Chafee has become the proxy target," said Darrell West, the political scientist who runs the Brown University poll.

"If he loses, it has very little do with Lincoln Chafee," West said. "It will be because of Bush."

Chafee seems keenly aware of that fact.

During the debate he told voters that he has "not actually been in sync with the president," and ticked off the number of times he has bucked his party in his almost seven years in the Senate. (Chafee previously has acknowledged that he did not vote for Bush in 2004, instead writing in the name of his father, former President George H.W. Bush.)

Rhode Islanders can look at the statue of the Independent Man that sits atop the statehouse in Providence and think, "that's Lincoln Chafee," he said.

Happy Bucks for a Happy Warrior

During a presentation to the Warwick Rotary Club earlier in the day, Chafee sounded more like a Democrat than a Republican. He talked about protecting the environment and the need for stability in the Middle East.

If he is returned to the Senate, Chafee said he would use his seat on the Environment and Public Works Committee and his chairmanship of the subcommittee on fisheries, wildlife and water to push Congress to force U.S. automakers to build more fuel-efficient cars. He also wants the federal government to regulate the emission of carbon dioxide as a way to rein in global warming.

"Shame on Americans for being such consumers," Chafee, who drives a hybrid electric automobile, told the Rotarians.

Chafee received a warm reception from the group assembled for lunch at the Boys and Girls Clubs in Warwick, which was built thanks to an earmark Chafee won during the appropriations process.

Before Chafee began speaking, a slew of Rotarians stood up and threw "happy bucks" — money members donate to announce good news — into the pot in his honor.

One woman put in $1 to celebrate "happy shoers in the Senate." Chafee once worked as a farrier, someone who shoes horses, in Canada. Another contributed $1 because she "already voted for Linc." That prompted Chafee to spring up and throw his own "happy buck" into the pot.

While Chafee tries to hammer home that he can deliver for Rhode Island because he has been in "the right place at the right time in the right party," Whitehouse's campaign is based almost entirely on trying to hang Chafee's party affiliation around him like an albatross.

"The price of Sen. Chafee bringing home that bacon is so high," Whitehouse said during their extremely cordial, hourlong debate. He reminded the audience that the first vote Chafee takes during each new session of Congress is to make a Republican Senate Majority Leader.

"Once that leadership is in place, the dye is set," Whitehouse said. "I accept [that] Lincoln Chafee prefers a different Republican Party, but reality is ... send someone down to vote them out of power. That is the only way to get the Bush agenda out."

Chafee and Whitehouse differ very little in substance or on the issues. Both are polite, liberal politicians who hail from prominent Rhode Island families.

DOJ_NMG_0085737

The Chafees are one of the "Five Families" — the term given to the wealthiest, most influential families in the state's early history — while Whitehouse's father was an ambassador. John Chafee and Whitehouse's father, Charles Whitehouse, even were roommates at Yale, prompting a question from the debate audience about what the candidates' fathers would say about the campaign if they were alive (neither answered very effectively).

Questioning Whitehouse's Independence

The candidates' similarities, combined with Bush's unpopularity, have led Chafee to look for a new way to distinguish himself and to highlight his independence from party orthodoxy — and contrast that with Whitehouse's own relationship with Democratic leaders.

Chafee held a news conference last week calling on Whitehouse to answer questions about a public corruption case that emerged when he was attorney general and that just ended with a former hospital president being sent to jail.

He spent most of the debate trying to put Whitehouse on the defensive about the controversy, suggesting that Whitehouse has blanched when faced with the prospect of challenging state Democratic powerbrokers who served on the hospital's board and worked for the medical center.

"He made a calculated decision not to pursue [the hospital-statehouse case] based on who was involved," Chafee alleged during an interview.

Whitehouse called Chafee's allegations "desperate" and unfounded.

"When you're desperate you revert to desperate measures," Whitehouse said after the debate. "They're bringing it up now because they got nothing else, because they urgently need to distract Rhode Island voters from the consequences of Lincoln Chafee's vote for a Republican Senate."

Whitehouse resisted Chafee's efforts to engage him on the subject during the debate, calculating that there really is no upside in doing so because the issue is too obtuse to penetrate.

He acknowledges there is a risk in his strategy but said the issues and momentum are on his side.

"I'd rather be in the position of talking to voters about issues versus something that happened seven years ago," Whitehouse said. "It's complicated and, frankly, isn't being explained very fairly by them anyway. I'd rather be in the spot where I'm talking to voters about what they care about."

Whitehouse also is enjoying a financial advantage.

Chafee entered the final weeks of the campaign trailing Whitehouse in cash on hand. Whitehouse started October with $1.4 million in the bank, while Chafee had just $583,000.

Since then, Chafee contributed $500,000 from his own deep pockets and triggered the "Millionaires' Amendment," enabling Whitehouse to exceed federal campaign contribution limits.

The national Republican Party spared no expense getting Chafee through his tough primary with Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey and continues to lavish money on the race.

The Republican National Committee's much-ballyhooed 72 Hour Program to get out the vote largely is credited with Chafee's win in the historically low-turnout Republican primary.

'A General Is Different'

Chafee again will need the votes of independents and Democrats if he is to win Nov. 7, but he dismissed the idea that the results on Election Day will again turn on GOTV.

"In the primary, it was the most important — voter identification and GOTV," Chafee said. "A general is different.

"It's a close election, everything is going to count; it's going to be debates, earned media ... paid media; it's the combination," he said.

Whitehouse said he is confident that if the race comes down to a ground game, his team is prepared.

"I'm waiting to see whether this vaunted Republican 72 Hour Program is really all it's cracked up to be," he said.

While the race undoubtedly will take a few more turns before it is over, in many ways the general election dynamics have not changed at all since the race began. It will still come down to whether Rhode Islanders like Chafee so much that they are willing to shed their Democratic preference and overlook the R after his name.

"There's no doubt there's deep affection in Rhode Island for the job that I've done, but they are very, very angry at President Bush," Chafee said. "But I'm dealing with it."

Steele Shrugs Off Foe's Attacks (WT)

By S.a. Miller And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele said yesterday that Democratic attacks on his U.S. Senate candidacy have not hurt him but have sparked interest in his status as a black Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0085738

"I hear it from people who come up to me who are angry themselves. They are sick of it. They are tired of it. It's like, 'Why are they coming after you?' " Mr. Steele told editors and reporters at The Washington Times.

"The commercials that they have run have really not resonated the way I think they thought they would. It is not scaring people away from me. In fact, it is actually drawing them to pay closer attention," he said.

Mr. Steele expressed support for full congressional voting rights for the District, discussed how his Catholic faith informs his politics and said he expects to win "20 to 25 percent" of the black vote in next month's election.

He also said that he expects some white voters, including Republicans, will not vote for him because he is black.

"We have factored in in our numbers a percentage drop-off. I'm not silly," Mr. Steele said. "Is it a concern? Sure it is -- like anything.

"Will it be a factor in this race? Absolutely it will. You have to go into this race with your eyes wide open. You can't sit back and pretend that everybody is going to love you and just vote for you because you are a member of their party or you hold their values."

He said that all he can do to counter such attitudes is to "just get in your face."

Mr. Steele's Democratic opponent -- Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin -- has declined an invitation to be interviewed at The Times.

The Cardin campaign has focused on tying Mr. Steele to President Bush as part of a Democratic strategy to dampen the lieutenant governor's appeal among blacks.

Blacks account for about 40 percent of registered Democrats in Maryland, where Democrats outnumber Republicans 2-to-1.

A poll targeted at black voters, which was released yesterday by Ariel & Ethan LLC in the political journal Hotline, showed Mr. Steele with 12 percent of the black vote; 23 percent were undecided.

The poll of 400 black registered voters was conducted from Oct. 11 to 13 and has a margin of error of 4.9 percentage points.

A Baltimore Sun poll showed Mr. Steele with 23 percent of the black vote; Survey USA has shown him gaining as much as 33 percent of the black vote; and an internal Democratic poll in March showed Mr. Steele with 16 percent.

"We don't need polls to tell us that a large majority of African-Americans are frustrated with President Bush and the direction he's taking our nation," Cardin campaign spokesman Oren Shur said. "Michael Steele will support the same failed Bush policies, and everyone knows it."

The internal Democratic poll also identified 44 percent of black voters as undecided, calling the bloc an "emerging black swing vote."

Mr. Steele acknowledged there is still a large segment of black voters who are undecided or conflicted about voting for him because he is a Republican.

"I've just got to keep doing what I'm doing. Whatever I've been doing has gotten me to 46-46 [percent in the polls], so I keep doing that," he said, referring to a recent poll by Survey USA that showed the race to be a dead heat.

Mr. Steele, who was raised in the District and lives in Prince George's County, said he supports D.C. voting rights.

"I think it's very important for the citizens of that community to have full representation. I just do," he said.

Mr. Steele also reiterated that he is a "pro-life Roman Catholic" on abortion, and that although he supports stem-cell research, he does not support such research that destroys human embryos.

However, he said he would not require a "litmus test" of nominees to federal judgeships, saying such tactics do a "disservice" to the nominees and the advise-and-consent process of the U.S. Senate.

"I have no litmus test," he said, "nor should anyone."

In addition, Mr. Steele said he prefers that the states settle the issue of same-sex "marriage," but "should it come to the federal level, then, yes, I would support" a ban on such "marriages."

In 2002, Mr. Steele became the first black to win a statewide election in Maryland, as the running mate of Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., who became the state's first Republican governor in more than 30 years.

Yesterday, Mr. Steele said that he will win his Senate race and that Mr. Ehrlich will win his re-election bid against the Democratic nominee, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley. Mr. Steele said "there is no reason" for Maryland voters to "fire" Mr. Ehrlich.

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin has firmed his stance against the Iraq war by demanding an immediate troop withdrawal and now faces criticism from his rivals in Maryland's U.S. Senate race for "pandering" to anti-war voters and jeopardizing the war effort.

DOJ_NMG_0085739

"Start the process now," Mr. Cardin, a Democrat, said in a campaign speech last week at Towson University. "We don't need a time schedule, but we should start redeploying now so it is a clear signal to the international community [and] a clear signal to the Iraqis that they need to take responsibility for the defense of their own country. We need to do that now."

Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the Republican nominee for senator, called Mr. Cardin's comments "irresponsible."

"It is pandering to a political mind-set that would ... endanger our soldiers for a political price," Mr. Steele said. "I don't think it is worth playing politics here at home to put our troops in harm's way in Iraq."

President Bush has said that he opposes major changes to the Iraq war plan.

Mr. Cardin, a 10-term congressman from Baltimore, has made his vote against the Iraq invasion the cornerstone of his campaign and often cites it as an example of how he "stood up toPresident Bush."

Still, he has moved his anti-war position steadily to the left from early calls for a "new strategy" in Iraq to his recent support of an immediate exit for troops.

"Mr. Cardin needs to decide what exactly he thinks the policy in Iraq should be," Mr. Steele said. "He's always said that he didn't want a timetable, now he has called for one. He didn't want immediate withdrawal, now he has called for one. I don't know which Ben Cardin we should expect tomorrow."

Mr. Cardin's redeployment plan also drew criticism from anti-war activist Kevin Zeese, the Senate nominee of the Green, Libertarian and Populist parties.

"His election-year rhetoric is inconsistent with his voting record on Iraq," said Mr. Zeese, who advocates a complete troop withdrawal within six months. "He's voted for staying the course, and now he comes up with a vague plan for withdrawal."

He noted that Mr. Cardin repeatedly voted to fund the Iraq war and voted against a measure that would have compelled Mr. Bush to come up with an exit strategy for the war.

The Cardin campaign declined to respond to Mr. Zeese's comments.

"The differences between Ben Cardin and Michael Steele on the war in Iraq are crystal clear," Cardin campaign spokesman Oren Shur said. "Cardin voted against the war; Steele supported it. Cardin has called for a change of course in Iraq; Steele supports the president's failed policies that got us into this mess."

In his Towson University speech, Mr. Cardin also called for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, and criticized the lieutenant governor for supporting the war plan.

He said that Mr. Steele and Mr. Bush "cannot acknowledge mistakes and cannot acknowledge when we need to change in order to be able to have a successful completion of what we have done in Iraq."

"I believe we need change," Mr. Cardin said. "Michael Steele believes in the status quo."

Mr. Steele, who since last year has advocated a new war strategy, said calling for Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation was "political hyperbole."

"I think [Mr. Rumsfeld] can do better," Mr. Steele said Friday after opening a Thanksgiving food drive for the poor in Baltimore.

Mr. Cardin said U.S. troops in Iraq could be replaced by the "international community."

He proposed convening an international conference to broker peace in Iraq and negotiate a cease-fire to sectarian violence there. Nongovernmental organizations should take over the job of rebuilding Iraq, Mr. Cardin said.

Michael J. Fox Records TV Ad For Cardin (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Appearing grimly unsteady from his long bout with Parkinson's disease, actor Michael J. Fox is inserting his halting voice into the campaign for the U.S. Senate in a new television commercial about the importance of stem cell research.

The ad, endorsing Democrat Benjamin L. Cardin in his race against Republican Michael S. Steele, bears witness to the actor's unmistakable decline and harnesses that physical degeneration into a political message.

"Stem cell research offers hope to millions of Americans with diseases like diabetes, Alzheimer's and Parkinson's," Fox says, seated in a dimly lit hotel room, staring directly into the camera. "But George Bush and Michael Steele would put limits on the most promising stem cell research."

Coming, as it has, just two weeks before Election Day, the commercial could serve as Cardin's antidote to the much-discussed advertising campaign launched by Steele, political analysts said yesterday.

Whereas Cardin to this point has run a series of conventional ads, Steele's visually spare but upbeat spots have won praise for the way they have presented the lieutenant governor as a Washington outsider who pledges to address the worst from both parties.

DOJ_NMG_0085740

The Fox commercial makes those ads seem shallow by comparison, said Paul S. Herrnson, a University of Maryland political science professor.

"I think it's aimed at cutting through all the platitudes that normally accompany campaigns and says, 'Here's an issue that affects people's real lives,' " Herrnson said. "You look at him, and you see the effects."

Opponents of embryonic stem cell research who heard about the ad said they found it sad.

"To me, this is a shame that they're exploiting someone like Michael J. Fox for something that the scientists say is not going to do anything," said Douglas Stiegler, executive director of Maryland's Family Protection Lobby.

Steele campaign spokesman Doug Heye agreed, saying he considered the ad "in extremely poor taste."

Fox, who gained fame for his roles in the "Family Ties" and "Spin City" television shows and "Back to the Future" movies, has long been open about his battle with Parkinson's and his support for the research that could lead to a treatment. But in this ad he shows a noticeable degree of decline. His speech is clear but his head and body are jerky and unsteady. The camera remains still -- nothing about the production by Cardin consultant LHKK Media appears aimed at diminishing the striking visual impact of Fox's condition.

Though Fox's illness has progressed, his political involvement has not slowed.

In addition to the Cardin ad, Fox filmed 30-second spots for Senate candidate Claire McCaskill, a Missouri Democrat who is seeking to unseat Republican James M. Talent, and for Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle (D), who is seeking reelection. He has also made plans to appear at events for two Democrats, Sen. Robert Menendez of New Jersey and Tammy Duckworth, a candidate for Congress from Illinois.

"He wants to take on races and get involved in races that involve a pro stem cell candidate against an anti embryonic stem cell candidate," said John Rogers, a publicist for Fox.

Cardin aides said Fox contacted the campaign after seeing news accounts of Steele's position on the research. In February, Steele told members of a Baltimore Jewish group, "Look, you of all folks know what happens when people decide they want to experiment on human beings, when they want to take your life and use it as a tool."

He later apologized for the remark, which was interpreted as a comparison between embryonic stem cell research and Nazi experimentation. But he has maintained his position that research on embryos is not needed, especially, he has said, because there is promising research being done on adult stem cells. Heye said yesterday that Steele opposes only stem cell research that destroys the embryo.

Fox's message, though, makes clear that he believes study on adult stem cells is not enough, saying he approves of candidates who "fully" support the research.

"It's why I support Ben Cardin," he says, lifting his hand to his heart. "And with so much at stake, I respectfully ask you to do the same."

A Political Natural, Railing Against Politics (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Even for a politician, Michael S. Steele is said to have an extraordinary handshake. Not too weak but not crushing, either, with eye contact that never breaks off to scan the room. It communicates instant intimacy, a little zap of Clintonesque magic.

It is a rare thing, though, when Maryland's lieutenant governor stops with just a handshake.

Instead, supporters get a kiss on the cheek, one-armed embrace or even a full-on bear hug. This is the Steele treatment -- as light as a friendly grasp on the elbow or as intimate as a two-handed grasp of the head, all with the same message:

"He likes you," said James G. Gimpel, a government professor at the University of Maryland. "How many people do you meet where you feel, 'He likes me'? That's one of the things that make him a good politician."

Through a series of abandoned careers in the church, law and business, politics is what Steele has done longest and best -- building relationships and winning partisan battles.

Now, as a candidate for the U.S. Senate, he is running vigorously against the political system that promoted him. All the while, though, he is relying on the gifts that have gotten him this far: a confident charm and an intuition that says a hug is better than a handshake.

Here is Steele, 48, campaigning in Hagerstown: "Washington, in my view, has gotten outside of itself. It is a place none of us recognize."

Here is Steele on TV, in one of his ubiquitous blank-background ads: "Washington has no clue of what's going on in your life."

DOJ_NMG_0085741

There are a few things odd about Steele's anti-Washington rhetoric -- don't 278,000 of the Maryland voters he's wooing actually work for this clueless federal government? -- but start with the most basic one.

If "Washington" is given its most literal definition, meaning the District, then Steele's nemesis is his own home town.

He was born at Andrews Air Force Base but adopted through a Catholic charity and raised in the Petworth neighborhood of Northwest Washington. Steele's mother and stepfather were Democrats -- and still are, to judge from the campaign sign for D.C. mayoral candidate Adrian M. Fenty (D) in their yard this fall.

Still, despite their dinner-table debates, Steele often cites his parents, especially his mother, as the source of personal values that would later make him a Republican. These included a belief in self-reliance and perseverance and an aversion to government interference in private lives and small businesses.

"She never took a penny of public assistance because, as she put it, she didn't want government raising her kids," Steele said of Maebell Turner when he announced his Senate candidacy last fall.

In his old neighborhood, people remember Steele as a boy who didn't run in the streets with other kids and instead found the center of his life at St. Gabriel Catholic Church. "Hey, let's play church," he would tell his sister, Monica Turner.

"He used to have a glass with vanilla wafers in it, to symbolize the host, and some apple juice in the other glass, to symbolize the wine. I would line up like I was taking communion, and he would practice saying the mass," Turner, a doctor and former wife of boxer Mike Tyson, wrote in an e-mail. "It was too cute."

When Steele got to Archbishop Carroll High School in Northeast, the boy who had once kept to himself became an outgoing actor. In his first productions, he was often consigned to the back row because he was so tall -- but he didn't often stay there.

"Somehow, he always wound his way up to the front," said James Mumford, who oversaw plays and musicals then and later became principal. Steele eventually became a confident leading actor and a graceful dancer, Mumford said, playing the president in "Of Thee I Sing" and the devil in "Damn Yankees."

In 1977, Steele went on to Johns Hopkins University, where his energy and magnetism led him to another prominent role: president of student government.

Hopkins history professor Ronald Walters, sizing up the politically gifted student that Steele had become by then, made a prediction about his future.

"That was that Michael would go a long way in Democratic Party politics," Walters said. "So I was half-right on that one."Called to God, Then to Law

After college, Steele shifted gears radically, moving from his frenetic life on campus to the discipline of a Catholic seminary. He eventually joined a handful of other "novices" at an old house in Lawrence, Mass. The routine there: Mass every day, classes on religious life, and lots and lots of quiet time.

The program was supposed to last a year, but Steele left after six months, in February 1983.

He says now that God, who had called him to join the program, also called him to leave. But one of his vows, in particular, provided a push.

"Chastity is a state of mind. And certainly, obedience, I could take being told what to do. But poverty -- whew, tough, tough, tough, tough, tough, tough. Just tough," Steele said. He said he was particularly unhappy when his canary-yellow 1973 Ford Torino became the common property of all novices.

After leaving the church as a career, Steele chose the law. He was a paralegal, a law student at Georgetown and then a lawyer from 1991 to 1998, working for a D.C. law office and then for the Mills Corp., the real estate giant.

During that time, though, Steele was laying the seeds for another career.

He and his family -- it now includes his wife, Andrea, and two teenage sons -- had moved to Largo. There, he began his long association with a group that had become the political equivalent of the Washington Generals, eternal doormats for basketball's Harlem Globetrotters.

"This guy says to me that he's here to build the Republican Party in Prince George's County," said Sydney Moore, a businessman active in county politics, recalling what Steele told him in the 1980s. "And I said, 'Wow!' "A Political Rise in an Unlikely Place

The Prince George's GOP was -- and still is -- one of the most beleaguered party organizations in a state that hadn't had a Republican governor since 1969.

Into this picture came Steele, the former seminarian, comfortable with the law and with a microphone. He has said he sometimes felt isolated in the early years because he was one of only a few African Americans in the local party. Others remember meeting someone who was deeply loyal, affable and dynamite when talking to people one-on-one. Someone who was ready to pay his dues.

DOJ_NMG_0085742

"He would do the telephone banks. He would do the stuffing. He would put on the labels," recalled Audrey E. Scott, a former County Council member and now Maryland's secretary of planning. "I mean, he was a worker."

And a talker. Steele became party chairman in Prince George's in 1994 and soon became one of the loudest voices in a fight over the county's property-tax cap. Some wanted to lift the cap; Steele and others fought to keep it and won.

There were setbacks: In 1998, Steele ran for comptroller and finished third in the GOP primary. Two years later, though, he ascended to the chairmanship of the state GOP. Thereafter came a major victory, as a redistricting plan from then-Gov. Parris N. Glendening (D) was defeated in court.

"Republicans never win anything" in Maryland, said Christopher West, a Baltimore lawyer who lost to Steele in the race for party chairman. "So it was a very big deal."

Soon, Steele was a very big deal himself. Then-Rep. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) picked him as a running mate in the 2002 governor's race. When they won, beating an all-white Democratic ticket, Steele became the first African American to win statewide office in Maryland.

His victory also meant that, for the first time in several years, Steele's financial situation was secure.

Since 1999, after he'd left his last job, as a lawyer, Steele had been trying to start a consulting business. Bray Barnes, who became Steele's partner in the firm, said they sought to represent countries or companies in their dealings with the federal government, relying on their Republican contacts in Washington.

"I would say we had pretty limited success," said Barnes, a lawyer in Toms River, N.J. He couldn't remember ever signing up a client. There was at least one: During the campaign for governor, after Barnes was no longer working with the business, the Maryland Republican Party was paying the firm, and by extension Steele, a consulting fee of $5,000 a month.

With little money coming in from the business, Steele has said, he drained retirement accounts. He told an audience in a recent speech that his family went without health insurance for three years.

"Don't break anything, because Daddy can't afford to fix it," he recalled telling his sons then.

On Nov. 5, 2002, Steele's election win erased all that. His current job pays $120,000 a year. A rocketing political career had finally made a struggling business one irrelevant. He savored the victory.

"Is this sweet or what?" Steele told supporters election night, according to news accounts.Fighting the Numbers

Steele's opponent in the Senate race, Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, is a wonkish, pedestrian orator. But so far, Cardin has also proved resolutely unwilling to shoot himself in the foot.

In a state where Democrats outnumber Republicans nearly 2 to 1 -- and where issues such as the Iraq war and the government's handling of Hurricane Katrina might keep black Democrats from crossing party lines -- that might be all Cardin needs to win.

"A good Democratic candidate running a good campaign will beat a good Republican running a good campaign in a statewide race every time, just because of the numbers," said Donald Norris, a public policy professor at the University of Maryland Baltimore County.

To counter this disadvantage, Steele has run a campaign that portrays him as above party, beyond party. In avoiding Republican-specific policy recommendations, however, Steele sometimes ends up sounding as if he's avoiding specifics altogether.

He offers policy proposals, including increased restrictions on lobbyists, tax exemptions for new businesses and a 120-day suspension of the federal gasoline tax.

But often, when pressed on domestic- or foreign-policy questions, Steele responds not with firm positions but with a call for larger, more inclusive discussions.

Energy? Get environmentalists, solar advocates and nuclear people in the room with oil and gas interests. Health care? Get all the players in the room. North Korea? Get China involved.

"We need to get them in the room. We need to get them at the table," Steele said.

The one thing he always mentions is Washington, how the culture of partisan bickering needs to change. Steele, however, is not above a bit of political gamesmanship himself.

At his Hagerstown speech, he criticized Cardin because Democratic Party operatives fraudulently obtained his credit report.

"Anyone who wants my credit report, I'd be happy to give it to you," Steele said. "If you want to know about me, ask me."

Later that day, a Washington Post reporter asked: Is it possible to get your credit report?

"No, it's not," Steele said.

Right now, the polls show Cardin leading Steele. But friends of Steele, who remember him as the giant-killer of the Maryland GOP, aren't convinced.

There are a lot more hands to shake and cheeks to kiss, a lot more connections to be made, before Nov. 7.

DOJ_NMG_0085743

"I read the polls, and I don't believe them," said Scott, the Maryland planning secretary. "Because I'll tell you this: I can't believe anyone who meets and talks to Michael Steele will not vote for him."

Just Who Is The Man Behind That Steele Mask? (WT)

By Adrienne Washington

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

Calling on one of my Sistagirls who lives in Baltimore County to get her take on the U.S. Senate race in Maryland, I got a response that pretty well sums up what may be the biggest problem for the Republican candidate, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele.

"I like Michael Steele a lot personally, but I just don't know who he is or where he stands," said this black professional woman. "That's why I don't trust him." Now that he has attracted suitors with those EHarmony-like ads, the real Mr. Steele has to show up in person. He talks a good man-of-the-people game, but how will he play it?

When I reiterated my Sistagirl's nervous sentiments to Mr. Steele at a luncheon with editors and reporters at The Washington Times yesterday, he bristled at the very notion that he is an unknown quantity.

After all, he has been lieutenant governor of the Free State for almost four years, and he has raised the bar so high with his litany of pat-myself-on-the-back accomplishments that his successors "will actually have to work" in the ceremonial position henceforth, he said.

But the guessing game of the hour rests on whether Michael Steele is a right-wing Republican, an undercover moderate Democrat or a wannabe independent. Just where do this atypical candidate's political loyalties lie? Exactly who constitutes the core constituency to whom he will be beholden?

The street rap on Mr. Steele is that he is hard to read once you get past the friendly smile and platitudes, even for those who have spent time with him. He begs the question posed in those old hair-color commercials, "Does she or doesn't she? Only her hairdresser knows for sure."

I wish I could tell you for sure, one way or the other, about the man behind the steely mask. He definitely has the potential to morph into a hybrid politician, based on the conversations we have had, if he can break away from his big-bucks benefactors. More important, break away from those crude folks who characterize him as "just another Clarence Thomas," which he is not.

But it really is not my job to define Mr. Steele's nebulous candidacy. It is the ultimate Steele campaign challenge, and it hasn't been met well as he tries to beat Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, the Democrat vying to replace retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes.

Mr. Steele argues that he hasn't been given the chance to get out his message -- a hodgepodge of populist and conservative economic and social policies -- although he has visited nearly three-fourths of municipalities in the state.

He is right when he says too many partisan voters are content to stick with shallow labels, but you must offer them more than shallow stuff when you are up against fear, tradition and blind loyalty to a party that takes voters for granted.

Which brings us to those slick campaign ads that don't mention his "R" affiliation.

"No one else has had to put up [their party label] in their ads," Mr. Steele said. "Why should I?" Because he has to explain himself better. He contends that he has tried to do just that, and unlike "any other candidate in this country," he has had to deal with explaining who he is as a black man and a Republican in every room he enters.

When he was the state Republican Party chairman, Mr. Steele acknowledged, he was "the most partisan man on the block." But after he was elected lieutenant governor, he realized that he had to represent all Marylanders "from the KKK to the NAACP." So he changed.

But how? Where would he place himself now on the political spectrum? "Oh, you want labels?" he said.

Well, yeah, and so do the voters, like my Sistagirl.

"I don't like labels," he answered tersely.

I don't either, but they serve the purpose of giving folks somewhere to start, or land if you are looking to win them over.

How about giving waffling folks like my Maryland Sistagirl a few concrete reasons to take a huge leap of faith and cross over to the Other Side? For instance, how many know about Mr. Steele's calls for more tuition assistance for community colleges and historically black colleges; or more certified teachers assigned to troubled Maryland schools; or his initiatives designed to assist black women who own small businesses, which I heard touted this weekend in, of all places, Virginia? Mr. Steele does possess a Muhammad Ali penchant for fancy footing around tough questions.

But Mr. Steele is more focused and passionate about his concerns on bread-and-butter issues that he thinks the voters want to hear about. For example, he talked about finding ways to reduce high unemployment in black communities, as represented by a man who asked him how to get his 26-year-old son, a University of Maryland graduate, a job so he can move out.

The son of a laundress and a small-business owner, Mr. Steele knows what it is like "not to get a paycheck." Most senators don't have a clue, and he would like to enlighten them.

DOJ_NMG_0085744

With two weeks left until Election Day, Mr. Steele says, he is going all over the state and "get in your face" to tell voters exactly who he is.

He is emboldened by his latest polls that show he can expect to receive 20 percent to 25 percent of the black vote in Maryland with another 25 percent still undecided. However, he is admittedly concerned by the prospect of white voters abandoning the Republican Party and voting against him because of his race.

"I'm not silly. ... I know the state I live in," he said.

It's not like he is unaware of his role as Goliath. "We still have a lot to do," he said.

The Steele mystique may soon change. It had better.

Solidly Republican, Suddenly In Doubt (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

COEUR D'ALENE, Idaho -- It is, perhaps, the political equivalent of hell freezing over in the interior West.

This red state where conservative Republicans routinely wipe the floor with hapless Democrats has a Republican running for Congress who just might lose.

The suddenly competitive race is a delicious development for Larry Grant, a Democratic candidate for the House who finds himself transformed from sacrificial lamb to reason for worry among national Republican strategists.

His Republican opponent is Bill Sali, an eight-term state representative with a corrosive reputation for irking his fellow Republicans. The Republican speaker of the Idaho House, Bruce Newcomb, said this spring of Sali: "That idiot is just an absolute idiot."

With an impish smile, Grant, who was a high-tech executive in Boise, took a moment from knocking on residents' doors here last week and said: "Can you imagine Republicans sitting around in Washington and saying to each other, 'Jeez, now we have to spend more money to win -- in Idaho?' "

But spending and worrying the Republicans are, here and in a handful of other usually safe House districts in the West, where unrelentingly grim news from the war in Iraq has combined with smoldering anger over federal deficits and Washington scandals to vivify Democratic candidates who not long ago were reconciled to their fate as biannual Republican roadkill.

President Bush cruised in Idaho in 2004 with 69 percent of the vote. Republicans outnumber Democrats about 2 to 1 in the district where Grant is running, and two years ago the district elected a Republican with 70 percent of the vote.

Previous occupants of the now-open seat include the late Helen Chenoweth-Hage, an archconservative who held hearings in the 1990s on a supposed "black helicopter" federal conspiracy to take away the freedoms of rural Westerners.

Now, to shore up support in Idaho's vast 1st Congressional District -- 500 miles long, from Canada to Nevada, crossing two time zones and three media markets -- the Republican National Congressional Committee spent $135,000 last week for ads against Grant. His campaign says that for the final two weeks of the campaign the Republican committee has committed about $375,000 to buy television and radio time, a figure that approaches Grant's fundraising total for his entire campaign.

"It is a tough year," said Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, who declined to say how much it would spend in the 1st District. "We spend a lot of time going over every race in the country, and we want to make sure we fix problems before they become problems."

The problems, though, are not just in Idaho. Just west of the state, there is another growing spot of bother.

In Washington's 5th Congressional District, where former speaker Thomas S. Foley (D) famously lost in 1994 when Republicans seized control of the House, confirmation of an unexpectedly strong Democratic challenge emerged in recent days from a well-placed source: the Republican incumbent, Rep. Cathy McMorris.

"It's a closer race than I first imagined," she told Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), according to the Spokesman-Review, a newspaper in Spokane. Changing voter attitudes in her conservative, mostly rural district, she said, have been "pretty dramatic."

McMorris and Craig apparently thought they were speaking privately before the start of a campaign teleconference with veterans. But an operator had connected Spokesman-Review reporter Jim Camden, who was on mute and could not announce his presence.

Craig, who is not up for reelection, told McMorris that she was not alone in feeling Democratic heat. "The new numbers are just devastating," he reportedly said.

McMorris's Democratic opponent is Peter Goldmark, a rancher whose surprising strength has attracted the support of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, which last week began spending $323,000 on television ads opposing McMorris.

DOJ_NMG_0085745

In suburban Seattle's 8th Congressional District, the Republican incumbent, Rep. David G. Reichert, a well-known former sheriff from King County, is also facing a robust challenge -- from a political neophyte, Darcy Burner, 35, a former Microsoft executive.

The race, in a swing district where Democrats consistently win the presidential vote but Republicans hold the House, is widely viewed as a tossup. While behind in total fundraising, Burner has raised more money in recent months than Reichert has. To shore up the former sheriff, who made his name by catching the notorious Green River killer, the Republican National Congressional Committee has recently stepped up spending on television ads.

Here in Idaho, political analysts say that a competitive House race would never have been possible, except for the unlikely convergence of two destabilizing forces -- a noxious national climate for Republicans and a Republican candidate with a knack for being obnoxious. The Republican incumbent in Idaho's only other House seat, Rep. Mike Simpson, once threatened to throw Sali out a window.

Sali, 52, who won a bitter Republican primary against five opponents with 26 percent of the vote, has made strident opposition to abortion the signature issue of his 16-year political career.

Most notably, as Sali said in an interview in northern Idaho on Friday evening, he sees a causal link between abortion and breast cancer. "If you have an abortion, you are at increased risk," he said.

Recent studies of large numbers of women consistently show no such link, according to the National Cancer Institute, one of the federal National Institutes of Health.

Sali's pugnacious rhetoric on abortion and breast cancer during a debate this year in the Idaho House led to a walkout by Democrats and to a public tongue-lashing by House Speaker Newcomb.

"He doesn't have one ounce of empathy in his whole fricking body, and you can put that in the paper," Newcomb told reporters.

At a Republican campaign forum in northern Idaho on Friday night, a middle-aged woman from Bonner County who described herself as a party activist said that she and other Republican women in Idaho are offended by Sali's views on breast cancer.

"Women are angry about that," she said, insisting that she not be identified because of party loyalty. "They see it as an affront to their health issues."

In polls conducted for Grant, the issue showed up as one of the strongest negatives for Sali, according to Celinda Lake, a Democratic pollster based in Washington, D.C.

Political analysts in Idaho say the issue is one of Sali's many problems in securing broad Republican support.

"He has simply aggravated a lot of people over time," said Randy Stapilus, a blogger and former political editor for the Idaho Statesman. "There are a lot of Republican leaders who don't much care for Sali."

Still, this is Idaho.

"There are probably a lot of voters who have never voted for a Democrat, so you have to figure Sali is the more probable winner," Stapilus said. "But this is a different dynamic than we have seen for quite a long time."

Seats In Danger, Democrats Proclaim Their Conservatism (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

MACON, Ga., Oct. 19 — Listening to Congressional candidates in middle Georgia, it is easy for someone to think that he is in a different year and, possibly, a different country.

Democrats defend themselves against accusations that they are rubber stamps for their party's leadership. Democrats are defending the war in Iraq. And Democrats — yes, Democrats — strive to align themselves with the president.

"I agree with George Bush on this one," Representative John Barrow ends his new advertisement in favor of abolishing the estate tax.

Charles S. Bullock, a professor of political science at the University of Georgia, said, "It's a bit of a return to yesterday."

For all the talk of this being a Democratic year — experts and party leaders use words like tide or even tsunami — there are a small number of exceptions, places where Republicans believe they can take back seats from the Democrats.

And these contests are producing some of the fiercest fights — not to mention the most contrarian campaign strategies — of the midterm elections, as Democrats try to boast of their conservative credentials and their opponents try to sequester them on the opposite extreme.

As Mr. Barrow's Republican challenger, Max Burns, declared on Thursday in a debate in Augusta, "My opponent, he started out a liberal and he's trying to get to the right of Attila the Hun."

DOJ_NMG_0085746

The number of embattled Democrats has gone down. Republicans at the beginning of the summer said they believed that they could take 10 Democratic seats. Now they say four.

Every one counts. Facing the possibility that control of the House could be decided on the thinnest of margins, Democrats are not taking any race for granted, and Republicans are eager to exploit any potential Democratic weakness.

Two of those four seats are here in Georgia, a predominantly Republican state where redistricting has left two Democratic incumbents, Mr. Barrow and Representative Jim Marshall, unfamiliar to a big chunk of their new constituents.

The others are Representative Leonard L. Boswell, running against a well-financed opponent in Iowa, and Representative Melissa Bean, who is serving her first term from Illinois.

The Economic Freedom Fund, an independent group financed by the Texas homebuilder who bankrolled the Swift boat veterans' attacks against Senator John Kerry in 2004, has singled out Mr. Barrow and Mr. Marshall.

President Bush has campaigned in Georgia for Mr. Burns and Michael Collins, and is to return eight days before Election Day.

The race between Mr. Marshall and Mr. Collins has been expensive and nasty. Voters tell of receiving seven telephone calls a night and as many fliers in their mailboxes. Mr. Marshall said he had decided to begin advertising early, before Labor Day, when the advertising reached such a pitch that the average viewer was seeing 30 advertisements against him for every 7 in his favor each week, most trying to lump him with liberal Democrats.

"I'm spending a lot more time with Nancy Pelosi, Ted Kennedy and Hillary Clinton on TV in middle Georgia than I will ever in my life spend in reality," Mr. Marshall said.

At a pizza and politics rally at a church in Covington, a town west of Atlanta, Mr. Collins listed familiar bogeymen from the left, Representatives John Conyers Jr., Charles B. Rangel and John P. Murtha.

"And last but not least, Congresswoman Nancy Pelosi from California wants to be speaker of the House," he said, his voice low and ominous. "And I tell you, folks, this is the last thing we need in the House.

"The next two years bogged down in investigations, with a judiciary chairman who wants to impeach the president. We don't need those things, folks. So I ask you now, on Nov. 7, vote for Mac Collins to be your congressman. Mac Collins doesn't vote that way. Mac Collins will vote for Denny Hastert, a Republican, to be speaker of the House."

Never mind that other Republican candidates are canceling appearances with Speaker Hastert, who has been caught up in the aftermath of the Congressional page scandal. Here, the Republican candidates are betting that the association with Mr. Hastert helps them.

"If you vote for Barrow, you are giving a vote to Nancy Pelosi," Joan Clay, a Republican, said at the debate in Augusta. "Do you want Nancy Pelosi to be the majority leader?"

At the debate, Mr. Barrow, a lawyer with the bookish look of a grown-up Harry Potter, jabbed his finger in the air and spoke hurriedly while Mr. Burns stood back with a bemused look and the self-assuredness of an incumbent. Senator Kerry won the 2004 presidential vote in Mr. Barrow's district, but Mr. Bush won in Mr. Marshall's, making him more vulnerable, especially against an established and well-financed candidate like Mr. Collins, who served six terms in the House in a previously configured district.

"It's awfully tempting from a Republican perspective," Mr. Marshall, a former law professor and mayor of Macon, said. "I'd have to be kind of foolish to think it wouldn't be a big fight."

Forty-three percent of the voting age population in the new district was not represented by Mr. Marshall under the old lines. So he raised more money than he thought he would need, then spent even more than that and continues to raise money two weeks before the election.

"What I thought would be a $1 million campaign has turned out to be a $2 million campaign," he said.

While elsewhere, Republicans shun their party label in advertisements, in these districts it is the Democrats who ignore affiliation, declaring themselves, as Ms. Bean does, "a moderate independent voice" or as Mr. Barrow does, "Our congressman on our side," without mentioning which side that is.

"I have crossed the aisle and worked with the other side more often than almost anyone else," Mr. Barrow said Thursday in the debate at a lakeside casino in Augusta. "I don't think either team has it right in Washington 99 percent of the time."

Republicans have had trouble portraying the two Georgia incumbents as liberals because they have largely conservative voting records. Mr. Collins says that is only because Mr. Marshall has had so many Republican bills to vote on. Mr. Marshall, recently inducted into the Army Ranger Hall of Fame, is also popular with the large military population in the district.

Republicans have tried the "too liberal for Georgia" tactic before, even on Zell Miller, the Democratic senator perhaps most popularly remembered for his fiery speech at the Republican National Convention in 2004. Mr. Bullock says the Democrats have learned from the experience of party members like Max Cleland, whose votes exposed him to accusations of being too liberal.

DOJ_NMG_0085747

"If Democrats are going to get elected in this district, they've got to stake out the middle position, which is what traditional Southern Democrats did," Mr. Bullock said. "And when they did, they held the South."

Clinton Stumps For Local Democrats (CHIT)

By John Biemer And John Chase, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, October 24, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton spoke at a Chicago fundraiser for U.S. Rep. Melissa Bean and Tammy Duckworth on Monday and praised the suburban Democratic congressional candidates as "independent, clear-thinking, non-ideological, inclusive, commonsensical people."

About 600 supporters attended the event, sponsored by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, that was expected to raise about $800,000 to be split three ways between Bean, Duckworth and the DCCC.

Clinton briefly addressed campaign volunteers and reporters before the closed-door event and said "there is a profound sea change going on in this country—people know that Washington is not working for them.

"The ideologues who run things in Washington today really hate evidence and argument. They consider evidence irrelevant because they already got their mind made up and argument is an inconvenient waste of time, so they govern by assertion and attack," Clinton said. "The first rule in any human endeavor is if you find yourself in a hole, quit digging. The ideologue asks for a bigger shovel."

Duckworth's west suburban 6th Congressional District opponent, Peter Roskam, countered Clinton's visit by appearing with David Beamer, the father of Todd Beamer, a passenger on United 93, the flight hijacked by terrorists that crashed Sept. 11, 2001, in Pennsylvania.

David Beamer, a former Wheaton resident who now lives in Jacksonville Beach, Fla., said he backs Roskam for supporting the Bush administration's fight against terrorism. "It's a different kind of enemy. Their ideology is warped beyond comprehension, and this particular enemy doesn't have the word 'surrender' in their dictionary," Beamer said.

Earlier Monday, a group of 100 African-American ministers endorsed Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich for re-election and Ald. Todd Stroger (8th) for Cook County Board president. The minister said they intend to hand out at least 500,000 leaflets promoting the two candidates.

The "Unity in the Community" leaflets include a picture of Blagojevich and Stroger below the phrase, "The People's Slate."

The endorsement came as Stroger's campaign for the first time began airing commercials that promote his positions on increasing access to health insurance and equal pay while attacking Republican leadership. Stroger's Republican opponent is county Commissioner Tony Peraica.

Newly filed campaign disclosure reports show Stroger has raised about $600,000 since July, including more than $300,000 in the last two weeks. Peraica has raised more than $367,000 since July 1, including more than $126,000 in the last two weeks.

In the race for governor, incumbent Democrat Rod Blagojevich reported raising nearly $3.5 million since July 1, including at least $631,000 in donations of $500 or more since Oct. 9. Disclosure documents show Blagojevich got donations of $300,000 from the Illinois Federation of Teachers, $250,000 from the Laborers' International Union of North America and transferred $204,000 from his congressional campaign account. Aides to Republican Judy Baar Topinka said she would report more than $3 million in donations since July 1, including $687,000 in contributions of at least $500 since Oct. 9.

Born A Rambling Man (RC)

Roll Call, October 24, 2006

Having soaked up just about every last bit of limelight from the CIA leak scandal, former GOP-appointed Ambassador Joe Wilson is burning up the campaign trail on behalf of Democrats while apparently planning a full-time move away from Washington, D.C.

Sources tell HOH that Wilson and his wife, Valerie Plame Wilson — who was famously outed as a CIA operative by columnist Robert Novak — have told friends that they are ready to quit Washington. One source says the Wilsons, the parents of 6-year-old twins, have "settled on" Santa Fe, N.M.

Wilson, in a brief telephone chat with HOH, wouldn't confirm where or when they are moving. But he said, "We have entertained for a while now moving out of Washington, D.C. ... My wife no longer has a job in Washington, so we're no longer bound to the city," he said. (Thanks to Richard Armitage for those unemployment checks.)

Wilson — aka The Man Who Called B.S. on WMDs — said he and Valerie haven't sold their home in Washington (though it did sound as if there were a parenthetical "yet" on the end of his sentence). But he wouldn't confirm whether they've bought a house or are looking at houses in Santa Fe. "I don't have any comment on that," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0085748

For now, he said, "I'm safely ensconced in Washington, D.C."

Or rather, he's safely ensconced on the campaign trail. As a then-President George H.W. Bush political appointee, Wilson's appeal is particularly useful in swing districts. He has campaigned for such Democratic candidates as Diane Farrell, who is running against Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.); Lois Murphy, who's trying to unseat Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.); and Iraq War veteran Patrick Murphy, who is taking on Rep. Michael Fitzpatrick (R-Pa.).

Wilson, never one to shy away from the cameras, also is campaigning on behalf of Connecticut Senate candidate Ned Lamont (D), Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.) and former CIA agent Jim Marcinkowski, who's running against Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Mich.), among several others.

"What I'm campaigning for ... is accountability in government," Wilson said. "In my view, the majority that controls Congress has sacrificed the Constitution of the United States on the altar of partisan loyalty, partisan politics."

Hmmm, anybody figure that Wilson, who comes from a modest California political dynasty, is planning a campaign of his own?

Proud to Be a Macaca? In the wake of the "macaca" controversy that knocked Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) off-stride, two young Indian-American brothers in Vienna, Va., have become quite the grass-roots politicos.

With the help of their Democratic parents, the boys, age 10 and 12, designed a "Macacas for Jim Webb" T-shirt, which they're now selling for eight bucks a pop. All proceeds are going to Webb's Democratic Senate campaign, according to their mother, Alli Guleria, an orthodontist in Reston, Va.

Guleria says her boys, Shan, 12, and Neil, 10, have been exposed to "some amount of prejudice" at their small private school in Reston but were "shocked" by Allen's infamous "macaca" moniker for an Indian American at a campaign rally. She and her husband, who were both born in India, had a family meeting to discuss the controversy with their kids, and at that point, she said, "we thought, 'Wouldn't it be hilarious if we called ourselves macacas?'"

So the Democrats decided to embark on the family project to make "Macacas for Webb" T-shirts. The boys have been selling the T-shirts at school, around the neighborhood and to their mom's patients.

"To date, we've sold 38," Guleria said.

One neighbor who hasn't bought one of the boys' T-shirts is Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.), who lives on the same street as the Gulerias and who occasionally runs in the same circles. Guleria couldn't help herself when she ran into the Congressman at a party on Saturday night and told him about her boys' project.

"He was gracious," Guleria said of her GOP Congressman neighbor. She quoted Davis as saying, "Everyone is entitled to their opinion." She said he had "nothing but nice things" to say about Webb, and said nothing of Allen or his "macaca" comment.

Checklist for Cheap Senators. In the wake of an Associated Press report that Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) paid Christmas bonuses to the staff at his Ritz Carlton condo complex with campaign cash instead of his own money, the Las Vegas Review-Journal opined Sunday, "Is the good Senator a penny pincher?"

The newspaper devised the following checklist led by the question: "You might be a Senate skinflint if ..."

· You ask for a doggie bag in the Senate Dining Room.

· You regift to Howard Dean.

· You have a cash bar at your office holiday party.

· At those boxing matches, you angle for better seats by offering to introduce the usher to 'my good friend, George Washington.'

· You schedule restaurant fundraisers during 'early bird specials.'

· You pawn your BlackBerry, start using messages scrawled on free cocktail napkins.

Can Democrat Dethrone Rep. King? (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton

Roll Call, October 24, 2006

On a politically shaded map, Long Island is solidly blue, with the exception of a splotch of red situated just left of the middle.

That is where New York's 3rd Congressional district sits, and for more than a decade, Rep. Peter King (R), the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, has had little difficulty maintaining his seat in this Republican stronghold.

However, in an election year when everything seems to be going the Democrats' way, King's re-election might not be a guarantee.

The 62-year-old lawmaker is facing an unexpected challenge from Democrat David Mejias, the first-ever Latino elected to the Nassau County Legislature. Mejias, who was endorsed by The New York Times on Sunday, is touting a poll by the firm Constituent Dynamics that puts him only two points behind King.

Mejias argues that voters in the largely Republican 3rd district are ready for a change.

DOJ_NMG_0085749

"From the response that we've gotten, I'd like to think it's because I'm a good candidate," Mejias said. "But I completely understand that it's really about things that are beyond me."

Mejias said King has moved further to the right over the past few elections, against the wishes of his constituents. The challenger called King a "shameful rubberstamp" for President Bush and said that the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) gives him momentum to oust King come Nov. 7.

"I pose a credible threat for him," Mejias said Monday.

Mike Dawidziak, a political consultant in Long Island, said Mejias does pose a threat to King, although he doubts it's the kind of neck-and-neck race that the Constituent Dynamics poll suggests.

Factors that give Mejias some momentum heading into November include the national mood of the country, the Democratic nature of New York and the fact that Republicans haven't mounted a competitive top-of-the-state ticket, Dawidziak said.

"It could become closer than people think it's going to be," Dawidziak said.

Still, Mejias faces a difficult task in defeating King, Dawidziak said. He added that if Republican turnout roughly matches Democratic turnout, King will come out on top.

"He really just needs to say, 'I've been there. I've been doing the hard work,'" Dawidziak said of King. "I think people will react well to that."

Dawidziak added that Mejias' tactic of tying King directly to Bush might backfire.

"I don't think people buy that," Dawidziak said. "I think voters are a lot smarter than people give them credit for."

King, for his part, isn't buying any talk of an upset. The seven-term Congressman labels it pure hype, pointing to recent internal polling giving him a lead of more than 20 points over Mejias.

And when it comes to money, King truly is on top. According to the latest FEC filings, King has $1.6 million cash on hand, whereas Mejias lags far behind at about $136,000.

King is starting to put all that cash to use, he said. He launched radio ads in September and recently began airing television ads in the high-priced New York City market. One is an endorsement by former New York City mayor Ed Koch (D), while another features the mother of a firefighter killed during the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, King said.

King will increase the number of ads leading up to the election, as well as release 10 or 11 mailings to voters throughout the district, he said.

"I take every race seriously," King said. "So I'm going all-out."

At the same time, King argued that Mejias "is doing very little that other guys haven't done."

Past challengers have often had more money than Mejias does, yet King always managed to win anyway. King attributes much of the hype this time around to New York media outlets he doesn't count as allies.

"I don't see him as being a factor," King said of Mejias. "My opponent is Newsday and The New York Times."

Mejias, meanwhile, said he has reached about 80,000 voters through phone calls and door-to-door efforts, and he pointed to a public debate held between the candidates a few weeks ago that Mejias said generated a lot of interest in his campaign.

Born and raised on Long Island, Mejias was elected to the Nassau County Legislature in 2003. A graduate of the Fordham University School of Law, he opened his own law firm at the age of 26. He is the managing partner of David L. Mejias & Associates, which specializes in personal injury, matrimonial and criminal law.

Mejias' campaign has benefited from interest within the Internet grass roots. The debate was posted on YouTube, and liberal blogs, including kingwatch.blogspot.com, have talked up his campaign. By contrast, King does not even have a campaign Web site.

"All these years of not having a credible challenger has made him really arrogant," Mejias said.

Still, one Democratic pollster said any challenger must prove to voters that the incumbent no longer represents their needs and that a curtain surrounds their affairs in Washington, D.C.

"The task of a challenger is to raise that curtain," the pollster said.

In Calif., Charlie Brown Could Have The Last Laugh (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

ROSEVILLE, Calif. -- Charlie Brown for Congress? At first it sounded like a joke.

Brown was an unknown Democrat running in the California Republican heartland. The eight-term incumbent, John Doolittle (R), had crushed his 2004 opponent. Fewer than a third of district voters are registered Democrats. When Brown jumped in a year ago, the Peanuts references were irresistible.

"Good Grief! Charlie Brown Takes on Doolittle," proclaimed one political blog.

There are two types of candidates: the obvious ones, who are recruited to run in key races and get lots of financial and organizational help, and the bootstrap cases, who do it all on their own. Usually these second-tier candidates run and lose in obscurity. But sometimes they get lucky. If a wave breaks next month, Brown is one of many bootstrap Democrats who could be washed into Congress.

The latest polls show that Brown, a retired Air Force lieutenant colonel, has pulled within striking distance of Doolittle, whose well-documented ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff may be an albatross. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is increasingly optimistic about Brown's chances and has chipped in an undisclosed amount of cash for the final push. Brown has scooped up local newspaper endorsements and raised $750,000, much of it in recent weeks.

The one person who isn't surprised by this turn of events is Brown, who ignored all the naysayers and trusted his gut that Doolittle could be beaten. The latest news to break his way: Doolittle's campaign reported more than $38,000 in legal fees in his third-quarter fundraising report that are related to a federal investigation into Abramoff's lobbying activities. A Doolittle spokeswoman said the congressman was attempting to be helpful and had not been contacted by prosecutors, but the disclosure put Doolittle on the defensive with weeks to go.

"It all comes down to someone who lives in the district, and knows it," Brown said of his success. He's not surprised the national party kept its distance all those months. "We've had to show them in Washington that it was worth getting involved. When I got started, there was nothing here to support."

The 4th District is made up of 48 percent Republicans and 30 percent Democrats, with the balance GOP-leaning independents. The geography also is daunting. The district contains 17,000 square miles, from the Sacramento suburbs to the Oregon and Nevada state lines.

But it's a more nuanced landscape than it seems, Brown says.

Bay Area residents are moving east in search of cheaper housing, and although they are not heavily Democratic, many are registering as independents. The Sacramento area was one of the few pockets in the state to vote for a 2005 measure to end partisan redistricting. Doolittle called the initiative politically "stupid."

In June, Doolittle won the GOP primary with 67 percent of the vote, an indication that his base had diminished. The California 4th is home to 102,000 veterans. Brown was raised in a military household and has a son serving in Iraq. He coordinated Air Force surveillance flights over Iraq during the 1990s and opposed the Iraq war from the outset. As conditions in Iraq worsen, he has found local veterans increasingly responsive to his call for setting a timetable for withdrawal.

Running in a political no man's land requires building a campaign operation from scratch. Brown lined up precinct captains and courted local unions and other left-leaning organizations. He traveled to every populated cranny of the district, either alone or with his wife, Jan, a retired Air Force nurse.

Like most candidates, Brown has entered a sort of parallel universe, wired but road weary, a regular at a taqueria next door to headquarters. His campaign has grown bigger and more frenetic, part small business and part family.

One fixture is Joanne Neft, founder of Republicans for Charlie Brown, who canvasses in silver elephant earrings. Another is Don Harper, who runs Veterans for Brown.

Despite all the excitement, the party mantra remained unchanged: "Show me the polls." Brown commissioned a survey last month that showed Doolittle ahead, 41 percent to 39 percent, and 17 percent undecided. Shortly afterward, Brown was endorsed by the Sacramento Bee under the headline "Time for Doolittle to go."

On Oct. 11, the candidates met for a combative two-hour debate. "Nothing like it has ever been seen in Placer County," the San Francisco Chronicle observed.

Doolittle called Brown a "flimflam man." He cited Brown's membership in the American Civil Liberties Union, which Doolittle accused of defending the North American Man/Boy Love Association, which he said "is helping pedophiles get away with their dastardly deeds."

Brown lambasted Doolittle for his relationship with Abramoff and a San Diego businessman implicated in the bribery case that sent former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) to prison. Brown noted that his opponent had accepted a $1,000 donation from Mark Foley (R-Fla.), who resigned from Congress last month in a scandal involving male teenage congressional pages. "Mr. Doolittle knows more about man's love than I do, with his support of Congressman Foley," Brown retorted.

They say timing is everything in politics, but part of that is knowing when an incumbent's time may be up. "There's a whole lot of people who are going to win this year, simply because they showed up," said Amy Walter, who tracks House races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. "People who are willing to take the biggest risks often get the biggest rewards."

Parties Preparing For Final Push (RC)

By David M. Drucker

DOJ_NMG_0085751

Roll Call, October 24, 2006

Republicans, struggling to retain their Congressional majority under the weight of low approval ratings and bad news out of Iraq, are increasingly pinning their hopes for survival on a get-out-the-vote effort that Democrats acknowledge they cannot match.

Republican strategists are quick to point out that a superior GOTV operation is unlikely, on its own, to salvage races in which their candidate is trailing by even as little as 3 points.

But for those races in which the Republican is within 2 points or less, they argue that an effective ground game could be the difference between victory and defeat. And they believe their superior turnout operation may help them overcome a sense among pundits that the Republican base will be depressed on Election Day, literally and figuratively.

Democrats — who also trail the GOP in cash on hand — have moved to stem the disadvantage in key battlegrounds, spending millions to create statewide voter files in Missouri and Montana while engineering a coordinated ground game attack in key House districts in Ohio, Pennsylvania and other contested states. Also, the AFL-CIO and MoveOn.org have said they'll spend a combined $52 million on GOTV on the Democrats' behalf.

Equally important, the Democrats expect their base voters to be far more motivated than the GOP's, helping to blunt whatever tactical advantage the Republicans may have.

"People want change. They don't want a rubber-stamp Congress. It's helping us dramatically," Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) said Sunday on CBS' "Face the Nation."

Still, nothing Democrats and their surrogates do on the turnout front is likely to match the breadth and scope of a nationwide GOP voter-turnout machine engineered by the Republican National Committee.

Developed in part by Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman following the 2000 elections and repeatedly refined since then, the plan is implemented through millions of volunteers on the ground, under the supervision of paid party leaders at the state, county and precinct levels.

"In an off-year election, the ground game is extraordinarily important," said Republican pollster David Winston, who also is a contributing writer for Roll Call. "What Ken Mehlman has done at the RNC is make sure we keep a strategic edge in terms of our ability to conduct a ground game."

According to the most recent polls, there are at least two Senate races — Missouri and Tennessee — and several House contests (including those in Connecticut, Florida and Indiana, to name a few) where the RNC-run ground war could be the key to GOP chances of maintaining its grip on Capitol Hill.

The Republican operation is credited with pushing now-Rep. Brian Bilbray (R) over the finish line against college lecturer Francine Busby (D) in a June 6 special election in California's 50th district, and pulling Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) past Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey (R) in the Sept. 12 primary. Vigorously disputing suggestions that their base is dispirited, the RNC noted its operatives have made 14 million voter contacts this year — 7 million since Labor Day — surpassing the level of engagement it enjoyed during the same period in 2004.

Campaign aides for Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.), who is trying to hold off state Auditor Claire McCaskill (D) in a neck-and-neck Senate race, said the GOP ground game in the Show Me State is larger this cycle than it was in 2004 — at least based on the number of volunteers on the ground and voter contacts. Bush won Missouri in 2004 by 7 points.

"Everyone has written us off, but races are still close enough for [the ground game] to make a difference," said one Republican strategist with intimate knowledge of the RNC's effort. "We're ahead in some races people think we're behind in."

But the Democrats, believing the playing field is expanding as Nov. 7 approaches, are hardly conceding the ground war to Republicans.

Particularly in their efforts to take control of the House, the Democrats are planning a strong ground game in some districts that they believe might surprise the Republicans, including Ohio's 2nd district — where physician Victoria Wulsin (D) is battling Rep. Jean Schmidt (R) — and Colorado's 4th district, where Rep. Marilyn Musgrave (R) is facing state Rep. Angie Paccione (D).

Democratic strategists say the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is on track to spent $10 million on GOTV, with another $2.4 million thrown at the effort courtesy of the Democratic National Committee. The DSCC is spending around $20 million on GOTV this cycle in an effort that began at the cycle's outset, with Schumer allocating money to beef up state parties in 15 states where he anticipated competitive Senate races (the playing field has shrunk since then).

Schumer also prioritized targeting rural and exurban districts that have predominantly voted Republican in recent cycles but that polling data indicated were open to voting for Democrats. Voters in these regions have been identified and to date have been contacted dozens of times, said one Democratic strategist.

"The biggest advantage [Republicans] have is that they have so much money to throw at it," said a second Democratic strategist familiar with the Democrats' ground game plans, acknowledging that the RNC's GOTV operation is the more advanced of the two.

DOJ_NMG_0085752

The Republicans' ground game consists of three key elements.

· Complete coordination: Because the GOP turnout effort is run by the party, the White House, the RNC and House and Senate campaign committees can coordinate with each other and every one of their candidates.

The Democrats, because they are still partly reliant on surrogates like the AFL-CIO for GOTV, cannot necessarily be as tactically efficient as the Republicans.

· Technology: All voter contact information gathered by Republican volunteers is entered into the "Voter Vault" data system for review by party operatives at all levels. Since 2004, entering the information gathered on a voter's characteristics has become more efficient, with the latest data available the same day it is gathered, rather than 24 hours or more following the contact. This allows the GOP to adjust to changing conditions on the ground at an even faster pace.

The relevant information gathered on voters includes whether they vote absentee or on Election Day and what their key issue is, so that the contacts made — whether via telephone, direct mail or in person — are focused on that subject. This information was formerly entered manually; this cycle it's all scanned in on bubble sheets that look similar to the answer sheets used on standardized tests.

· Local volunteers: As with any large-scale GOTV operation, the RNC ships paid staffers and unpaid volunteers to the states and districts that are most in need. But the committee's GOTV strategy regarding voter contacts involves relying on locally based volunteers, the theory being that voters respond more favorably to their friends and neighbors than to strangers.

The 72 Hour Program, which focuses on turning voters out to the polls during the campaign's final three days, also is considered vital to the Republican effort.

Without having the issues or the political environment on their side, however, the Republican ground game might not count for much. Polls show a majority of voters are unhappy with Bush's conduct of the Iraq War and suggest that Democrats might be more motivated to turnout and send a message to Bush than Republicans are to vote their majority back into power.

Democrats claim what could be a critical advantage here, saying unhappiness with the Bush administration combined with a desire for change in Washington, D.C., translate into the political fuel needed to make the turnout engine go. But they also took concrete steps to lessen the advantage Republicans had on the ground in 2004.

They reviewed data from specific voter precincts in targeted states, and they expanded their target area from traditional Democratic strongholds like large metropolitan cities to include Republican leaning suburbs, small towns and rural areas that suggested the population was open to voting Democrat. At the DSCC, Schumer funneled money to build state party organizations, establishing benchmarks to ensure the money wasn't wasted.

"We've worked very closely with the state parties to make sure the financing is there and that the actual work is getting done," a Democratic strategist familiar with the DSCC's efforts said. "We're obviously cognizant of the Republican turnout efforts from years past, but we think we'll be turning some heads ourselves."

Democrats Urge Their Flush Candidates To Share The Wealth (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 23 — The balance in the campaign account of Representative Martin T. Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts, is $4,886,325. It is a muscular sum for a member of the House, and ordinarily it would be hailed as an exhibit of fund-raising savvy.

But in a stream of telephone calls to his offices on Monday, otherwise admiring Democratic constituents had another word for Mr. Meehan: cheap.

With Democrats increasingly convinced that House control is within their grasp, party activists are publicly excoriating politicians in safe districts who have hefty campaign balances. Mr. Meehan, easily re-elected two years ago with 67 percent of the vote, is at the top of a new list being circulated by Democratic bloggers.

"If he's sitting on all that money, I think he ought to share," said Sue Stafford, 61, a college professor from Andover, Mass., who is one of Mr. Meehan's longtime supporters. "It would be a shame to lose because we don't have enough money."

The not-so-gentle campaign to nudge Democrats — or, in many cases, shame them — into contributing more money to the party is another way bloggers are producing a collision between the old world of politics and the new. Gone are the days when politicians could quietly squirrel away campaign money for that next big election.

Across the country on Monday, Ms. Stafford and thousands of other people received an e-mail message from the liberal-leaning MoveOn.org asking them to urge their representatives to help less fortunate Democratic candidates who now see a chance to win seats previously considered beyond their reach.

DOJ_NMG_0085753

Mr. Meehan, who has amassed nearly $5 million for a possible run for the Senate, has contributed $355,000 to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee this year. “He is as committed as anyone,” said his spokeswoman, Sandra Salstrom, “to having Democratic control of the House on Nov. 7.”

But though Mr. Meehan has been appearing at events and vigorously campaigning for other candidates, he has no immediate intention of giving more money, Ms. Salstrom said.

Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the Democratic presidential nominee in 2004, came under fire last week when it was pointed out that he had contributed only $15,000 this year to the party’s senatorial committee. Heyjohn.org, whose creator has remained anonymous, highlights the fact that Mr. Kerry has $14 million in his campaign accounts.

Dismissing the criticism, his spokesman, David Wade, said Mr. Kerry had contributed $2.8 million to campaign committees, state parties and individual candidates in this election cycle. And in appearances across the country and in Internet appeals, Mr. Wade said, the senator has helped raise about $7 million for candidates.

“Cowards can hide behind anonymous Web sites,” Mr. Wade said, “but Democrats out in the country, party leaders and real net-roots activists know how hard John Kerry has fought to win these elections.”

It is members of the House, though, who were drawing the most ire from the party faithful on Monday. At least 70 Democratic members of Congress face either no opponent or a nominal Republican challenger, and that was enough to earn them a position on a list of candidates that organizers say will reach 100,000 people by week’s end.

MoveOn.org’s goal is to get each member of Congress who has at least $200,000 in the campaign account and who does not face a competitive challenge to give 30 percent to other races. MoveOn members are receiving personalized e-mail messages complete with the telephone number of their representative and the amount of money in that candidate’s account. Six instructions accompany the e-mail request, including, “Be polite.”

Eli Pariser, executive director of MoveOn.org, said of the well-off candidates, “It’s one of those moments when they need to put the interest of their party ahead of their own personal ambitions.”

Chris Bowers, who writes for the popular political blog MyDD.com, conceived the idea that MoveOn adopted. It was an outgrowth of an online discussion about how Democrats were considering taking out a loan of up to $10 million to challenge Republicans in seats that once did not appear competitive.

“This is an extraordinary election cycle,” Mr. Bowers said. “By challenging every seat, we actually stretch Republican resources so thin that we could swing the election.”

By the close of business on Monday, organizers said, only Representative Barney Frank of Massachusetts had agreed to contribute 30 percent of his campaign balance, which would amount to nearly $74,000. But other members of Congress, the organizers said, are considering answering the appeal.

“Instead of a small map, we are dealing with a much larger map,” said Sarah Feinberg, a spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. “The issue now is making sure we have the resources to play in as many races that are up for grabs.”

Clinton Says Rival In 'Swampy Territory' (AP-Y)

By Marc Humbert, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 24, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton accused her Republican challenger of getting into "swampy territory" after he was quoted Monday as saying that Clinton was unattractive when she was younger and that she had a lot of work done on herself. John Spencer denied discussing the senator's looks during a conversation with a New York Daily News reporter.

The tabloid quoted Spencer as saying: "You ever see a picture of her back then? Whew. I don't know why Bill married her."

Spencer, former mayor of the New York City suburb of Yonkers, was also quoted as saying that Clinton underwent millions of dollars of "work" and "looks good now."

During a campaign stop at a senior citizens center in Watervliet, just outside Albany, Clinton said: "It's unfortunate that when you don't have anything positive to say about the issues that we can get off in some pretty swampy territory."

After the newspaper came out, Spencer said the comments were "a fabrication. I would never call Hillary Clinton ugly. That's outrageous. I didn't do it."

The reporter, Ben Smith, spoke with Spencer during a flight Friday from New York City to Rochester. He told the AP that Spencer made the comments as Spencer, his wife and Smith sat together. He said he did not tape-record the comments but took notes on his Blackberry.

Clinton adviser Howard Wolfson said Clinton has had no plastic surgery or similar appearance-enhancing work.

DOJ_NMG_0085754

"I'm not sure what's worse, that Mr. Spencer made these insulting comments or that instead of owning up and apologizing for them, he is lying about them," Wolfson added. "Either way, it's clear that he is unfit for the U.S. Senate."

Clinton joked with reporters during her stop in Watervliet that "my high-school picture was cute." It was also on the tabloid's front page.

Polls have shown Clinton, 58, far ahead of the craggy-faced, 59-year-old Spencer in the Senate race.

Opponent Is Put On The Spot Over Remarks About Clinton (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

The two recent debates between Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton and her Republican opponent, John Spencer, may have lacked fireworks. Yesterday, however, the race was set astir by remarks that Mr. Spencer reportedly made before the first debate — comments about Mrs. Clinton's sexuality and physical appearance. .

The commotion started yesterday when The Daily News ran a front-page headline, "Getting Ugly," and reported that Mr. Spencer had claimed that Mrs. Clinton had undergone, in the newspaper's words, "millions in surgery to make her pretty."

The article then quoted derisive comments by Mr. Spencer about the way she looked when she was much younger, including, "I don't know why Bill married her," a reference to former President Bill Clinton.

Mr. Spencer angrily called the report a "complete fabrication" yesterday. He acknowledged that he had talked about how different she looked now and about her changing style. But he said it was in the context of "everyone looking different." He denied saying anything about plastic surgery or questioning Mr. Clinton's marital judgment.

That did not stop Mrs. Clinton from criticizing the comments attributed to Mr. Spencer.

"It's unfortunate that when you don't have anything positive to say about the issues that we can get off in some pretty swampy territory," she said yesterday during a campaign stop outside Albany.

Ben Smith, the Daily News reporter who wrote the article, stood by his account. He said he took notes on his BlackBerry. By chance, the candidate and the reporter were seated in the same row, one seat apart, on a JetBlue flight from New York to Rochester on Friday morning before the first debate. Both Mr. Smith and Mr. Spencer said it was a casual conversation that hit on many topics.

Last night, meanwhile, a columnist for The Journal News in Westchester County said that Mr. Spencer made an off-color remark about Mrs. Clinton's sexuality.

The columnist, Phil Reisman, said that he asked Mr. Spencer by telephone last week if he would use the debates to try to paint Mrs. Clinton as a liberal. "He said words to the effect of, 'Well, you know me, words slip out, but I won't call her a lesbian or anything,' " Mr. Reisman said. "He was definitely joking — he laughed after he said it."

Asked about the "lesbian" remark, Rob Ryan, Mr. Spencer's spokesman, said, "As John Spencer said this afternoon, if he offended anyone, he apologizes."

Mining Midterms For Clues To '08 Field (WSJ)

By Christoper Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

BOSTON -- In a state with a legacy of racial tension, Deval Patrick looks poised to become the nation's second black governor ever popularly elected, and to regain the left-leaning commonwealth for the Democrats.

His strategy: tying his opponent not to President Bush but to her political patron, sitting Gov. Mitt Romney, whose politics are moving rightward in preparation for a presidential run.

Lt. Gov Kerry Healey has been running negative ads, even as she claims that she is closer to Mr. Patrick than Mr. Romney on some issues. "Deval and I have some things in common: We both support choice, we both support stem-cell research," Ms. Healey said at a recent debate here. Mr. Romney is opposed to both, and has become more outspokenly so.

In a recent statewide poll, Mr. Patrick had a 13-percentage-point lead over Ms. Healey.

Mr. Romney, who declined to seek re-election, is exploring a bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination. In recent months, he has barnstormed the country speaking to conservative groups. Along the way, Mr. Romney has tailored his appeal to core Republican supporters, including conservative Christians who are kingmakers in the presidential nomination process -- and often have a different worldview from the constituents Mr. Romney had to win over in his home state.

The Romney overhang in the Massachusetts governor's race is just one example of how the 2006 election season has begun to define the 2008 presidential contest. A big reason: This will be the first presidential race in decades with no heir-apparent in either party. Jockeying among Republicans and Democrats has begun early, and candidates have sought to use the midterm races to establish a position for when the political spotlight shifts to the White House contest.

DOJ_NMG_0085755

Sens. George Allen of Virginia and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York are both considering presidential runs and both are on the ballot this year in re-election races. A recent comment by Mr. Allen that some perceived as racist has called into question his electability, while Mrs. Clinton's easy Senate re-election bid has given her a massive war chest that may scare off rivals. Illinois Democratic Sen. Barack Obama isn't standing for election but is campaigning for others in a possible test for a presidential run.

For Mr. Romney, a one-term governor with no prior political experience, Ms. Healey's fortunes may speak volumes about his ability to leave a legacy or rally a political base.

Mr. Romney's out-of-state travel has done little to bolster his popularity in Massachusetts, and Mr. Patrick has moved to exploit this, primarily by trying to bind Ms. Healey to the governor in the eyes of voters, even as he tears down Mr. Romney. Last week the Patrick campaign released a list of insults it says Mr. Romney has hurled at the state while traveling. Among them was his statement to a South Carolina group in late 2005 that being a conservative governor in Massachusetts "is a bit like being a cattle rancher at a vegetarian convention." Mr. Romney also has said that if he had to do it all over again, he might have run for governor in Michigan instead of Massachusetts.

Eric Fehrnstrom, a spokesman for Mr. Romney, said the governor didn't sully the state. "Sometimes Democrats confuse criticism of Democratic policies with criticism of the state of Massachusetts, " Mr. Fehrnstrom said. "Gov. Romney loves the state of Massachusetts."

More subtly, Mr. Patrick has stopped using Ms. Healey's full name at many campaign events, favoring instead "the Romney-Healey administration." Mr. Patrick's staff says only Mr. Romney has a more unfavorable rating with voters than Ms. Healey, who was viewed negatively by 42% of voters in a recent poll. "That's why we make it a point on the stump to always say 'the Romney-Healey administration' when we talk about her," said Richard Chacón, Mr. Patrick's spokesman.

A recent television ad from Mr. Patrick's campaign featured big pictures of Mr. Romney and Ms. Healey while an announcer reeled off complaints about their administration: increased property taxes; police layoffs; job losses and the tunnel collapse in the Big Dig, a massive highway project that has been under construction for years.

Ms. Healey, aiming to become the first female governor of Massachusetts, has shied from having Mr. Romney accompany her on the campaign trail, though Mr. Fehrnstrom said the governor is willing to do whatever is asked of him. "The extent of Gov. Romney's involvement in Kerry Healey's campaign will be determined by Kerry Healey," he said. So far, he said, the extent of Mr. Romney's participation has been "fund-raising behind the scenes."

Ms. Healey's staff says that she doesn't share all of Mr. Romney's political views. In the recent debate at Faneuil Hall, Ms. Healey was challenged to rebuke Mr. Romney for the supposed insults he has directed toward the state. She declined to do so, to boos from the audience.

Mr. Patrick, a political newcomer, appears to have the race well in hand, unlike two other black gubernatorial hopefuls this year -- Kenneth Blackwell in Ohio and Lynn Swann in Pennsylvania, both Republicans, who trail their opponents in polls. If any one of the three wins, he will become the first post-Reconstruction black governor in the nation since Douglas Wilder took the Virginia governor's mansion in 1989.

But before Mr. Patrick can claim victory, he has to fend off a withering campaign by Ms. Healey, who increasingly emphasizes law-and-order issues -- and is trying to turn Mr. Patrick's professional experience against him.

Mr. Patrick is a former lawyer for Coca-Cola Co. and Texaco Inc., and a top federal prosecutor in the Clinton administration. But Ms. Healey has focused on two events -- Mr. Patrick's defense of a convicted Florida cop-killer while he served as a staff lawyer for the NAACP, and his advocacy for a Massachusetts man who has long held that he was unjustly convicted of raping a 59-year-old grandmother in 1983.

The convicted rapist is a man named Benjamin LaGuer, and Mr. Patrick wasn't the only Massachusetts citizen who has taken up his cause over the years. In 1998 and 2000, Mr. Patrick wrote letters of support for Mr. LaGuer and donated to a legal fund to secure a DNA test for the convict. When the test subsequently linked Mr. LaGuer more firmly to the crime, Mr. Patrick, along with other prominent citizens in the state, dropped his support.

Mr. Patrick was slow to acknowledge his advocacy of Mr. LaGuer, which was revealed by the Boston Globe in early October. Ms. Healey reacted with a new campaign ad, featuring grainy footage of a woman walking through a deserted parking garage, using Mr. Patrick's own words to describe the convicted rapist: "He is eloquent, and he is thoughtful; there's no doubt about that," Mr. Patrick said. The narrator then asks "Have you ever heard a woman compliment a rapist?" Mr. Patrick, the ad concluded, "should be ashamed, not governor."

Mr. Patrick, whose campaign initially disclosed writing only one letter on Mr. LaGuer's behalf, said he should have researched the record before speaking.

Obama Offers More Variations From The Norm (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

PHOENIX, Oct. 23 — Senator Barack Obama, the Illinois Democrat who said Sunday that he was considering running for president in 2008, created a little sunlight on Monday between himself and both Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton.

For one thing, he said that as a youth he had inhaled.

"When I was a kid, I inhaled," Mr. Obama said here to an audience of magazine editors. "That was the point."

The direct admission was in contrast to Mr. Clinton's denial in his 1992 campaign for president that he had smoked marijuana.

"I didn't inhale," Mr. Clinton said, cementing the idea that he liked to have things both ways.

Mr. Obama had written in his first book, "Dreams From My Father" (1995), before entering politics, that he had used marijuana and cocaine ("maybe a little blow"). He said he had not tried heroin because he did not like the pusher who was trying to sell it to him.

In an interview here on Monday conducted by David Remnick, editor of The New Yorker, at a meeting of the American Society of Magazine Editors, Mr. Obama said he was not making light of the subject.

"It was reflective of the struggles and confusion of a teenage boy," he said. "Teenage boys are frequently confused."

Since Mr. Clinton's statement, the question of drug use has become a standard one for politicians, sometimes as a test of their ability to be straightforward. If the politician has used drugs, conventional wisdom says it is best to try to get the question out of the way early.

Mr. Remnick also asked Mr. Obama for his views about Mrs. Clinton, the New York Democrat who has been a dominant figure in discussions about potential presidential candidates in 2008. Mr. Obama praised her but made clear that he did not agree with her vote for the Iraq war.

"I think very highly of Hillary," he said. "The more I get to know her, the more I admire her. I think she's one of the most disciplined people I know. She's one of the toughest. She's got an extraordinary intelligence, and she's somebody who's in this stuff for the right reasons. She's passionate about moving the country forward on issues like health care and children."

But, he said, they clearly had "different assessments" about the wisdom of going to war in Iraq. Perhaps mindful that he could end up as her vice-presidential running mate, he added that he had it easier because he was not in the Senate at the time, while she had to vote.

Asked how he might campaign against her in a primary, he said he had not thought about that.

But he did sound like a candidate in criticizing the Bush administration in somewhat stronger terms than he has in the past. He called it "the most ideologically driven administration in my memory" and said it was "obstinate in resisting facts," as well as dissent and compromise.

"This administration has done great damage to this country," he said, citing the Iraq war as the chief reason.

Why Not Obama? (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Ancient Rome had a term for a certain political process: cursus honorum , the honors race. It was, I am told by Anthony Everitt in his new biography, "Augustus," the process by which politicians moved up the ladder. Along the way, they were evaluated until, finally, some made it to the top. Nowadays, the system is different. All you have to do is appear on "Oprah."

I am referring, obviously and insidiously, to Barack Obama, who announced Sunday that he might run for president. This followed, of course, the aforementioned appearance on "Oprah" which I, diligent in pursuit of truth, watched. This is how I learned that Obama loves his wife and she loves him and they both love their children. Cursus honorum this is not.

Life itself -- its hard lessons -- cautions me to look with consummate cynicism on the Obama trial balloon. After all, the man has been in the United States Senate for a mere two years, and before that he served -- with distinction, we are told -- in the Illinois legislature, where, it seems, just staying out of jail is distinction enough. We know little about Obama's political performance, since he has performed so little. He is only 45, which is about the age of some of my suits. On the world stage, he would be a child.

And yet I cheer his announcement that he might announce he is going to announce -- something like that. I say this not just because I have been following his career out of the corner of my eye -- my, my, ain't he a natural! -- but because I've actually been reading his speeches. The one he gave on the role of religion in politics was as smart a speech as I've ever read. It's the sort of thing John F. Kennedy could have given, only his would have been written by someone else, probably Ted Sorensen.

I cheer also because Obama is an African American -- an African father, an American mother. For someone like him to be a presidential candidate -- maybe even president -- says oodles about this country. After eight years of George W. Bush and his narcissistic foreign policy -- me, me, us, us -- it would be great to have a president who presents a different message just by his complexion and who compensates, if anything can, for how Iraq has tarnished America's reputation, particularly in the Third World.

But mostly I want Obama to run because he would come into the race with no baggage on Iraq. Not from him would we hear excuses about how he was misled by the Bush administration into thinking there were weapons of mass destruction there. Obama not only was against the war when he ran for the Senate but he can claim -- as could the 21 Democratic senators who voted against the war resolution -- that it was possible to accept the "facts" at the time and still see that the war was unnecessary, if not downright stupid. It just makes me wince every time I hear John Kerry or John Edwards or Joe Biden or Chris Dodd or Hillary Clinton say they were misled, fooled, lied to or some other version of seduced and abandoned -- otherwise they would have voted the right way. This is disingenuous.

It can be no coincidence that so many of the Democrats who voted to authorize Bush to go to war had the White House on their minds. It can be no coincidence, either, that with the technical exception of Russ Feingold, none of the Democrats who voted against the resolution are presidential hopefuls. Take, for instance, Carl Levin of Michigan. To read his statements from the time (September and October 2002) is to see someone who accepted that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction but still saw no immediate need for war -- especially not without widespread international support. Levin, in retrospect, had it about right. The others (not to mention myself) did not.

In some respects -- in the Roman way of cursus honorum -- an Obama candidacy would be a joke. He has no executive experience, and I don't know -- neither does he -- if he can make a decision. But if he could sharpen the focus of the other candidates about Iraq, if he could somehow disengage the United States from Iraq -- if he could, in other words, stop wasting American (and other) lives -- then his candidacy would hardly be an insult to the system, as some insist, but a gift.

Treasury Chief Keeps Eyes On The Money, Feet Off The Campaign Trail (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Let's take a look at Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr.'s public calendar for this week:

Oct. 23: Unveiling of Currency with New Signature, Bureau of Engraving and Printing, 14th and C Streets SW.

The end.

That's right: While Republicans pounded the campaign trail, struggling to keep their majority in the Nov. 7 midterm elections, Paulson strolled along a production line at the bureau yesterday, watching $20 bills bearing his signature roll off the presses.

According to a Bloomberg News report yesterday, Paulson, unlike his campaign-friendly predecessor, John W. Snow, aims to stay off the stump and in the office, despite the polls. Bloomberg cites a former Bush administration official and another person involved in recruiting Paulson as saying that the White House agreed he would not have to make campaign speeches.

Paulson, 60, a former chairman of Goldman Sachs, took his post in July. Since then, he has confined his out-of-town visits to the financial centers of Chicago and New York, the Bloomberg report says.

Paulson spokeswoman Brookly McLaughlin confirmed that her boss "believes the Treasury secretary should not participate in partisan political activities."

Typically, the secretaries of state and defense and the attorney general don't take part in political campaigns. Other high-level officials have been known to shimmy out of campaign duty as well, citing the appearance of impropriety. But with Democrats poised to win the 15 seats needed to seize a House majority and, perhaps, even the six needed to control the Senate, some Republicans may find it tough to justify keeping the Treasury secretary off the campaign trail -- especially with the administration trying so hard to tout its economic record to voters. But leave it to a financial guru to hedge against changes in fortune.

Among Paulson's predecessors, Nicholas Brady and James A. Baker III hardly campaigned at all. Robert E. Rubin and Lawrence H. Summers made a handful of stops for presidential races. But Snow appears to be the traveling Treasury champion, visiting 20 states during President Bush's 2004 race.

Paulson seems set to let that record stand for now.

Ballot Measures Propose Limits On Judicial Authority (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

DENVER -- Western conservatives are gunning for the judiciary this election year with a half-dozen ballot measures that would rope in the authority of what they describe as activist judges.

Case in point is Colorado, where former state Senate leader John Andrews tried for years to solve the problem of activist judges who he said routinely legislated from the bench, often at the expense of conservatives.

His efforts in the legislature fell short, but Mr. Andrews isn't finished. He is the prime mover behind Amendment 40, a proposed constitutional amendment that would limit state appellate judges to 10-year terms, making Colorado the first state to limit the office of top-tier judges.

"We see a pattern of ideological and political decisions from the bench, and it points to a consistent tendency of appellate judges in Colorado to rewrite the law," said Mr. Andrews, now a fellow with the Claremont Institute, after a press conference yesterday at the state Capitol.

Amendment 40 faces overwhelming opposition of the state's legal and political establishment. It is opposed by virtually every top lawmaker in the state, including Republican Gov. Bill Owens, Republican Attorney General John Suthers, and former Democratic Govs. Richard Lamm and Roy Romer. The state's leading newspapers have also editorialized against the proposal.

They argue that Amendment 40 would force out good judges, create judicial backlogs and empower governors to stack the courts with partisan picks. The measure would result in a one-time retroactive removal of five Supreme Court judges and seven appellate court judges in 2009, which critics say would deprive the courts of decades of experience.

"This is a misguided measure that would be devastating to Colorado courts," Mr. Suthers said. "Because it is retroactive, a majority of Colorado's justices and judges will be kicked off the bench. This will be bad for Colorado citizens and the judiciary."

Mr. Andrews insists the measure is not an extreme solution, noting that most justices leave the state Supreme Court after less than 10 years anyway.

"This is more of a safeguard against those judges who say they can stay around forever, rather than a radical restructuring of the judiciary," Mr. Andrews said. "At the same time, it's partly symbolic. It sends a message that people are fed up with lawmaking from the bench. Such a rebuke would be felt in Colorado but also other states."

A truly radical solution would be Amendment E, the South Dakota proposal that would eliminate judicial immunity and allow citizens to sue judges. Known as "Jail 4 Judges," the measure would clear the path for lawsuits for offenses that include "blocking of a lawful conclusion of a case."

In Montana, voters will decide whether to approve CI-98, a measure that would allow residents to recall justices or judges for "any reason" and says removal from office is "a political question answered solely by ... the recall election." Judges now may be recalled only for reasons such as mental incompetence and official misconduct.

An Oregon amendment would require appellate judges to be elected from newly created geographic districts in an effort to give the state's more conservative rural areas greater representation on the state's liberal-leaning courts.

In Colorado, a local television poll conducted last month found Amendment 40 leading 55 percent to 40 percent, despite the efforts of the better-financed opposition campaign. Mr. Andrews points to a series of court rulings, most recently the state Supreme Court's decision to disqualify a ballot measure that would have denied non-emergency state services to illegal aliens.

Even though he expects to be outspent by at least 3-to-1 in the campaign's final weeks, Mr. Andrews says he is convinced most voters will respond positively to the idea of reining in the judiciary.

"The story with term limits in Colorado has been that the establishment is always against them and the people always support them," he said.

Reducing Uninsured Seen As Top Health-Care Issue, Poll Finds (WSJ)

By Beckey Bright

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

Americans say reducing the percentage of uninsured in the U.S. is a top priority for government to address over the next two years, a WSJ.com/Harris poll shows. But many lack confidence in either party's ability to tackle this and other health-care issues.

The Oct. 8-10 poll, which asked U.S. adults to consider a range of health-care issues, found 42% feel "reducing the percentage of Americans without health insurance," is one of the top two health-care issues. Other health-care issues that ranked high in importance were Medicare reform (28%) and containing out-of-pocket costs for health-care services (26%).

Most Americans contend that health-care issues will be important, but not as important as other issues, in determining how they vote in the November elections, the poll found.

A plurality of those polled believe by a two or three to one margin that the eight health-care issues listed would be handled better by the Democrats than by the Republicans. For example, 37% of respondents said Democrats are likely to do a better job of reducing the percentage of uninsured, while 11% see Republicans as more adept. However, nearly a third of 2,384 adults in the online poll don't believe there's a difference in either party's ability to address this issue and 22% aren't sure.

While most Democrats are confident in their party's ability to do a better job when it comes to health-care issues, most Republicans and Independents lack confidence or are uncertain that either party can do a better job of handling any of these issues.

Here are full results of the poll: "Which of the following statements best describes your views about the Nov. 7 elections?"

Base: All adults

Note: Percentages may not add up to exactly 100% due to rounding. * * * "Which two of these do you think are the most important issues for government to address over the next two years?"

Base: All adults * * * "Which political party do you think is likely to do a better job handling the following components of the U.S. health-care system after the elections on Nov. 7?"

Base: All adults

Note: Percentages may not add up to exactly 100% due to rounding.

Methodology:

Harris Interactive conducted this online survey in the U.S., between Oct. 16 and 18, 2006, among a nationwide cross section of 2,384 adults. Figures for age, gender, race/ethnicity, education, income and region were weighted where necessary to align with population proportions. Propensity score weighting was also used to adjust for respondents' propensity to be online. In theory, with probability samples of this size, one can say with 95% certainty that the overall results have a sampling error of +/- 3 percentage points of what they would be if the entire U.S. adult population had been polled with complete accuracy. This online sample is not a probability sample.

Officer Struck By 2nd Circuit Judge While Directing Traffic Dies (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, October 24, 2006

A New Haven, Conn., police officer died Saturday, four days after being struck by a sport utility vehicle driven by a federal judge, the mayor said.

Officer Dan Picagli, a 17-year veteran of the force, was hit while directing traffic in the rain Tuesday night. He had been wearing a black raincoat and a reflective vest.

The SUV was driven by John M. Walker Jr., a senior judge on the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York, who maintains court chambers in New Haven. He was leaving work when the accident happened, police said.

No charges have been filed.

Police Chief Francisco Ortiz said the accident remained under investigation, but officers did not feel it was necessary to test Walker for drugs or alcohol.

Walker, 65, voluntarily stepped down this month as chief judge of the court. He was appointed to the court in 1989 by President George H.W. Bush, who is a cousin of the judge.

"Officer Picagli was more than a cop," Mayor John DeStefano said in a statement Saturday. "He was someone who brought people together, who created a sense of community. He was a life enhancer to all with whom he came in contact. More than any memorial, his basic decency will keep his memory vibrant in our city."

Generation Y Gets Involved (USAT)

By Sharon Jayson

USA Today, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — Alex Wells switched shampoos over animal testing. She won't buy clothes produced by child labor. She yells at those who don't recycle. She spent a month in India this summer teaching English to preschoolers. Last year in high school, she helped organize a protest over genocide in the Sudan that raised $13,000 for Darfur relief.

Wells, 18, of Los Gatos, Calif., may be pretty typical of her generation. A growing body of academic and market research suggests millennials — who are in their mid-20s and younger — are civic-minded and socially conscious as individuals, consumers and employees. This generation, also known as Generation Y and Echo Boomers, has been pressed for its vote, sought for its purchasing power and watched closely by sociologists and historians for insight into the way its members will shape the future.

They may be less radical than baby boom activists in the 1960s and 1970s, whose demonstrations for civil rights, women's equality and protecting the environment and protests against the Vietnam War became flashpoints for their times. But thanks in large part to the Internet, this generation is much more aware of the world. And because national tragedies such as the 9/11 terrorist attacks and Hurricane Katrina have scarred their youth and adolescence, experts see signs these young people are creating their own brand of social consciousness.

Among the indicators:

Sixty-one percent of 13- to 25-year-olds feel personally responsible for making a difference in the world, suggests a survey of 1,800 young people to be released today. It says 81% have volunteered in the past year; 69% consider a company's social and environmental commitment when deciding where to shop; and 83% will trust a company more if it is socially and environmentally responsible. The online study — by two Boston-based companies, Cone Inc. and AMP Insights — suggests millennials are "the most socially conscious consumers to date."

·Young people want to help their country by working for the government, suggests another study, also to be released today by the international consulting firm Universum Communications. Based on responses of 10,847 undergraduates at 115 U.S. colleges and universities, it found that among ethnic groups in particular, federal jobs hold great allure. Among Hispanics, the CIA, the State Department and the FBI rank only below Walt Disney (the No. 1 choice) as an ideal employer. Among blacks, the FBI ranked second, the State Department fourth. The CIA rounded out the top 10.

·Two-thirds of college freshmen (66%) believe it's essential or very important to help others in difficulty, suggests a survey of 263,710 students at 385 U.S. colleges and universities. The 2005 report, by the Higher Education Research Institute at the University of California at Los Angeles, found feelings of social and civic responsibility among entering freshmen at the highest level in 25 years.

·Volunteerism by college students increased by 20% from 2002 to 2005, says a study released last week by the federal Corporation for National and Community Service.

Some note, though, that many high schools require volunteering, and it has become a must-do for the college résumé.

"Most research on volunteering doesn't translate to political involvement," says Curtis Gans of American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate. Many of their parents don't vote or are "civically illiterate," he says. He adds that measurable declines in civic education, newspaper reading and knowledge of current events are other signs of a devaluing of civic involvement.

Harvard public policy professor Robert Putnam, whose 2000 book Bowling Alone is about the decline of civic engagement and social connection, says volunteering is class-driven. "This whole recent spurt is largely concentrated among kids of the upper middle class. … The have-nots are actually more detached than before. I am hopeful that we may be on the cusp of a new more civically engaged America, but if that is all defined very sharply in terms of social class, then the news is not so good."

A report in September by the National Conference on Citizenship, and based on nationally representative data from 1975 to 2004, echoes Putnam's concerns. It suggests a "large and growing civic divide between those with a college education and those without one."

Voting is another concern. A survey of 650 young people ages 18-30 released last month by the non-partisan Young Voter Strategies, a non-profit project at George Washington University in Washington, D.C., found that 69% said they were likely to vote in November, and 80% said they were registered to vote. But another survey of 1,804 adults released last week by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press, in collaboration with the Associated Press, found that 40% of 18- to 29-year-olds are not registered to vote. That's double the percentage of 30- to 49-year-olds who aren't registered, and nearly three times greater than those 50 or older. Also, only 22% of young voters are regular voters compared with 42% of older voters and 35% of those 30 to 49.

Still, Putnam believes the terrorist attacks appear to have had a much more lasting effect on this generation's attitudes toward service. Though the surge in community-mindedness quickly evaporated for others, "for kids caught in their impressionable years by the events of 9/11, it has not yet gone away. They seem to have been permanently influenced."

Such students are those who come to Washington, D.C., for a semester at American University — dubbed the most politically active school in the Princeton Review's 2006 student survey.

DOJ_NMG_0085761

Senior Kirsten Reed, 20, a political science major at the University of Oregon in Eugene, wants to work for the federal government in national security. "I want to do something for the defense of the country," says Reed, of Pleasanton, Calif.

Brant Garda, a senior majoring in political science at Allegheny College in Meadville, Pa., wants to work with his state's struggling steel mining towns. "I want to be around to rejuvenate the area politically, economically or whatever," says Garda, 21, of Washington, Pa.

But not everyone in this generation shares such feelings, says a report released this month by the Center for Information & Research on Civic Learning & Engagement, based at the University of Maryland's School of Public Policy. The study of 1,658 young people, ages 15-25, measured their participation in 19 activities considered civic or political, such as being an active member of at least one group; raising money for charity; signing a paper petition or boycotting.

The study found that 58% of young people were considered "disengaged" because they participated in two or fewer of those 19 activities; 17% did none.

Elise Cochrane, 20, a junior majoring in psychology at the University of Northern Iowa in Cedar Falls, says she voted in the presidential election, but she is conflicted about voting in November. "The advertisements have been bashing each other so bad, none of the candidates seem to fit for me," she says. "I kind of wish I was more interested so I would know more of what was going on, but I'm not seriously interested in being a Republican or Democrat."

Because many millennials say they're not interested in politics, efforts are underway to encourage civic and political involvement.

A 2-year-old group called GenerationEngage is a non-partisan, youth civic engagement initiative aimed at college-age people who aren't students. It organizes events so that hundreds of young people can meet face-to-face and online with leaders and politicians, such as Al Gore and Newt Gingrich.

Those who aren't in school "don't suffer from a lack of interest; they suffer from a lack of access," says co-founder Adrian Talbot, 26.

A voter registration drive for 18- to 30-year-olds just wrapped up, and more than 400,000 young people registered.

The Cone study also found that young people are extending their social consciousness to the workplace. Of the 28% of ages 13 to 25 who are employed full time, 79% said they want to work for a company that cares about how it affects or contributes to society.

"If they're going to work many, many hours, they need to work in a place where they're doing some good," adds Claudia Tattanelli, CEO of Universum, which helps companies attract workers.

Although Wells is just a freshman, she is thinking ahead to her career. She hasn't yet selected a major, but she knows she wants her work to be meaningful.

"I want to major in something in international or humanitarian aid or in the environmental sciences," she says. "I want to do something that helps in a positive way."

First, Rename All The Lawyers (NYT)

By John Fabian Witt

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

IF a rose would smell as sweet by any other name, will trial lawyers smell better with a new one? That's the question posed by the impending self-reinvention of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America. After Election Day, the 65,000-member outfit whose lawyers brought us multibillion dollar settlements in cigarette cases, millions of asbestos injury claims and lawsuits over McDonald's coffee will change its name to the American Association for Justice.

There's already been much wry snickering about the organization's vaguely Orwellian new banner. But it's not the first time the kings of torts have changed their name, and it probably won't be the last. For a half-century now, trial lawyer identity crises have been exquisitely sensitive barometers of American politics.

In the late 1940's, a cadre of poorly paid and status-starved lawyers representing injured workers (the claimants) in the workers' compensation system banded together to form a lobby dedicated to the advancement of their own and their clients' interests. They called their group the National Association of Claimants' Compensation Attorneys.

That name worked for only a few short years. The problem was that the workers' compensation system was designed to streamline the resolution of worker injury cases by eliminating (or at least minimizing) lawyers' fees. Lawyers in the system therefore had little hope of gaining wealth or prestige. With the assistance of early association leaders like the flamboyant San Francisco lawyer Melvin Belli, the group's lawyers began to extend their expertise to personal injury cases in the courts, where the fees ran much higher and where their Perry Mason-like trial techniques might earn them a measure of respect.

In 1960, the association formalized its new outlook by changing its name to the National Association of Claimants' Counsel of America, a moniker that repositioned the group as one of lawyers for victims not just in the compensation system but also in the courts. Four years later, the organization renamed itself the American Trial Lawyers Association. By then its transformation was complete: the lawyers had left the compensation system behind altogether for the free-wheeling, high-risk and high-return world later made famous by Julia Roberts in "Erin Brockovich" and John Travolta in "A Civil Action."

But the 1964 name stuck for less than a decade. Another lawyer organization — the American College of Trial Lawyers — complained that the names were too similar. The defense lawyers in the college apparently worried that it would be tainted by nominal association with the lowly lawyers' group. In 1972, the American Trial Lawyers Association gave in to the litigation by the college and altered its name to the current (and now soon to be abandoned) Association of Trial Lawyers of America.

The trial lawyers' struggle for identity is a near-perfect parable for the course of American politics since the 1930's. In a political system long dominated by courts and political parties, Franklin Roosevelt and the New Dealers envisioned a new kind of federal government made up of administrative bureaucracies like workers' compensation, which would provide rationalized services to citizens.

After World War II, however, American politics slowly reverted to form: resistant to European-style public bureaucracy, shaped by powerful courts and the legal profession, and highly susceptible to the influence of interest groups and party politics.

As American politics has changed, so have the trial lawyers. They began as cogs in the wheels of the New Deal's bureaucratic machinery. They became legal entrepreneurs, identifying creative ways to produce higher awards for their clients in the courts and line their own pockets in the process. Thanks to mass torts cases arising out of things like cigarettes and asbestos, the association's membership includes some of the wealthiest lawyers in the country. And in the past two decades, the trial lawyers have become a crucial source of financial support for the Democratic Party.

The problem for the lawyers is that the genius of the tort system — its capacity to marshal the entrepreneurial energies of the bar — is also its greatest public relations liability. Indeed, whether trial lawyers are part of a distinctively American regulatory solution or part of a distinctively American problem, the new name seems unlikely to change the way Americans view them.

At KFC (né Kentucky Fried Chicken), the chicken is still fried. At Altria (né Philip Morris), the cigarettes still cause cancer. And at the American Association for Justice, some will say that the trial lawyers are still chasing ambulances.

U.N. Official Says Iran Is Testing New Enrichment Device (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 23 — The head of the International Atomic Energy Agency said Monday that Iran had begun testing new uranium enrichment equipment that could double the capacity of its small research-and-development facilities.

The action appears to be a signal to the United Nations Security Council that Iran would respond to sanctions by speeding ahead with its nuclear program.

Since February, when Iran publicly celebrated its first production of enriched uranium, progress at its main nuclear complex at Natanz has reportedly been slow. Iran has sporadically operated a single "cascade" of 164 centrifuges, the devices that spin at high speed and turn ordinary uranium into a fuel usable for nuclear power plants — or, at higher enrichment levels, nuclear weapons.

Those reports had prompted speculation that Iranian engineers had run into considerable technical difficulties.

But in an interview on Monday, Mohamed ElBaradei, the director general of the I.A.E.A., said that "based on our most recent inspections, the second centrifuge cascade is in place and ready to go." He said that no uranium had yet been entered into the new system, but could be as early as next week.

Even with two cascades running, it would take Iran years to enrich enough uranium to produce a single nuclear weapon.

The United States director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, has said repeatedly that he believes Tehran is 4 to 10 years away from developing a weapon, even though its technology base is far more advanced than that of North Korea, which conducted a nuclear test 15 days ago.

Unlike North Korea, Iran has insisted that it does not intend to build a weapon. Nonetheless, Iran ignored an Aug. 31 deadline, set by the Security Council, to stop enriching uranium.

Since then, European nations, China, Russia and the United States have been debating what sanctions, if any, should be imposed. China and Russia have resisted, and in a speech on Monday at Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service, Dr. ElBaradei made clear that he believes sanctions are unlikely to work.

"Penalizing them is not a solution," he said. "At the end of the day, we have to bite the bullet and talk to North Korea and Iran."

Unlike American officials, he says that he remains unpersuaded that Iran's ultimate goal is to build a weapon, though I.A.E.A. officials say they believe that Iran wants to have all of the major components of a weapon in hand so that it is clear that it could build one in weeks or months.

DOJ_NMG_0085763

"The jury is still out on whether they are developing a nuclear weapon," Dr. ElBaradei said at Georgetown, after meeting earlier in the day with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

After the meeting, Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said there was now "widespread agreement, although not total agreement," on elements of an initial sanctions package. He did not speculate about when the sanctions might come to a vote; at the end of the summer, administration officials insisted that the Security Council would act in September.

Mr. McCormack said the Iranians seemed to be moving ahead "inexorably at this point," so that at some point "you will have industrial-scale production."

"You don't want that," he said.

Some European diplomats have expressed concern that, should the Security Council act, the moderates in the Iranian government who have been involved in negotiations over the nuclear program could be shoved aside, and that some combination of military leaders and hard-line mullahs would push the country to speed its nuclear production.

IAEA Head: Iran Close To Enriching Uranium (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Iran has taken another step in its ability to enrich uranium, the head of the U.N. atomic energy agency confirmed yesterday, as the Bush administration and European allies failed to reach agreement on sanctions against Tehran's expanding nuclear program.

Mohamed ElBaradei, the director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said that Iranian technicians had pieced together a second line, or cascade, of 164 centrifuges and are days away from using the cascade to enrich uranium.

"It's in place and ready to go," ElBaradei said in a brief interview yesterday.

European officials suggested that the new cascade is a political move by Iranian officials who are hoping to send a defiant message to the U.N. Security Council as it weighs possible sanctions.

It would take many years for the Iranians to produce bomb-grade uranium using the other 164-centrifuge cascade it is currently operating, and U.S. intelligence officials think that Tehran is at least four years away from gaining the technical capability to produce enough nuclear material for a single weapon. Since February, Iran has produced minuscule amounts of low-enriched uranium suitable for the energy program that the government says it wants, and not for bombs. The same cascades, if run longer and more efficiently, can produce bomb-grade uranium.

The Bush administration has dismissed the energy claims and thinks Iran intends to use the program to secretly build nuclear weapons. ElBaradei's inspectors, on their fourth year investigating in Iran, reported earlier this year that they were unable to determine whether the Iranian program is peaceful.

The United States backed a package of European incentives designed to coax Iran into negotiations if it suspended the nuclear program during talks. When Tehran did not respond to the offer, the Security Council stepped in and passed a resolution in August obligating Iran to halt the program and negotiate. The council threatened to impose sanctions if Iran balked.

Iran has since said it wants talks with China, Europe, Russia and the United States but will not suspend its nuclear work in advance, arguing instead that it is exercising its right to peaceful nuclear technology. Iran signed on to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty in the 1960s, forswearing nuclear weapons for sensitive technology that could be used for an energy program.

Yesterday, U.S. diplomats met with British and French negotiators to try to complete a draft resolution on sanctions that the rest of the council members, including China and Russia, would approve. The Bush administration had hoped to reach an agreement last Friday, but European officials said they were not comfortable with some of the tougher measures that the United States sought to impose.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said there was "widespread agreement, although not total agreement," among Britain, France and the United States on sanctions. European officials said privately that the resolution is likely to be limited to a ban on any nuclear or missile trade with Iran, while carving out an exception for a preexisting Iranian-Russian nuclear deal.

Some U.S. officials have been pushing for broader action, including travel bans and financial restrictions on people connected to the nuclear program.

Iran began its program in secret in 1987, with equipment and know-how from Pakistan's top nuclear scientist. The existence of the program, which includes a large facility in the town of Natanz built to house thousands of centrifuges, was made public in 2002 by Iranian exiles who hope to overthrow the country's clerical regime. The Pakistani scientist, Abdul Qadeer Khan, remains under house arrest in Pakistan, but the Pakistani government has refused to let U.S. officials directly question him about Iran's program or other programs he supplied in North Korea and Libya.

DOJ_NMG_0085764

A senior Pakistani military official said yesterday that Khan responds to written U.S. requests for information as best he can. The Pakistani official, in Washington to lobby against a U.S. nuclear deal with rival India, said his country had put Khan and his black market network in the past and suggested it is time for the United States to also move beyond the episode.

Diplomats: Iran Expanding Enrichment (AP-Y)

By George Jahn

AP, October 24, 2006

Iran is expanding its uranium enrichment program even as the U.N. Security Council focuses on possible sanctions for its defiance of a demand to give up the activity and ease fears it seeks nuclear weapons, diplomats said Monday.

The diplomats, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to divulge the information to media, told The Associated Press that within the past few weeks Iranian nuclear experts had started up a second pilot enrichment facility.

While the 164 centrifuges were not producing enriched uranium, even the decision to "dry test" them showed Iran's defiance of the Security Council. The council had set an Aug. 31 deadline for Tehran to cease all experiments linked to enrichment. It may start full deliberations on sanctions as early as later this week.

Iran produced a small batch of low-enriched uranium — suitable as nuclear fuel but not weapons grade — in February, using its initial cascade of 164 centrifuges at its pilot plant at Natanz. The process of uranium enrichment can be used to generate electricity or to create an atomic weapon, depending on the level of enrichment.

Iran said it plans to install 3,000 centrifuges at its enrichment plant in Natanz, central Iran, by the end of this year. Industrial production of enriched uranium in Natanz would require 54,000 centrifuges.

Although it is nowhere near that goal, successful testing of other "cascades" would indicate that Tehran is slowly mastering the complexities of producing enriched uranium.

A U.N. official said that even a "dry-run" allows Tehran "to develop the technology, to make sure that things work."

Another U.N. official said Iran had the technical means to start the second cascade several months ago, but apparently had decided to wait until the recent collapse of EU attempts to revive negotiations on an enrichment freeze with the Islamic republic.

The International Atomic Energy Agency, which has taken the lead in probing Tehran's nuclear program since the existence of a clandestine enrichment program was revealed more than three years ago, could not be reached for comment and issued no official confirmation.

Ali Ashgar Soltanieh, the chief Iranian envoy to the IAEA, said he had no knowledge of "new developments" at Natanz. But he told the AP that all nuclear activities "are going on as planned."

In Tehran, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said his country's nuclear capability has increased tenfold despite Western pressure to roll back its atomic program, which Iran insists is peaceful.

"The enemies, resorting to propaganda, want to block us from achieving (nuclear technology)," Ahmadinejad told a crowd on the southern outskirts of Tehran. "But they should know that today, the capability of our nation has multiplied tenfold over the same period last year."

Ahmadinejad boasted that "the power of our enemies is less than one-tenth of their power in last year."

He did not elaborate, and the remarks appeared aimed primarily at rallying public support as the U.N. Security Council prepares to consider limited sanctions.

Iran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes. The United States and dozens of other countries fear, however, that it is secretly trying to make nuclear arms.

Ahmadinejad repeated that Iran was ready to negotiate about its nuclear ambitions. But the six nations that have spearheaded the most recent attempts to bring Iran to the negotiating table continue to call on Iran to first suspend enrichment.

The Islamic republic has turned down a package of incentives offered by those six world powers — the United States, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany — on condition that all enrichment activities cease.

The United States and its U.N. Security Council allies, Britain and France, have drafted a text that would impose limited sanctions on Iran for its defiance. But a U.N. diplomat told the AP that the text might have to be softened to enlist the support of Russia and China, which have veto power on the Security Council.

Both Moscow and Beijing are reluctant to impose harsh punishments on Tehran, an economic and strategic partner. They also fear that any sanctions — which for now rule out military action — could still start the process toward consideration of force.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said Monday he was hopeful talks with the Iranians would resume and that there was a "real chance" for a negotiated settlement without sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0085765

However, the European Union's external relations commissioner, Benita Ferrero-Waldner, said that Tehran had not responded positively to the incentives package and that the Security Council may need to explore "another alternative."

Ahmadinejad Does Europe (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

Whatever Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's other faults, lack of candor isn't one of them. This week the U.N. Security Council is set to begin discussing the imposition of (very) limited sanctions against Iran for refusing to halt uranium enrichment to build a nuclear weapon.

And so, with his usual sense of timing, the Iranian President issued the following public warning to Europe last Friday: "We have advised the Europeans that the Americans are far away, but you are the neighbors of the nations in this region. We inform you that the nations are like an ocean that is welling up, and if a storm begins, the dimensions will not stay limited to Palestine, and you may get hurt. It is in your own interest to distance yourself from these criminals (Israel). . . . This is an ultimatum."

China and Russia are the main opponents of tough sanctions for violating the U.N.'s August 31 enrichment deadline, but the Iranian must be thinking he can also shake the resolve of European leaders with a little fear of the Mahdi. Short of that, he might be hoping he can begin to intimidate European public opinion. Iran's ballistic missiles can already reach much of Europe, and his threat will be very real once those missiles can be armed with nuclear warheads.

The temptation in many quarters in the West is to assume that Crazy Mahmoud can't really mean what he says; he must be acting out for "domestic" political reasons. And even if he does mean what he says about wiping Israel off the map, well, Europeans and Americans don't need to worry about that. Call us conservative, or even neoconservative, but when a leader relentlessly seeking weapons of mass destruction starts issuing apocalyptic ultimatums, our instinct is to believe him.

Iranian Women Should Have More Children, Leader Says (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

TEHRAN, Oct. 23 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, reversing a policy in effect for almost two decades, is encouraging Iranian women to have more children in an effort to increase the country's population.

"They say two children are enough," he told Parliament on Sunday, newspapers reported. "I oppose this. I believe our country has a large capacity. It has a capacity even for 120 million people."

Iran's population is now nearly 70 million.

Mr. Ahmadinejad said his government was willing to reduce the hours women work based on the number of their children.

After the 1979 revolution and the war with Iraq that began in 1980, the government urged families to have more children. United Nations data show that Iran's population grew to 55 million in 1988, from 27 million in 1968.

But the rapid population increase was seen as an obstacle to development after the war ended in 1988, when the country had to deal with surging unemployment and a declining economy. The government set up free clinics around the country where people were offered free birth-control services and men were encouraged to have vasectomies.

Mr. Ahmadinejad said Sunday that he was in favor of women working outside their homes, but that he feared the burden of work would prevent them from "performing their most important duty: raising the children of the next generation."

"Some of our friends mentioned that we live at a sensitive time, but I want to add that humanity is living in a historical stage," he said, elaborating on why he wants to increase the population.

North Korea Said To Be Willing To Talk (AP)

By Jae-soon Chang, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 24, 2006

North Korea is amenable to returning to international nuclear talks if the U.S. shows a willingness to resolve a dispute over the North's alleged counterfeiting and money laundering, a South Korean lawmaker said Monday.

A Japanese legislator, meanwhile, said a top Chinese official who recently visited Pyongyang indicated China was not optimistic that North Korea will end its nuclear program or re-enter disarmament talks soon.

South Korean media reported late last week that North Korean leader Kim Jong Il expressed regret for carrying out the country's underground nuclear test on Oct. 9 and told a Chinese envoy that he didn't plan to carry out any more tests.

Kim also raised the possibility the country would return to arms talks, according to the reports, which cited unnamed diplomatic sources in China.

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice cast doubt on the reports, saying Chinese officials had told her no such thing.

DOJ_NMG_0085766

Beijing has remained silent, refusing to release any details on a trip by Chinese diplomats to Pyongyang last week, while North Korea has shown no public signs of being flexible by continuing its bellicose rhetoric aimed at the United States.

The developments demonstrate the uncertainty that has surrounded the nuclear standoff since the North's test, which prompted the U.N. Security Council to impose sanctions against Pyongyang.

The head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog, said the only real option for trying to curb North Korea's nuclear weapons program is to talk to the insular regime.

"I don't think sanctions work as a penalty," Mohamed ElBaradei said after meeting with Rice in Washington. "Penalizing them is not the solution."

In Seoul, Rep. Choi Sung of South Korea's ruling Uri Party said he met with a "key North Korean official" in Beijing for four hours Sunday night. He said the official is well-versed in China-North Korea relations and inter-Korean ties, but declined to identify him further.

After the meeting, Choi suggested the United States present the communist state with evidence of its alleged illicit financial activities so the North can punish those responsible.

He said the North Korean official said his country could then return to the talks "even if the issue is not completely resolved."

The U.S. has sought to cut off the North's access to international banking as punishment for alleged counterfeiting of U.S. dollars and other illicit activity. Pyongyang has denied the charges and boycotted six-nation talks on its nuclear program until the U.S. ends the crackdown.

Choi said the North Korean official told him that Pyongyang sees the financial crackdown as a sign that Washington has no intention of improving relations with the North. He added Washington has never presented evidence of the North's illicit activity.

The U.S. has said the financial restrictions are a separate issue from the nuclear standoff.

Japanese lawmaker Ichiro Aisawa, who visited Beijing on Monday to discuss the nuclear test with Chinese leaders, said he was told by Chinese Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawei that Beijing had asked both Pyongyang and Washington for flexibility in restarting talks.

However, he said Wu told him: "China is not optimistic about the resumption of the six-party talks or that North Korea will abandon its nuclear program," according to Kyodo news agency and public broadcaster NHK.

The Chinese Foreign Ministry could not confirm the reports.

Wu, who is Beijing's top nuclear envoy, accompanied China's State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan and Vice Foreign Minister Dai Bingguo on a special mission to Pyongyang last week to deliver a message to the North Korean leader from China's President Hu Jintao.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao did not discuss the details of the message, but said Kim and Tang had "in-depth discussions" about the nuclear dispute.

Head Of IAEA Urges U.S.-N. Korea Talks (AP-Y)

By Barry Schweid

AP, October 24, 2006

The only real option for trying to curb North Korea's nuclear weapons program is to talk to the insular regime, the head of the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency said Monday.

"I don't think sanctions work as a penalty," Mohamed ElBaradei said after a meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"They feel they are isolated; they feel they are not getting the security they need," said the Egyptian diplomat, who has run the U.N. agency for nearly a decade.

The U.N. Security Council, largely at the urging of the United States, has imposed controls on trade in dangerous goods with North Korea. Rice returned Sunday from a trip to Asia and Russia designed to encourage enforcement of the sanctions and to offer assurances of U.S. security support to anxious allies.

The export controls imposed by the U.N. Security Council "are not sufficient" to turn North Korea away from building nuclear weapons and other dangerous weapons, he said.

"Penalizing them is not the solution," he said.

ElBaradei's tenure as director general of the IAEA — during which he won the 2005 Nobel Peace Prize — was challenged unsuccessfully two years ago by the Bush administration, which clashed with him over his doubts that prewar Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction and also considers him too soft on Iran.

Rice made no public statement earlier in a picture-taking session with him in her office.

DOJ_NMG_0085767

ElBaradei said it did not matter whether the United States talks to North Korea in a six-nation negotiations format that has failed to deter a nuclear test, or one-on-one.

"At the end of the day, we have to bite the bullet and talk to North Korea and Iran," he said at Georgetown University's foreign service school.

The administration counters that it is willing to talk to North Korea in the six-nation framework, saying having other nations — China, Japan, South Korea and Russia — in the negotiations reinforces the anti-nuclear message.

A growing number of members of Congress and former high-level U.S. government officials are urging the Bush administration to open talks with both North Korea and Iran, which also has a nuclear program.

The administration has said it would consider talking to Iran if it suspended enrichment of uranium that the United States and European allies contend is part of a program to develop nuclear weapons. Iran says its programs are designed to increase civilian energy output.

ElBaradei said Iran has the knowledge to make nuclear weapons, but is years away from building them. "The jury is still out on whether they are developing a nuclear weapon," he said.

Meanwhile, in Vienna, Austria, diplomats speaking on condition of anonymity told The Associated Press on Monday that Iran is expanding its uranium enrichment program and that within the past few weeks Iranian nuclear experts had started up a second pilot enrichment facility. Iran had produced a small batch of low-enriched uranium — suitable as nuclear fuel but not weapons grade — in February.

Hong Kong Detains NKorean Cargo Ship As UN Sanctions Bite: Report (AFP)

AFP, October 24, 2006

Hong Kong has detained a North Korean cargo vessel for possible safety violations under UN sanctions slapped on the regime after Pyongyang's nuclear weapons test, a media report has said.

The rusting, 2,035-tonne general cargo vessel Kang Nam I was suspected of breaching 25 regulations after entering Hong Kong on Sunday, the South China Morning Post reported.

It said the vessel was not carrying any cargo when it arrived and had come to load up with scrap metal.

The newspaper cited Hong Kong's marine chief Roger Tupper as confirming the detention under the terms of the UN sanctions, which require ports to stop and search any North Korean vessels.

The clampdown was put in place to prevent the hardline Stalinist regime of Kim Jong-il from transferring or importing nuclear technology and to end the trade in contraband, usch as drugs and illicit cigarettes, that is believed to help fund the North's nuclear programme.

The Hong Kong government's Customs Department was yet to confirm the ship's detention.

Tupper was quoted as telling the Post that eight other North Korean ships had been similarly stopped this year.

"Hong Kong is a major hub port and North Korean vessels do sometimes visit," he said. "It is not unreasonable that they are subject to routine Port State Control inspections."

The report said the ship had arrived from Shanghai and was due to return home to Nampo, near Pyongyang, via Taiwan.

It said the captain, who would not give his name, had told reporters he was unaware of Pyonygang's first ever atom bomb test conducted October 9, nor of the subsequent UN sanctions.

The sanctions are part of a huge global diplomatic effort since the test to persuade North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons programme.

China Steps Up (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

Or does it? Two weeks after North Korea tested a nuclear device, that's still the question now that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has returned from her stop-the-nuclear-blackmail tour of Asian capitals.

As North Korea's biggest trading partner, the source of 80% to 90% of its fuel, and provider of significant food aid, China is the country with potentially the most influence over Kim Jong Il. President Hu Jintao's high-level personal envoy, dispatched to Pyongyang last week, by some accounts took Kim to the woodshed. Beijing is keeping mum about precisely what message State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan delivered to the North Korean leader, but one notable result is that Kim is no longer threatening to conduct a second nuclear test.

"I cannot conceive of even a short time ago China agreeing to call North Korea's behavior a threat to international peace and security," Ms. Rice told reporters after her stopover in Beijing. More to the point, the Journal reported Friday that Chinese banks are moving to halt transactions with North Korea. It cited officials at four commercial banks who said that they were ordered to shut off all business with North Korea. China is North Korea's major conduit for moving money in and out of the isolated country, so the banking cutoff should get Kim's attention.

Meanwhile, in South Korea, the other country with influence over the North, President Roh Moo Hyun's government continues down its appeasement path. The day after Ms. Rice urged officials in Seoul not to exclude the Kaesong industrial park from sanctions authorized by the U.N. Security Council, the chairman of Mr. Roh's Uri Party tripped off to Kaesong and was photographed dancing with a waitress.

Kaesong is home to factories run by 13 South Korean companies and, according to the latest government trade figures, the source of 23% of the South's trade with the North in the first eight months of this year. According to a Commerce Ministry report made public Sunday by a member of the opposition party and reported in the South Korean press, 60% of Kaesong workers' pay goes directly into the pockets of the Communist Korean Workers' Party. After insurance and other costs, workers like the waitress Mr. Roh's buddy was dancing with take home a mere $10 of their average monthly earnings of $57.50.

Both China and South Korea remain reluctant to enforce the U.N. resolution's demand for a halt to the North's trade in illicit materials, including drugs and counterfeit currency, not to mention weapons material and missile parts. China is balking at boarding North Korean ships at sea, and Seoul refuses to take part in the Proliferation Security Initiative, a coalition of about 70 countries that interdicts ships and planes carrying illegal cargo.

South Korea may be a hopeless cause -- at least until next year's presidential elections, when voters have an opportunity to elect a government that understands that Pyongyang is a greater threat to their security than is Washington.

China, however, is another story. There's much more it could do to show it's willing to join the rest of the world in being a "stakeholder" -- to borrow former Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick's useful word -- in promoting world security, but at least it's sounding serious. China's cooperation also shows that the six-party process could yet work. U.S. and Japanese pressure, along with Kim's recklessness, may be causing China to conclude that its self-interest lies with stopping him.

U.S.-South Korea Trade Talks Have Rocky Start (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

SEOGWIPO, South Korea -- The latest effort by the U.S. and South Korea to reach a free-trade agreement got off to a rocky start, with Washington saying talks might not conclude by a year-end target date.

The two sides opened their fourth round of negotiations since June on the southern island of Jeju, where thousands of demonstrators opposing free trade with the U.S. called for the talks to be scrapped.

Since announcing their intention to launch the negotiations in February, both sides have said they want to reach a basic agreement by the end of 2006. Whether that can happen is now in question.

"We are still trying to conclude this agreement by the end of this year or early next year," U.S. Assistant Trade Representative Wendy Cutler told reporters, suggesting the talks, which she acknowledged have been tough, may drag on.

The timetable is important because President Bush's legal authority to "fast track" a deal expires in mid-2007, and both the U.S. Congress and South Korea's National Assembly need time to debate and vote on any deal. Fast-tracking allows U.S. envoys to negotiate an agreement that can be submitted to Congress for a yes-or-no vote without amendments.

Washington is pushing South Korea to allow more access for American pharmaceuticals, automobiles and financial services such as insurance. Seoul wants South Korean goods made at the Kaesong industrial complex in North Korea included in the deal. The U.S. is strongly opposed to that.

Ms. Cutler said the U.S. position on Kaesong has been reinforced by recent developments on the Korean peninsula, referring to Pyongyang's recent claim to have carried out a nuclear test.

She said the U.S. made new offers calling for shorter time frames for tariff reductions covering nearly $1 billion in industrial goods, more than $1.3 billion in textiles, and $135 million in agricultural goods. Her South Korean counterpart, trade diplomat Kim Jong Hoon, said the U.S. offer on industrial products was insufficient.

"While the U.S. presented an improved tariff concession offer on industrial goods, it still fell significantly short of our expectations," he told reporters, according to South Korea's Yonhap news agency.

The negotiations, scheduled through Friday, brought a variety of demonstrators to Jeju. Police estimated about 11,000 people took part in a protest at the island's convention center, about three kilometers from the hotel venue for the talks.

Nuclear Program Oversight Increased (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0085769

Pakistan has adopted a vast system of checks and balances in its military nuclear program to prevent nonproliferation abuses such as the nuclear black market run by top scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan, a senior Pakistani military official said yesterday.

The official, in an unusually detailed background briefing for reporters at the Pakistani Embassy, also warned that the proposed U.S.-India nuclear-cooperation pact was a "one-sided deal" that could prove "counterproductive for U.S. strategic objectives" in South Asia if Islamabad was not offered a similar deal.

The Pakistani military official, who has extensive familiarity with the country's nuclear bureaucracy, could not be quoted by name under the ground rules of the briefing.

But the session reflected Pakistani concerns that its nuclear-proliferation failings were in the spotlight again after this month's nuclear test by North Korea.

The network run by Mr. Khan, still a revered figure in Pakistan for his role in developing the country's nuclear arsenal, "cast a long shadow over Pakistan's image," the official said. "We have years of baggage to shed."

Mr. Khan, who is under house arrest, traveled to Pyongyang often before his nuclear-smuggling ring was exposed in 2003. His network is thought to have provided North Korea with designs, parts, and working models of centrifuges needed to manufacture nuclear fuel. The Pakistani researcher also provided centrifuges for Iran's clandestine nuclear programs.

Many nonproliferation specialists fear that Pakistan is the world's greatest cause for worry, with the government of President Pervez Musharraf facing challenges from within and without.

But the Pakistani military official said that nearly a decade ago, the country began a thorough revamping of its nuclear bureaucracy, increasing the levels of oversight, implementing new controls on the production and transfer of nuclear materials and establishing "reliability tests" for Pakistani nuclear researchers.

He confirmed that U.S. nuclear specialists had been providing technical advice and some "off-the-shelf" basic equipment to aid Pakistan's nonproliferation efforts, but stressed that Pakistan had total say over what help it accepts.

"We have a good system now down to the grass roots," he insisted.

Islamabad still prevents investigators from the U.S. and the United Nations from directly interviewing Mr. Khan about his nuclear dealings, and the official said Mr. Khan remains "a hero" to Pakistanis.

The official said he saw little hope of derailing the U.S. nuclear deal with rival India.

The accord, strongly backed by the Bush administration and being considered by Congress, would open up major cooperation and trade between the United States and India on civilian nuclear projects, while allowing India to keep its nuclear military programs free from international monitoring. Pakistan and many U.S. critics fear the deal could allow India to bulk up its own nuclear arsenal and overwhelm Pakistan's smaller deterrent.

The official said the United States should make it clear that Pakistan would be eligible for a similar nuclear-cooperation deal in the future.

U.N. Says Human Rights Violators Cite U.S. (WP/AP)

By Nick Wadhams

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 23 -- Several governments around the world have tried to rebut criticism of how they handle detainees by claiming they are only following the U.S. example in fighting terrorism, the U.N. special rapporteur on torture said Monday.

Manfred Nowak said that when he criticizes governments for their questionable treatment of detainees, they respond by telling him that if the United States does something, it must be all right. He would not name any countries except Jordan.

"The United States has been the pioneer . . . of human rights and is a country that has a high reputation in the world," Nowak said at a news conference. "Today, many other governments are kind of saying: 'But why are you criticizing us? We are not doing something different than what the United States is doing.' "

Nowak said that because of its prominence, the United States has a greater responsibility to uphold international standards for its prisoners.

State Department spokesman Kurtis Cooper said Monday night that he had not seen Nowak's comments and had no response.

Nowak has chastised the United States over detainee policy and for maintaining secret prisons.

Nonetheless, he said, the United States had improved its handling of detainees, particularly in Iraq after the Abu Ghraib scandal. Nowak said the big problem in Iraq now is allegations of detainee torture by militias and the country's Interior Ministry.

He said detainees were afraid of being transferred from the control of multinational forces to Iraqi prisons.

"They would prefer, if they are in detention now, to be in the international detention facilities rather than the Iraqi detention facilities," Nowak said.

Press Freedom Erodes In U.S., Report Says (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Some poor countries, such as Mauritania and Haiti, improved their record in a global press freedom index this year, while France, the United States and Japan slipped further down the scale of 168 countries rated, the group Reporters Without Borders said yesterday.

The news media advocacy organization said the most repressive countries in terms of journalistic freedom -- such as North Korea, Cuba, Burma and China -- made no advances at all.

The organization's fifth annual Worldwide Press Freedom Index tracks actions against news media through the end of September. The group noted its concern over the declining rankings of some Western democracies as well as the persistence of other countries in imposing harsh punishments on media that criticize political leaders.

"Unfortunately nothing has changed in the countries that are the worst predators of press freedom, and journalists in North Korea, Eritrea, Turkmenistan, Cuba, Burma and China are still risking their life or imprisonment for trying to keep us informed," the organization said in a news release.

Iran ranks 162nd, between Saudi Arabia and China. The report said conditions in Russia and Belarus have not improved. It said that Russia continued to steadily dismantle the independent media and that the recent slaying of investigative journalist Anna Politkovskaya "is a poor omen for the coming year."

Northern European countries top the index, with no reported censorship, threats, intimidation or physical reprisals, either by officials or the public, in Finland, Ireland, Iceland and the Netherlands. All of those countries were ranked in first place.

Serious threats against the artists and publishers of the Muhammad cartoons, which caricatured the prophet of Islam, caused Denmark, which was also in first place last year, to drop to 19th place. Yemen, at 149th place, slipped four places, mostly because of the arrests of journalists and the closure of newspapers that reprinted the cartoons. Journalists in Algeria, Jordan, Indonesia and India were harassed because of the cartoons as well.

Although it ranked 17th on the first list, published in 2002, the United States now stands at 53, having fallen nine places since last year.

"Relations between the media and the Bush administration sharply deteriorated after the president used the pretext of 'national security' to regard as suspicious any journalist who questioned his 'war on terrorism,' " the group said.

"The zeal of federal courts which, unlike those in 33 U.S. states, refuse to recognize the media's right not to reveal its sources, even threatens journalists whose investigations have no connection at all with terrorism," the group said.

Lucie Morillon, the organization's Washington representative, said the index is based on responses to 50 questions about press freedom asked of journalists, free press organizations, researchers, human rights activists and others.

France, 35th, dropped five places since last year because of searches of media offices and journalists' homes, as well as physical attacks on journalists during a trade union dispute, the group said.

In Lebanon, a series of bomb attacks targeting journalists and publishers in 2005, and Israeli military attacks last summer, contributed to a drop in the country's ranking from 56th to 107th in the past four years.

Israeli Premier Reaches Out To Far Right (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 23 — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel reached a deal on Monday to broaden his shaky coalition by adding a far-right party that seeks to annex parts of the West Bank and to eventually reduce Israel's Arab population.

Mr. Olmert's coalition has been struggling for months, and the latest move was seen as an attempt to stabilize the faltering government. But the new right-wing partner — Israel Beiteinu, or Israel Is Our Home — strongly opposes concessions to the Palestinians.

The prime minister's decision signals that he is now more concerned with internal Israeli politics than with initiatives to deal with the Palestinians.

The prime minister has already indicated that the central theme of his election campaign, a withdrawal from some Jewish settlements in the West Bank, has been put on indefinite hold. The latest development further reinforces that notion.

Also on Monday, Israeli forces killed six Palestinians, at least three of them militants, in clashes in the northern Gaza Strip, Palestinian medical workers said. The area has been the scene of repeated fighting in recent months.

DOJ_NMG_0085771

Mr. Olmert overrode opposition from some liberal members of his coalition to bring in Israel Beiteinu, a party led by Avigdor Lieberman, 48, a Soviet immigrant who advocates annexing Jewish settlements in the West Bank and transferring most Arab citizens of Israel to a future Palestinian state.

The prime minister said he planned to make Mr. Lieberman a deputy prime minister responsible for "strategic threats" against Israel, a portfolio that would include monitoring Iran, which Israel regards as its most dangerous enemy.

The alliance agreed to by Mr. Olmert and Mr. Lieberman was expected to be formalized with cabinet and parliamentary approval in the next several days, though it could still face some opposition, particularly from the left-leaning Labor Party. Mr. Lieberman reaffirmed his opposition to territorial concessions, saying that the right has been in power for most of the past three decades in Israel, but, "We were unable to prevent withdrawals."

Mr. Olmert's centrist Kadima Party was elected just seven months ago. His center-left coalition government has not only been reeling since the summer's inconclusive war against Hezbollah in Lebanon, but also cannot point to any significant achievements.

In announcing the deal with Mr. Lieberman, the prime minister noted that since Israel was founded in 1948, it has had 31 governments.

"In other words, the average term of office for an Israeli government has, for a very long time, been less than two years," Mr. Olmert said. "Is this reasonable? Is this evidence of stability? Does it promise continuity?"

While the existing coalition was not in imminent danger of collapse, it would be tested in coming months on issues like the approval of the 2007 budget. Budget deliberations have led to coalition breakups in the past.

Mr. Olmert's coalition has consisted recently of four parties that hold 67 of the 120 seats in Parliament. While this provides a working majority, it would evaporate if any of the coalition partners left, something that happens with regularity in Israel's volatile politics.

Mr. Lieberman's party holds 11 seats, which would give the governing coalition 78 seats, or nearly two-thirds of the Parliament. By bringing a far-right party on board, Mr. Olmert also hopes to neutralize the other right-wing factions that account for much of the opposition in Parliament.

However, the expansion also means that Mr. Olmert's new government would span the ideological spectrum, including liberal, centrist, right-wing and religious parties. With such divergent factions in the government, Mr. Olmert would have little or no chance of building consensus about political solutions to the continuing struggles with the Palestinians.

The left-leaning Labor Party has expressed the strongest opposition to Israel Beiteinu's inclusion in the coalition.

Shelly Yacimovich, a Labor Party legislator, said her party joined the government based on "the desire for a peace process, the desire for a social-democratic agenda and for a friendly and egalitarian relationship with Arab Israelis." Mr. Lieberman, she said, "represents the complete opposite of all these things."

But Isaac Herzog, a Labor lawmaker who serves in the cabinet, told Israel Radio that his party had "no choice but to remain in the government, because you have to allow government stability."

In 2004, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon dismissed Mr. Lieberman from his post as transportation minister because he strongly opposed Mr. Sharon's plan to withdraw Israeli soldiers and settlers from Gaza.

The burly Mr. Lieberman immigrated from Moldova in 1978 and was first elected to Parliament in 1999.

His party draws support from the Soviet immigrants who account for roughly one million of Israel's seven million people, and it made a strong showing in the elections in March.

In recent weeks, Mr. Lieberman has pushed a proposal that would change Israel's government from a parliamentary system to a presidential system, similar to that of the United States.

In the Gaza violence on Monday, Israeli forces waged a gun battle with a group of armed Palestinians and killed six, including a man the Israeli military said was Ata Shinbari, a leader of the Popular Resistance Committees, a group responsible for much of the recent rocket fire out of northern Gaza.

Mr. Shinbari was among five men in his family in their late teens or 20's who were killed in the gun battle, in the town of Beit Hanun, according to Palestinian medical workers. Several Palestinians were also wounded.

At Least Six Palestinians Die In Clashes With Israel (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 23 -- At least six Palestinians died Monday in clashes between Israeli forces and Palestinian gunmen in the Gaza Strip, part of an escalating operation there to stop rocket fire into southern Israel and smuggling across its borders. One of those killed was a high-ranking Palestinian militia commander, Israeli and Palestinian officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0085772

Twenty other Palestinians were wounded in fighting that unfolded between the northern Gaza villages of Beit Hanoun and Beit Lahiya, the prime launching ground for crude Palestinian rockets that frequently strike Israeli communities in the south but rarely kill anyone. One of the wounded was close to death, Palestinian hospital officials said.

Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas called the event "a loathsome massacre carried out on, of all days, the first day of Eid al-Fitr," the Muslim feast celebrating the end of the fasting season of Ramadan. Israeli officials have noted that Palestinian rockets fell inside Israel this month during Yom Kippur, the holiest Jewish holiday.

More than 200 Palestinians, many of them civilians, have died in the Israeli military operation in Gaza that began June 25 after the capture of an Israeli soldier by gunmen from several armed groups including the military wing of the governing Hamas movement. Israeli armor and infantry have entered and withdrawn from the strip for months.

But in recent days, tanks and soldiers have taken up and held positions along the southern frontier with Egypt, a prime arms-smuggling route, and in northern Gaza, to combat the near-daily rocket attacks. Israeli political leaders have warned of a broader assault in the weeks ahead.

There were divergent accounts of the circumstances surrounding the fighting Monday and of how many of those who died were armed. One of those killed was Atta al-Shinbari, 35, a senior commander of the radical Popular Resistance Committees responsible for much of the rocket fire into Israel. At least three others were male relatives of Shinbari, including his 40-year-old brother, Khalid. Palestinian witnesses said the men were not affiliated with any armed factions.

One of the other dead was identified as Rami Hamdan, 23, a member of the radical Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

Palestinian witnesses said Shinbari was visiting the home of his sister in Beit Lahiya on the first day of Eid al-Fitr, when it is customary to mourn family members who have died in the previous year. A mourning tent was set up outside the home.

The witnesses said a car carrying Israeli soldiers, apparently disguised as Palestinians, opened fire on Shinbari as he approached the house. The ensuing gunfight lasted for hours.

Israeli military officials said soldiers opened fire only after a group of Palestinian gunmen began shooting at them. Officials said the soldiers reported hitting 10 gunmen in what one of them described as a "heavy exchange of fire."

In another development, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert expanded his governing coalition Monday by adding Israel Is Our Home, a party dominated by immigrants from the former Soviet Union that is one of the most hawkish in Israel's 120-seat parliament, the Knesset.

Down in the polls following the summer war in Lebanon, Olmert is seeking new members for his government in anticipation of a contentious budget season. By adding Israel Is Our Home, Olmert improves his control of the Knesset from 67 to 78 seats, among the broadest in recent times.

The agreement gives a cabinet seat to Avigdor Lieberman, an immigrant from Moldova who worked his way into the highest ranks of Israeli politics from an early job as an El Al Airlines baggage handler. Lieberman, 48, will hold the title of deputy prime minister charged with managing the threat posed to Israel by Iran, which many nations fear is developing nuclear weapons.

Lieberman's signature proposal is to redraw Israel's recognized international border in a way that would place roughly 150,000 Arab citizens of Israel in the West Bank, annexing the largest Jewish settlement blocs there in return. The move, roundly denounced by other Zionist parties, would strengthen the state's Jewish majority by stripping those Arabs of Israeli citizenship.

Lieberman is also pushing legislation to create a U.S.-style presidential system in Israel by allowing direct elections for the prime minister, who is now effectively chosen by parliament. Israel's system is notoriously fractious, leading to governments with little room to maneuver on big issues and short political lives. The bill, narrowly endorsed by Olmert's cabinet this week, has little chance of passing the Knesset. Olmert himself opposes the measure in its current form.

Fallout Of Hamas's Rule Spurs Palestinian Desire To Flee (CSM)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Christian Science Monitor, October 24, 2006

BIRZEIT, WEST BANK

Ahmed Hushiyeh holds degrees in political science and communications, and dreams of becoming a photojournalist. But after a futile search for a job, the young Palestinian works as a janitor at his alma mater, Birzeit University.

He is saving money in the hopes of moving to Europe, enrolling in another university, and finding work. Political paralysis during Hamas's brief tenure leading the Palestinian government and escalating violence between rival security forces has convinced Mr. Hushiyeh that his career path lies abroad.

"I am not optimistic. The situation is only deteriorating. Maybe outside, the opportunities are much better," he says. "Every young man wishes to have a job and have a life. But when he sees what we have here: occupation, siege, a low standard of living, security crisis - all of this creates a desire to leave. I want to get out of this crisis."

Like Hushiyeh, a growing number of Palestinians are openly saying they'd like to leave the West Bank and Gaza if given the chance, raising concern about the possibility of a Palestinian brain drain. The sentiment, which flouts the long-held Palestinian belief that Israeli occupation can only be resisted by staying put, is yet another indication of the deepening despair since Hamas was elected to run the government.

This desire to flee also comes amid ongoing violence in the Gaza Strip. On Monday, Israeli troops killed at least seven Palestinians in one of the deadliest days of fighting following the June 25 capture of an Israeli soldier.

Birzeit University pollster Nader Said, who has monitored emigration attitudes for 12 years, says the percentage of Palestinians willing to relocate once hovered just below 20 percent. When that figure jumped to 32 percent in a September survey, Mr. Said says he was shocked.

The catalyst, the pollster says, has been Palestinian disillusionment following Hamas's half-year in government. "What the Israelis were unable to do - try to push the Palestinian out of the country - the internal strife is achieving," he says.

Even more telling, adds Said, is that the percentage surges to 44 percent among Palestinians in their 20s and 30s. Among young men, it surges beyond 50 percent.

Malik Shawwa, a consultant specializing in obtaining Canadian visas, says his workload has jumped by two-thirds over the past seven months as more Palestinians ask about leaving. "This is the most important subject in the Palestinian territories," he says. "It's not just a matter of a lack of jobs. It's the situation. They're not secure. They don't trust the government."

Among Palestinians, the mere mention of hijra - Arabic for emigration - is enough to stir up painful memories of the 1948 Arab-Israeli war that left hundreds of thousands of Palestinians stranded outside the newly independent Israeli state.

"Emigration means that you are escaping the occupation and that you don't want to liberate your land. It's a shame on you," says Abdel Nasser Najjar, a columnist for the Palestinian daily Al Ayyam. "Now it's different. There are many pressures: economic pressure and psychological pressure. Many people are speaking out."

Riad Malki, the director of Panorama, a Ramallah nonprofit that promotes democracy in the West Bank and Gaza, confesses that he is giving more thought to the idea of relocating. But the broader trend of an exodus by the middle class and young males stirs up fear that Palestinian society may be stripped of its next generation.

"We are going to lose the dynamo of the Palestinian state," he says. "If we lose them how will we set up the offices of Palestine?"

But there are no signs that a critical mass of Palestinians is leaving just yet. The distance between pondering a move and acting on it remains considerable because of the hurdles in establishing residency in a new country. "For the most part, it's a very loud protest statement against the political actors," says Said. "Palestinians have given [Hamas and Fatah] an opportunity to deliver."

And yet, there is evidence that Palestinians are acting on this sentiment. The Ramallah branch of Mr. Shawwa's visa consultancy gets 30 calls a day while the Gaza city office fields 10, he says. Though only a fraction qualify to apply for a Canadian visa, Shawwa says, Palestinians are nonetheless desperate to leave.

"They come to me and cry," he says. "We are doing a much better service for the Palestinian people than the people who are fighting. We are saving a lot of young people from being destroyed."

Back on the Birzeit University campus, a trio of students admitted that the topic of emigration remains sensitive among family and friends. But at the same time they reject the suggestion that moving abroad constitutes any betrayal.

"If I leave then I'll be lucky," says Birzeit law student Masaad Masaad, who hopes to move after graduating and a two-year internship. "The country hasn't provided anything for me. The government has failed ... No attention is given to the citizens."

Three Ways To War In Gaza (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

Wonder where and when the next Middle East war is going to take place? The likeliest answer is the Gaza Strip, perhaps before the year is out. Who will fight it? Now there is an interesting question.

Three sets of circumstances are operating simultaneously in this tiny patch of Palestinian land -- not quite the size of Andorra but 20 times as populous -- each of which has the potential to produce a different kind of violent outcome. First circumstance: the escalating factional fighting, verging on civil war, between Hamas forces loyal to Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh and Fatah forces associated, albeit sometimes loosely, with President Mahmoud Abbas.

DOJ_NMG_0085774

On Friday, relatives of a Fatah man recently killed by Hamas opened fire on Mr. Haniyeh's convoy in Gaza; Fatah militiamen have also threatened to assassinate the entire Hamas cabinet. Hamas, for its part, recently assassinated top Fatah militiaman Mohammed Shahadeh and intelligence officer Jad Tayah. Earlier this month, Hamas security forces opened fire on Fatah-affiliated policemen who had raided the Gaza branch of the Bank of Palestine in protest of their unpaid salaries. At least 10 people died; Fatah's Al-Hayat al-Jadeeda newspaper called Hamas's actions "Sedition" in banner headlines. Mr. Abbas is considering dissolving the government and moving to new elections; Hamas Interior Minister Said Siam deems the idea a "coup."

For some time, Israeli policy makers have been looking at the domestic Palestinian situation with a sense of satisfaction -- somewhat akin to the American view of the mutual slaughter of Iraqis and Iranians during the 1980s. But that was before the June kidnapping of Israeli Corporal Gilad Shalit transformed Gaza's domestic crisis into an Israeli one. It was also before the summer's war with Hezbollah, which alerted Israelis that their borders were less secure than previously thought. Hence the second circumstance: the consolidation of Gaza, following Israel's full withdrawal in August 2005, into a terrorist fortress.

Last week, Egyptian police in the Sinai intercepted a shipment of 200 crates of guns and ammunition headed for the town of Rafah, which straddles the seven-mile Egyptian-Palestinian border. Also last week, the Israeli army (IDF) discovered 13 smuggling tunnels running under the border in addition to the 12 discovered since June. Israeli intelligence estimates that in the past year at least 19 tons of explosives have been smuggled through these tunnels into Gaza, plus some 15,000 Kalashnikov rifles, 1,000 RPGs, and quantities of Katyusha rockets, Strella anti-aircraft missiles and Russian-made Kornet and Metis antitank missiles.

All this is in addition to an indigenous Gazan military industry that produced the hundreds of short-range Kassam rockets that have rained continuously on southern Israel for two years. And it explains why Israeli military planners feel they need to deal Gaza a punishing blow sooner rather than later, when the Palestinians might be in a position to bloody Israel the way Hezbollah did last summer. "We are going to make a massive ground operation in Gaza," warns Yuval Steinitz, until recently chairman of the Knesset's Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee, in a recent interview. Underlying the remark is the sense that the IDF will not allow itself to be surprised again by events, much less humiliated twice by ostensibly weaker foes.

Mr. Steinitz points an accusing finger at Egypt, which agreed last year to step up its efforts to stop the weapons smuggling in exchange for Israel abandoning its aggressive border patrols along the so-called Philadelphi Corridor. "The Egyptians are violating and betraying all the agreements," he says. "They are doing to us what Syria is doing to the U.S. in Iraq. . . . Their real policy is to let Israelis and Palestinians bleed together."

Talk to the Egyptians, however, and you get a different story. In public, the Egyptians generally neither acknowledge nor deny that they are letting the smuggling happen: Acknowledgment risks alienating the U.S. while denial risks enraging their own public opinion. In private, however, Egyptians admit that they condone and perhaps even participate in the smuggling, but only to arm and strengthen Fatah. The arms to Hamas are being shipped, supposedly against Egypt's wishes, from Iran via Syria and Hezbollah.

Here, then, is the third circumstance: The rise of Hamas, with ties to Iran and potentially a secure territorial base of its own, is an even greater long-term threat to the brittle regime of Hosni Mubarak than it is to Israel.

Consider the Kabuki dance being played around the fate of Cpl. Shalit. The Egyptians have been negotiating his release for months, probably in good faith: They fear that indefinite detention might lead to a full-scale Israeli invasion of Gaza, which would have spillover effects in the Sinai. At the same time, Mr. Mubarak has been ratcheting up the repression of the Muslim Brotherhood, Hamas's sister organization in Egypt, by canceling elections the Brotherhood seemed likely to win and tinkering with the election law to further shut it out of the political process. Poor 19-year-old Cpl. Shalit is being played by Hamas as a card in two separate games: with the Israelis for the release of Palestinian prisoners and with the Egyptians for political concessions in Cairo.

The political heat between the two sides was noticeably raised last week when Hamas Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar reportedly warned Egypt that if it failed to open its border with Gaza "there will be no border." Equally extraordinary was that the statement was widely reprinted in the Egyptian state media, playing into the broad suspicion that the Brotherhood, as a religious organization, is fundamentally anti-Egypt in the national sense. "Now the line is, 'No more foreign ministry,'" says an Egyptian source, suggesting the Mubarak regime is quickly moving away from diplomacy to more aggressive forms of persuasion with Hamas.

If Egypt or Israel had the luxury of choice they would abandon Gaza to its own miserable devices, or -- even better -- to each other. But that's not how it works in the Middle East. The war for Gaza is coming, no matter who does the fighting. Whoever stays out of it wins.

War In Sudan? Not Where The Oil Wealth Flows (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

DOJ_NMG_0085775

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

KHARTOUM, Sudan, Oct. 20 — To understand Sudan's defiance toward the world, especially the Western world, check out the Ozone Café.

Here young, rich Sudanese, wearing ripped jeans and fancy gym shoes, sit outside licking scoops of ice cream as an outdoor air-conditioning system sprays a cooling veil of mist. Around the corner is a new BMW dealership unloading $165,000 cars.

"I tell people you only live this life once," said Nada Gerais, a saleswoman.

While one of the world's worst humanitarian crises continues some 600 miles away in Darfur, across Khartoum bridges are being built, office towers are popping up, supermarkets are opening and flatbed trucks hauling plasma TV's fight their way through thickening traffic.

Despite the image of Sudan as a land of cracked earth and starving people, the economy is booming, with little help from the West. Oil has turned it into one of the fastest growing economies in Africa — if not the world — emboldening the nation's already belligerent government and giving it the wherewithal to resist Western demands to end the conflict in Darfur.

American sanctions have kept many companies from Europe and the United States out of Sudan, but firms from China, Malaysia, India, Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates are racing in. Direct foreign investment has shot up to $2.3 billion this year, from $128 million in 2000, all while the American government has tried to tighten the screws.

"Khartoum is hot — in all ways," said Hashim Wahir, chairman of Petronas Sudan, a branch of the Malaysian national oil company.

It was 115 degrees outside, but Mr. Wahir was also talking about business.

As long as Asian countries are eager to trade with Sudan, despite its human rights record, the American embargo seems to have minimal effect. The country's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, keeps demonstrating his disdain for the West by refusing to allow United Nations peacekeepers into Darfur, despite continued bloodshed and pressure from the United States to let the peacekeepers in.

"The government knows it doesn't need America," said Abda Yahia el-Mahdi, a former finance minister, now in private consulting. "The only people who are being hurt by the sanctions are the Americans, who are missing out on this huge boom."

The wealth is hardly evenly shared, and much of Sudan, like Darfur, remains desperately poor. Indeed, the nation's per capita income was only $640 in 2005, at market exchange rates, according to the World Bank.

But the country's G.D.P. grew 8 percent in 2005, according to the International Monetary Fund, and is predicted to increase by 12 percent this year. Cotton and other agricultural products have traditionally been the engines of the economy here, but the new growth comes largely because Sudan has substantially increased its crude oil production to 512,000 barrels a day — a drop compared with Saudi Arabia's or Iran's, but enough to bring billions of dollars to a country that until recently was one of the poorest on earth.

"Oil and real estate investment, primarily in urban areas, is really what's driving the economy," said Michael Kevane, an associate professor of economics at Santa Clara University. "There's no doubt about that."

The boom is also strengthening the government's hand at home. Over the past few years, Mr. Bashir has been on an infrastructure binge, pouring hundreds of millions of dollars into roads, bridges, power plants, hospitals and schools, projects that tend to boost any government's popularity. Mr. Bashir seems to desperately need it, with many people across the country, not just in Darfur, openly rebelling against his rule.

Mr. Bashir, an army general, seized power in 1989 through a military coup, and among the biggest beneficiaries of these boom times have been his troops. Ms. Mahdi said more than 70 percent of the government's share of oil profits is spent on defense. A government priority is to manufacture guns and ammunition domestically, in case external supplies are cut off.

Despite all the new materialism, Sudan still marches to a martial tune. Army officers enjoy special status, foreign visitors must register with the police and schoolchildren are required to wear camouflage uniforms to class. But the boom is changing much about society, from the careers people pursue, to the music they listen to, even what they eat.

The traditional meal of ful, a bean stew eaten for breakfast and lunch, is giving way to kebabs, yogurt, hamburgers and hot dogs.

"We even have Pringles," said Mohammed Abdelwahab Salih, a 26-year-old entrepreneur who recently started a business in Khartoum designing Web sites.

Mr. Salih remembers the days, not so long ago, when he used to have to wait in line for hours for a single loaf of bread.

"And it wasn't even good bread," he said. "When we got home, we had to pick out the flies."

For years, the Sudanese economy was a disaster, with triple-digit inflation, moribund industries and war. Ever since Sudan's independence in 1956, Christian and animist tribes in the south have rebelled against Muslim rulers in the north.

DOJ_NMG_0085776

Oil had been discovered here by Chevron in the 1970's, but the oil fields straddled the north-south divide and were essentially unworkable while the fighting was going on.

The American government imposed a trade embargo in 1997, freezing Sudanese government assets in the United States and cutting off its exports to and imports from Sudan, with a few exceptions. The reason: human rights abuses connected to the north-south war and Sudan's links to terrorists. Osama bin Laden lived in Khartoum in the 1990's.

But by 1999, when the first trickle of oil began to flow out of Port Sudan, on the Red Sea, Sudan's economy was turning around. A small cadre of Western-educated technocrats had followed the I.M.F.'s reform programs to the letter — cutting spending, privatizing state-owned businesses, lowering inflation and pushing infrastructure.

"It was classic, conservative economic policies," said Safwat Fanous, chairman of the political science department at the University of Khartoum. "And it worked."

Even World Bank economists have been impressed.

"These are very good people managing the economy and would rate among the best anywhere in Africa," said Asif Faiz, country manager for the World Bank in Sudan.

But, he added, they need to do more to spread the wealth to rural areas and focus on the poor.

Sudanese living abroad began to drift back, drawn by new opportunities — and other realities.

"If you want to open a bank account in America these days, it's not difficult, it's impossible," said Ahmed Amin Abdellatif, a 33-year-old Cambridge-educated businessman who drives a Porsche SUV through the dusty streets of Khartoum and runs an empire of electronics shops. He argued that antiterrorism laws in the West had made it very difficult for him as a Sudanese citizen to do business. "Why go through the headache?" he added. "Why not put your money somewhere where it's welcome?"

In 2002, Sudanese investors opened a new Coca-Cola factory, with Coke syrup legally exported to Sudan under an exemption for food and medicine. The $140-million plant churns out 100,000 bottles of Coke, Sprite and Fanta per hour, and factory owners have even adopted liberal employment policies, giving jobs to deaf women along the assembly line.

All this new investment is literally redrawing Khartoum's skyline. Four years ago, the Libyan government began building a 24-story, five-star hotel on the banks of the Nile. The hotel is nearly finished and boasts a level of luxury unknown in Sudan until now — it has an indoor pool, squash courts, an espresso bar and spa.

In 2004, the first proper mall arrived in Khartoum, brought by a Turkish company, complete with a Wal-Mart-size megastore called the Hypermarket. It is place where men in white robes and women covered in black head to toe pluck toilet paper, dates and Pepsi from the shelves as Sudanese elevator music plays in the background.

In 2005, many people here hoped the American sanctions would be lifted and the economy would hit warp speed after Sudan's leaders, coaxed by American mediators, made peace with southern rebels. But by that point the conflict in Darfur was raging, and relations with the United States only turned frostier.

"We felt like the Americans betrayed us," said the Sudanese foreign minister, Lam Akol.

Still, Sudan had already learned to rely on the East, and because of oil exports, the economy had gained a stable momentum of its own. Inflation is now 6 percent; investment and development are reaching beyond downtown Khartoum to Sudan's central agricultural belt and to Juba, the main city in the south.

But Sudan is a huge country, Africa's largest, at nearly a million square miles. Enormous swaths of territory are still neglected, and growing class differences could sow the seeds of further unrest. Rebel groups in Darfur and other areas, eager for their share of oil profits and power, pose another problem.

Business leaders say the biggest danger would be if the United States succeeded in persuading Sudan's Asian and Middle Eastern trading partners to join the boycott.

"The Americans are not a threat, but if the international community lines up against us, ahh, that is a different issue," said Osama Daoud Abdellatif, chairman of the DAL Group, a conglomerate that owns the Coke factory, the Ozone Café and a number of other businesses. "Everything has been going so well, but Darfur could spoil the party."

Russia Ends Some Suspensions Of Foreign Agencies (NYT)

By C.J. Chivers

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 23 — The Russian government said Monday that it had begun registering private foreign organizations whose operations in Russia were suspended last week, and that it was rushing to review the amended applications of at least 65 other organizations, which remained idled.

Among the groups granted permission to resume work were some that Russian officials had sharply criticized, saying they were encouraging revolutions or meddling in Russia's domestic affairs. They included the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs and the International Republican Institute.

Both groups, whose work includes offering training for domestic political parties and movements, had been suspended last week under a new Russian law that limits the work of foreign groups. Both confirmed that they had been notified in writing that they could resume work.

"We're functioning as we normally would as of today," Lisa Gates, a spokeswoman for the International Republican Institute, said by telephone from the group's office in Washington.

The new law has drawn international criticism as a veiled effort to muzzle critics of the Kremlin and groups that promote social activism, political parties, rule of law, news media freedom and anticorruption awareness.

The new law sets stringent reporting requirements, including the deadline last week for each group to submit details about its origins, history, goals and organization. The detail is fine enough to require such facts as the passport numbers of each of a group's founders, no matter how long ago the group was formed, and whether the founder remains part of the group, or is even alive.

The deadline was seen as the first test of whether Russia would use the law to restrict a group's activities. And when it passed, many groups found they had been temporarily suspended, including dozens of American organizations, prompting Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to inquire about the law when she visited Moscow over the weekend.

The Russian government insisted the suspensions had resulted from the failure of the groups to fill out the forms properly, but many groups noted that the suspensions included those most critical of the Kremlin or most active in grass-roots politics here, including Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International.

Both of those groups were still suspended Monday, according to the latest Russian list. But Russian officials said that of about 190 organizations seeking registration, only 65 to 68 remained suspended, and that all of their applications would be reviewed in less than 30 days.

"No political issues are involved in the decision-making," said Galina A. Fokina, acting head of the office in the Ministry of Justice that is responsible for the registration. "All issues are based on legal issues dealing with filling out the forms."

Three more groups were approved Monday, pending only a signature by the office's director, Ms. Fokina said. She declined to provide the group's names, but said she expected that they would be made public on Tuesday once the director signed the forms.

Interviews with organizations that remain suspended showed how strict the ministry's reading of law had been.

The American Bar Association's program in Russia, the Central Europe and Eurasian Law Initiative, remained suspended Monday, it was told, because its filing submission had not listed the program's name in exactly the same way on each form.

On some papers, the name ended with the word "Incorporated," the group's office manager said, and on others with the abbreviation "Inc."

The manager, Olga G. Lapunova, said the group had resubmitted all of its filings with "Incorporated" and hoped to be registered next week. "There has been nothing dramatic so far," she said. "They are technical, minor changes."

Other groups noted that even if they were approved, other requirements could still undermine their ability to work, including a full annual plan that must be submitted by next week. The groups said the requirements for the plan were at once vast and vague, leaving them unsure what to submit, and worried that any submission the government did not like could be ground for future suspensions.

Clashes Disrupt Hungary's Celebration Of Anti-Soviet Revolt (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, October 24, 2006

WARSAW, Oct. 23 — Violent clashes in Budapest on Monday as the police tried to contain a month-old antigovernment protest movement marred the 50th anniversary of Hungary's uprising against Soviet domination.

The police used rubber bullets, tear gas and a water cannon to disperse thousands of protesters who had gathered for a rally after a group of them took control of a Soviet-era T-34 tank that was on display for the commemorations and drove it toward the police. About two dozen people were injured, none seriously.

The rally was one of several held over the past month calling for the resignation of the Socialist prime minister, Ferenc Gyurcsany, after the leak of a tape recording in which he told fellow party members that he had lied about the economy to win national elections in April.

Mr. Gyurcsany, whose party governs in a coalition with the Free Democrat Party, won a vote of confidence this month.

The leaders of the rally wanted to take advantage of the anniversary to press for Mr. Gyurcsany's resignation.

But the clashes bore little resemblance to the 1956 uprising, which ended when Soviet tanks entered the city and opened fire. Thousands of Hungarians were killed in the fighting then, and hundreds more were later executed or imprisoned.

DOJ_NMG_0085778

"Despite the often justified disappointment and discontent, the majority of Hungarians believe that parliamentary democracy is the most suited to express people's will and to create law and give a program to a free Hungary," the prime minister said Monday in a speech in Parliament commemorating the 1956 uprising.

Hungary held its first free elections in 1990 and joined the European Union in 2004. But its democratic and capitalistic transition has come with complications.

The country, which had liberalized its economy ahead of others in Central Europe, quickly became a magnet for foreign investment. But government spending and inflation have crept steadily higher, causing concern among foreign investors, who have called for painful economic reforms.

Mr. Gyurcsany, who promised tax cuts during his party's campaign, has since raised taxes and cut benefits in order to control the ballooning budget deficit, now about 10 percent of overall economic output.

In the recording that gave rise to the protests against his government, he admitted to having lied about the economy. But he has contended that the comments were made in the context of a call for his party to be more serious about reforms.

Near Heroes' Square, a few miles away from the clashes, Mr. Gyurcsany briefly attended the unveiling of a monument commemorating 1956 but left as several hundred people mocked him by chanting phrases from his speech back at him and shouted, "Gyurcsany, go away!"

Many people on the streets called him a dictator and complained that political life continued to be dominated by people from the Communist era. Mr. Gyurcsany began his political career as an official of the Young Communist Organization. The Socialist Party is a successor to the Communist Hungarian Socialist Workers Party, which ruled the country until 1989.

"We should learn from the spirit of '56," said a university student who would give his name only as Marci. "We should finish off what began in 1956, because in 1989 there wasn't really a complete change."

Violence associated with the current protests has been limited to vandalism by fringe groups, and Mr. Gyurcsany's government has not tried to stop the protests or interfered with protesters camped in front of Parliament. Those protesters were moved away from the building early Sunday in order to clear the way for Monday's ceremonies, but their tents remained and they were expected to resume their vigil on Tuesday.

The clashes on Monday occurred as the police tried to keep the rally of tens of thousands of people, stretching from Astoria Junction to Deak Square, from moving back toward Parliament. The violence began when some demonstrators managed to commandeer the tank on display at Deak Square.

"The whole crowd started cheering" as the protesters started to drive the tank, [a news agency] quoted its cameraman, Fedja Grulovic, as saying. "The police started firing teargas, then the tank stopped."

Some protesters responded by throwing stones. Mounted police officers with rubber batons and a water cannon were brought in to clear the area.

Beijing Hosts Big Africa Summit As West Watches (WSJ)

By Shai Oster

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

BEIJING -- China will strike a number of agreements on trade, investment, aid and debt forgiveness when it hosts the heads of 48 African countries next month in what is being billed as the biggest summit China has held in modern history, according to the Chinese official heading the effort.

"The main objective of this summit is to establish a new type of partnership between China and African countries against changing circumstances," Assistant Foreign Minister Zhai Jun said yesterday in an interview.

The gathering in Beijing, dubbed the Forum on China-Africa Cooperation, is set for Nov. 3 to 5. It comes as many African leaders seek help to repair their strife-torn countries and China looks for new resources to meet its growing energy needs, as well as new markets for its own emerging domestic companies. It caps growing ties between the two regions over the past several years that have sparked some ire in the West.

Mr. Zhai defended China's human-rights record in Africa and said China isn't interested merely in striking sweetheart deals to tap into Africa's deep oil reserves. Rather, he said, China is eager to raise living standards in the world's poorest continent, and feels it can share lessons and opportunities from its own development.

"Africa is rich in resources and has a big market. We are pursuing our relations by seeking mutual benefits, in an open and transparent manner. China has nothing to hide," Mr. Zhai said.

Last year, China imported 38.4 million tons of oil from Africa, or about 771,000 barrels a day. Mr. Zhai pointed out that is less than one-third of the amount some big Western nations receive from Africa. The U.S., for example, imports about 2.4 million barrels a day from Africa, more than it gets from the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0085779

Western oil companies fear their Chinese competitors are able to use government backing for aid deals and loans to secure preferential treatment. China says that in terms of business, its deals are purely commercial and transparent. So far, China's companies have a much smaller presence than other international players, but they are looking to expand to feed China's fast-growing needs for fuel.

Mr. Zhai said there would be further cooperation on energy. "For many African countries, energy is a pillar industry. Many nations want to transform their oil into a strength through our cooperation. We are helping them meet such a goal," Mr. Zhai said.

Agreements in several key areas are expected to be announced by China's President Hu Jintao and signed during the meeting. To encourage more imports from Africa, an expansion of the number of African goods that would be subject to zero-percent tariffs in China is likely to be included in the pacts. Currently, some 190 goods, from 28 African countries, are exempt from tariffs. There will also be pledges for more aid, including training in everything from medicine to agriculture, and investment in Africa. Mr. Zhai said the government is actively encouraging Chinese companies to expand their business in Africa.

While he didn't disclose how much in loans African countries owe China, he said China would announce another round of debt cancellation. He said China's loans were a small proportion of the $284 billion in debt Africa owes globally. China has already forgiven some $10 billion of debt in yuan-denominated loans, mostly from infrastructure projects, he said.

Last year, the Paris Club of big Western lenders forgave roughly $50 billion of African debt. Some critics are worried that China is giving fresh loans to regimes that still don't have the ability to spend the money responsibly or fight corruption, and that such waste will only send those nations back into a cycle of carrying loans they can't pay off. Increasingly, Western nations are seeking to tie aid with specific guarantees from governments on fiscal and social policy -- a policy China rejects.

"We don't want the development models, ideologies and values of other countries foisted on our country," Mr. Zhai said. "Likewise we don't impose our development mode, ideology and values on other countries -- not least on African countries. So, it has been the consistent position of the Chinese government when conducting aid with African countries that we do not attach conditions."

The summit marks 50 years since China first established diplomatic ties with Egypt, the first African nation to reject the island of Taiwan's claim as the sovereign over mainland China, then a deeply ideological, but poor, Communist state. China aggressively wooed African states with help and aid to convince them to switch sides.

Now, only five African countries, including Swaziland and Malawi, recognize Taiwan. Meanwhile, China has emerged as one of the biggest economies in the world with its own brand of capitalist authoritarianism that has transformed the relationship with Africa from a largely political one into a mostly commercial one.

Beijing will pull out all the stops to impress the delegations with its rapid economic growth, arranging trips to the Great Wall, and showing off the signs of its modern wealth, such as the commercial capital Shanghai. It will coordinate some 1,500 delegates and another 1,030 journalists from Africa, China and elsewhere. "Perhaps they will bring some lessons home when they have seen the changes that have taken place in China," Mr. Zhai said.

This comes as some in the U.S. and elsewhere are casting an increasingly wary eye at China's growing involvement in Africa, most recently in Sudan, where China has large oil interests. Mr. Zhai rejected allegations that China isn't doing enough to stem the violence in Darfur. "I believe the Darfur issue and China's economic and energy cooperation and trade are two separate issues. It is not the case that because of the good relationship and cooperation with the Sudanese government that we're turning a blind eye to the situation in Darfur."

He criticized U.S. policy. "The United States has unilateral sanctions -- has it been useful?" he asked.

EU To Get Tougher On China Trade (WSJ)

By John W. Miller

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

BRUSSELS -- The European Union is due to unveil a plan today that charts a tougher approach to China as its trade deficit with the Asian giant soars.

The change in strategy is driven by the desire to quell protectionist sentiment at home and strengthen Europe's hand when it renegotiates a trade agreement with China, European officials say.

Until now, Europe has opened its markets to Chinese imports but made few modifications to a trade relationship last outlined in a deal with Beijing struck more than 20 years ago.

The plan, to be announced today by the European Commission, the EU's executive body, is aimed at persuading Beijing to open more markets, crack down on technology theft and allow its currency to strengthen. If Beijing doesn't comply, the EU would take action to protect its own interests, including the imposition of new antidumping duties, according to EU documents that summarize the commission's plan. The EU already has punitive antidumping tariffs on imports of Chinese shoes and more than 30 other goods.

DOJ_NMG_0085780

"China needs to demonstrate its commitment to open markets, fair competition and responsible leadership," the documents say. The EU will increase pressure on Beijing to let its currency appreciate, according to the documents. That could help reduce the size of the trade deficit by making Chinese imports more expensive to buy in the EU.

The EU's trade deficit with China ballooned to €106.8 billion ($134.77 billion) last year from €48.6 billion in 2000. That is starting to approach the scale of the U.S. trade deficit with China, which in 2005 was above $200 billion. The scale of Chinese imports to the EU and the perceived threat to EU jobs have until recent years been much smaller than in the U.S., where fears about China's manufacturing strength have driven U.S. policy for years. The EU's plan of tougher language toward China mirrors that of the U.S.

Chinese officials say the EU would be making a mistake to try to penalize it over the trade deficit. "China's been making a lot of efforts" in areas such as tackling counterfeiting and intellectual-copyright theft, said Shaoxin Wang, spokesman for the Chinese mission to the EU.

EU officials say trade with China has helped the EU by tempering inflation and boosting the profits of European companies, such as retail titans Carrefour SA and Tesco PLC, which rely on cheap Chinese imports to boost sales. But the rise of imports has begun to stir protectionist fears in EU countries with high labor costs.

A surge in imports of manufactured goods such as shoes, laptops and cellphones is behind the EU's trade deficit with China. EU imports of Chinese shoes have more than doubled since 2000, to €4.8 billion from €2 billion, hurting shoe producers in countries like Italy. Imports of electronic goods have risen to €37.3 billion from €15.9 billion over the same period.

The commission hopes the strategy will eventually lead to a reciprocal relationship by creating opportunities in China, most likely in service industries such as insurance, consulting, law and banking.

The EU is due next year to renegotiate its 1985 partnership agreement with China, which includes trade. If the stalled talks on a global trade deal, known as the Doha round, fail to revive, EU officials say they may seek an additional trade accord with China.

"There is a bargain to be struck in which Europe commits to maintaining its own openness even in the face of the toughest competition, and China acts to ensure that that competition is fair and that EU businesses get a fair shot in the Chinese market," the EU background papers say.

European business lobbies such as Unice, which represents 2.2 million businesses, complain they don't get a fair deal with China. For example, car companies aren't allowed to own their own subsidiaries in China, and must partner with a Chinese company. Car makers say they are forced by high customs duties to buy parts from local suppliers, rather than import their own. The EU, the U.S. and Canada have a joint case pending at the World Trade Organization demanding China cut the tariffs.

The EU today also will ask about progress on China's commitment to fully liberalize its banking sector by the end of this year. Because of regulatory restrictions, Unice says, European banks get just 2% of the market for Chinese banking services, despite having strong competitive advantages.

Analysts say the EU should move carefully on any threats to bring more antidumping cases if China doesn't cooperate. "Getting tough with China is a dangerous game," says David Kernohan of the Centre for European Policy Studies in Brussels, adding that China could freeze the EU out of its markets and strike deals with other players instead.

Chinese Checks (WSJ)

By Harry Harding

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

China's economy has proved a seductress that's hard for investors to resist. From encouraging foreign direct investment to signing up with the WTO, Beijing has embraced foreign capital and know-how. Foreigners, in large part, have been rewarded with double-digit growth rates and cheap labor. But this happy affair is running into problems: Over the last few months, there is a growing perception that foreign companies have done too well from their investments. The Party leadership has publicly accused a few of capturing "excessive" market shares, acquiring too many stakes in China's strategic industries, and buying state assets at bargain prices. Above all, there seems to be a concern that overseas investors own too much of the technology crucial to China's economic development.

These sentiments aren't only murmured in private. Li Deshui, a former economic official, was quoted in March as criticizing "malicious acquisitions aimed at establishing monopolies." He cited beer, soft drinks and skin-care products as areas where foreign companies had done too well at the expense of their local counterparts.

Beijing's defensive economic nationalism is not primarily about restricting imports, although there has been some of this. For instance, China's high tariffs on imported automobile parts are currently the target of a case being brought before the WTO by the U.S. and the European Union.

The main focus is on making it more difficult for foreign companies to operate in China. Take foreign ownership of local companies operating in "strategic sectors," such as banking and brokerage houses. The most prominent example so far has been Beijing's rejection of Citigroup's attempt to buy 45% of Guangdong Development Bank last year, as part of a consortium that would have taken majority control. Despite the state-owned lender's heavy losses, Beijing refused to waive the 20% cap on the stake any single foreign investor can take in a Chinese bank. As a result, Citigroup was forced to scale down its bid, as were other foreign banks interested in buying Guangdong Development Bank. The deal has yet to be completed.

China's regulators are even designating automobile and machine-tool companies as sensitive sectors, making foreign acquisitions in these areas subject to particularly stringent scrutiny. Earlier this year, Hangzhou Advanced Gearbox Group halted three years of talks on a joint venture with Germany's ZF Group, saying it would be a mistake to give the foreign automotive-supplier company greater access to the Chinese market. Last week, private-equity fund Carlyle Group agreed to buy 50% of Xugong Group Construction Machinery Co. -- hardly the 85% it had originally intended to purchase. This followed a high-profile campaign against the deal by Sany Heavy Industries Co., one of Xugong's main domestic competitors.

Beijing is also placing new obstacles in the way of foreign companies that seek to establish independent, wholly owned operations in the mainland. Beijing has officially complied with its commitment to open up the domestic construction market, as part of the agreement on China's accession to the WTO in 2001. But it has placed formidable obstacles in the way of foreign companies trying to take advantage of this opportunity. Under regulations issued in December 2003, these companies are required to employ at least 200 staff in China before being allowed to sign any contracts in the country. Foreign companies wanting to compete for infrastructure projects must also have at least $36 million in registered capital in China.

Beijing's regulators are now codifying further protectionist language into law. In September, six ministries enacted regulations that give the Ministry of Commerce expanded power to block foreign purchases of local companies. The law's language is vague; a purchase that disturbs "the social or economic order or harm the public interest," for instance, could be reviewed. Foreign investors are also fretting about the country's new antimonopoly law, which has been drafted but not yet enacted.

China is also attempting to build "national champions" that can compete with foreign companies in the global marketplace. Beijing is well aware that, despite the country's integration into the global economy, it currently occupies a narrow slice of the value chain. China serves mainly as an assembly platform for manufactured goods, albeit of increasing sophistication. While that role brings in considerable revenue, it only represents a small fraction of the total value of the country's export goods. Other links in that value chain earn far more, such as research and development, product design, branding, marketing and distribution. The best-known examples of this trend are Lenovo's acquisition of IBM's personal computing division, and the creation of a Chinese-controlled joint venture between TCL and Thomson to produce television sets. The purchases help Beijing pursue its goal of boasting 50 of the world's 500 largest companies within the next decade.

This goal is laudable, taken on its own. The problem for foreign companies is that Beijing is willing to use tactics which give their Chinese counterparts an unfair advantage. These measures include state subsidies through politically motivated bank lending at below-market rates. For instance, Cnooc Ltd.'s abortive bid for Unocal Corp. last year was backed by several billion dollars in cheap loans from its government-owned parent company. It's also possible in future that Beijing will challenge patents and cap domestic retail prices to reduce the royalties paid to foreign patent and copyright holders.

China's economic nationalism is a marginal adjustment to, rather than a fundamental repudiation of, Beijing's broader embrace of globalization. As China's Commerce Minister Bo Xilai has argued, Beijing will not abandon the foreign economic policies that have served it so well. There's also no shortage of critics of economic nationalism within China, both among economists committed to free-market models, and among local companies who fear their own competitiveness may be compromised by state interference in the economy.

Nonetheless, the protectionist backlash is unlikely to go away anytime soon. Other "China risk" factors may receive far more publicity -- from the threat of a financial crisis to a political collapse, or even a conflict with the U.S. over Taiwan. But for companies doing business with China, it is the new surge in economic nationalism that poses, by far, the biggest threat for the foreseeable future.

Mr. Harding, director of research and analysis at Eurasia Group, chaired the firm's task force on the risks associated with developments in China over the next 10 years.

China Sees Religion As Stabilizing Force (WT/AP)

By Joe Mcdonald

The Washington Times, October 24, 2006

BEIJING -- Chinese officials have expressed interest in the role of religion in improving society, the archbishop of Canterbury said yesterday at the end of the first trip to China in 12 years by a leader of the Church of England.

DOJ_NMG_0085782

The Anglican Communion will expand efforts to help the state-sanctioned Protestant church train clergy, as communist leaders look to religion to help stabilize society during a time of wrenching change and explosive growth in Christianity in China, Archbishop Rowan Williams said.

His two-week visit also highlighted Anglicans' limited but longtime ties to China, in contrast to the Roman Catholic Church's lack of relations with Beijing.

Chinese officials discussed the role of religion in "building a harmonious society," said Archbishop Williams, referring to the Communist Party phrase for efforts to spread prosperity and ease tensions over the gap between China's rich and poor.

One senior official talked about "the potential significance of Christian Sunday schools in backing up the growth of a mature and stable public morality," Archbishop Williams said at a press conference.

The Church of England and China's Protestant church agreed to work toward having Anglican theologians teach in China and Chinese seminarians study abroad, said Archbishop Williams. He said they discussed foreign help to expand Chinese seminary libraries and to train religious scholars.

Archbishop Williams avoided open criticism of Beijing's controls on religious activity, but said the government could explain its rules more clearly so the faithful know what is permitted.

"I think there is a remarkable amount of freedom of initiative for a number of religious groups," he said. "We're content to work with a church which we see to be lively and active and capable of taking initiative."

Archbishop Williams said he asked Chinese officials about six Protestant and Catholic church members who he said were jailed or harassed for religious activity. He said the officials asked him to submit more details and had not replied.

Christian Solidarity Worldwide (CSW), a religious-freedom group that monitors the detention of priests and members of unregistered churches in China, said the archbishop did not meet the real church.

Greener Pastures To Stop Dust Bowl, Mongolia Builds 'Great Wall' Of Trees (WSJ)

By Patrick Barta

The Wall Street Journal, October 24, 2006

DALANZADGAD, Mongolia -- The great Gobi Desert has camels with two humps, a rare breed of desert bear, and some of Asia's last remaining nomads. One thing it doesn't have is shade.

Batchuluun Doorov is trying to change that. Each morning, he travels by motorcycle to a remote desert outpost, rouses his assistants, and begins watering thousands of scraggly trees rising up from the sand. Workers planted the trees months ago, and now they form a thin green line across the horizon in one of the most barren places on earth.

"In the future, when this becomes like a forest, I will be proud," Mr. Batchuluun said one recent morning as he ambled between saplings and fished a cigarette from his pocket. Dry winds howled around him. A few hundred yards away, bleached bones baked in the sun.

More than 2,000 years ago, China began to build the Great Wall. Today, Mongolia is building its own seemingly implausible version: a zigzagging line of pines, willows, oleasters, junipers, hawthorns, aspens and other trees it hopes will someday stretch more than 2,000 miles across the desert. The so-called "Green Wall" is expected to take 30 years to complete and cost some $150 million or more.

The wall is necessary, Mongolia says, to protect itself and the wider world from an increasingly serious problem: Gobi dust, kicked up by Central Asian storms strong enough to rip the paint off Mongolian cars and then carried eastward across Asia and beyond.

Dust storms from the Gobi, which spans southern Mongolia and northern China and is almost twice the size of Texas, have darkened the skies of China and Korea in recent years, closing airports and triggering widespread respiratory illnesses. A whirlwind this spring dumped an estimated 300,000 tons of sand and grit on Beijing, burying cars, houses and trees in a thick layer of sand.

According to Chinese records, big sandstorms reached Beijing only once or twice every seven years in the 1950s, and only every two or three years in the 1970s. Now they are an annual problem, with many arriving from beyond Chinese borders. While the storms usually happen in spring, many in China worry the Gobi gusts could cake the 2008 Beijing summer Olympics in sand, eclipsing the nation's moment in the global sun.

Gobi storms have even made their way to the U.S., where weather officials blame Mongolian soil for dust storms up and down the West Coast, including one that clouded Utah skies in 2001. Scientists have found traces of the Gobi as far away as Kansas.

The amount of Mongolia's land that is suffering from desertification -- land that either has no vegetation at all or is slowly losing it -- could be as much as 50,000 square miles, an area the size of New York state, according to a leading Mongolian environmental group called Sain Uils, which means "good will" in Mongolian. Mongolia's Ministry of Nature and Environment says 683 rivers have dried up in recent years due to encroaching desert.

Mongolia's government and scientists say global warming is partly to blame. Average temperatures in Mongolia have climbed nearly 3.6 degrees Fahrenheit since the 1940s, according to the Ministry of Nature and Environment. At the same time, it says there is about 10% less rainfall in the Gobi itself now versus the 1940s -- fewer than three inches a year in parts of the desert.

Changes in human behavior are also playing a role. Herdsmen have added more goats to their herds in recent years to boost production of cashmere, a valuable commodity in Mongolia's landlocked economy. Unfortunately, the omnivorous goats do more damage to the soil than other livestock because they eat plant roots, too, contributing to desertification.

The question is whether planting thousands of saplings can actually help keep the soil in place.

Some countries have done it successfully. In the U.S., for instance, Franklin D. Roosevelt's administration planted "shelter belts" of trees to block wind as part of its successful effort to rehabilitate the American Dust Bowl in the 1930s.

But those efforts included other programs to boost their effectiveness, such as money for farmers who agreed to change their behavior to promote soil conservation. In the case of Mongolia, many international experts think officials are taking the wrong approach, in part because the country doesn't have enough money to ensure a broad-based solution.

It's not an easy problem to solve. Not much grows in the Gobi, which unlike the sandy dunes of the Sahara is mostly a barren expanse of gravellike plains, mountains and valleys. Winter temperatures can drop to minus 40 degrees Fahrenheit, followed by highs above 110 degrees in the summer.

Another problem is that the Gobi has fewer than three people per square mile. That means there aren't many folks around to care for the trees, including protecting them from wandering nomads who might topple them for fuel -- or for fun. It also means watching out for other threats to saplings like rabbits and cows.

"I can think of a million reasons why there is just no reason this is going to work," says Jayne Belnap, a research ecologist for the U.S. Geological Survey in Utah, who has studied Mongolian soil extensively. "If you talk to any scientist, they will start laughing."

Difficult Changes

Ms. Belnap and others think Mongolia should focus on reducing the number of animals in nomads' herds. But doing so could require difficult social changes in Mongolia, where some 40% of the country's 2.8 million residents work in rural endeavors such as herding.

For much of the 20th century, Mongolia was a communist state supported by the Soviet Union, which propped up the local economy. Central planners regulated the size of herds, which helped to prevent overgrazing.

When the Soviet Union collapsed in the early 1990s, so did Mongolia's economy, forcing many urban residents to flee to the countryside as herders.

The result: too many animals. Many of the animals stayed thin and unproductive, which in turn encouraged herders to add more. Today, Mongolia has as many as 30 million head of livestock -- more than 10 times its human population. The introduction of more goats for cashmere only added to the problem.

Foreign agricultural experts urge Mongolia to promote deeper changes, including adopting feedlot practices now common in the U.S. and other nations. The U.S. once had similarly wide-open spaces where animals roamed across big stretches of land, but those animals were eventually cordoned off into fattening lots and corporate farms. That process used less land and boosted productivity.

Doing that, though, could ultimately mean the end of the road for many of Mongolia's nomads. Much of the country's rural population lives in small family units that have their own herds and move around in search of forage. The nomadic herder culture is critical to Mongolia's identity, much like the cowboy once was to the American West.

Mongolian officials are plowing ahead with tree-planting instead. The Green Wall project allows them to respond to foreign governments and local constituents clamoring for action on the dust problem. Mongolian officials also hope the idea will help attract money from foreign donors, and create jobs in rural areas caring for the trees.

Mongolia has declared the project a national priority and obtained support from a handful of sources, including Rotary Club chapters in Mongolia and South Korea. The government and volunteers together have planted more than 360,000 trees at various sites over the past two years, with the Rotary Club running some of its own tree-planting operations. Some volunteers sing Rotary Club songs as they work.

But many foreign donors, including the United Nations, declined to contribute because they doubt the project's efficacy.

Avirmed Auyrzana, head of the Green Wall National Program at the Ministry of Nature and Environment, acknowledges that between 20% and 50% of the newly planted Gobi trees die and that the project is underfunded. He has just five employees and works from a 10-foot-wide cubbyhole in an old Soviet-style office block overlooking a parking lot in the Mongolian capital of Ulaanbaatar.

"If people do not have any agricultural experience, of course they will be skeptical," he says. But he adds that he is certain the project will work.

Down in the Gobi, enthusiasm runs high. This is especially true in Dalanzadgad, a desolate town of 15,000 people a few hours north of the Chinese border. Dalanzadgad could use some green. Wild dogs roam in packs, and dust regularly blows across city streets. A massive trash dump sits outside of town -- a repository for everything from old tires to the discarded rib cages of livestock. And then the Gobi takes over, spreading out in all directions.

Rotary Club officials in Mongolia hired a 38-year-old former Mongolian stockbroker named Jambaldagva Yondonjunai to monitor their operations on the ground. Mr. Jambaldagva patrols town in a gray Russian van emblazoned with the words, "Keep Mongolia Green." During a recent visit, he complained of stomach pains from eating bad marmot, a groundhoglike creature common in these parts.

"When I drive by, all the people recognize me," he said. "People say, you're doing a good thing -- you're doing something for the motherland."

Part of Mr. Jambaldagva's job involves driving across the rocky landscape to visit the trees and crews who water and watch over them. After three years, the saplings should be strong enough to survive on their own, project supporters say.

Sometimes the trees don't make it. At Moltsog Els, a collection of golden dunes an hour or so from Dalanzadgad, workers trucked in hundreds of stones to pin down the sand and then planted trees between the rocks. Then a freak desert rainstorm struck, uprooting or drowning the trees. Now, stones lie scattered across the dunes with brown twigs poking upward from the sand.

Other sites are considered a huge success, like one near Bulgan, a town two hours west of Dalanzadgad. Workers planted several thousand trees there, and about 90% have survived.

It has taken a lot of work. A half-dozen locals, including two watchmen, must water the trees daily with a hose fed by an underground aquifer.

"Sometimes it's hard holding the hoses," says 33-year-old Iderzaya Orgoi, a former nomad who gave away her herd to look for other kinds of work, and landed a job caring for the trees. Still, "I'm very sure" the project will work, she says.

Another Hurdle

Ms. Belnap, the U.S.-based soil expert, says she doesn't doubt the trees will grow for a while, and that some of the trees may thrive. But she sees another potential hurdle: salt. Many of Mongolia's underground water sources contain water that's high in salinity, she says. As that water is tapped to nurse trees, it will accumulate in the soil and eventually poison the same trees it sustains.

Work is proceeding anyway, with a variety of additional tree-planting schemes sprouting around the area. In Dalanzadgad, one local woman enthusiastically reports that the government has offered to pay her the local equivalent of $2.57 a tree if she nurses 10 of them to maturity over three years.

Then there's the patch of green headed up by Mr. Batchuluun, near a place called Juulchin Gobi, a tourist tent camp some 40 minutes overland from Dalanzadgad. Workers planted saplings for a stretch of two miles or longer.

Using nearby wells and irrigation channels, Mr. Batchuluun and his team walked up and down the rows daily during the summer, watering each tree at least two times a week. Standing shirtless with a safari hat on his head on a recent day, Mr. Batchuluun said that about 80% of his trees have lived. Some are so tall, he added, that he sometimes can't see other workers when they wander out into the foliage.

While a few miles of trees isn't much in the vast desert, Mr. Batchuluun thinks enough trees will flourish to make a difference.

"The children will be very proud," he said. "They [will] look back and think: This was the beginning of everything."

Britain Is Turning On The U.S. — At Its Own Peril (USAT)

By Melanie Phillips

USA Today, October 24, 2006

Everyone knows that Europe is a continent stuffed with craven, terror-appeasing fromages who loathe America. Britain, by contrast, led by the lion-hearted Tony Blair, is full of stalwarts who stand shoulder to shoulder with the United States in the defense of the West. Right?

Wrong. Fury at Prime Minister Blair for being President Bush's “poodle” has reached such a pitch that the most successful Labor prime minister in memory is being forced out of office because of his support for U.S. policy in Iraq and Israel. Labor's members of Parliament say his refusal to break with America by calling for an earlier cease-fire in Lebanon was the last straw.

The disturbing fact is that Britain is consumed by a rampant anti-Americanism and an allied hostility toward Israel, which are driving public debate into irrationality, prejudice and appeasement.

In a Populus poll last month in The Times of London, 62% said the government should change its policy by distancing itself from the United States, being more critical of Israel and declaring a timetable for withdrawing from Iraq. An August YouGov poll in The Spectator magazine revealed that while 53% wanted a tougher anti-terrorism policy, 45% wanted to be allied more closely with the European Union than with America. Only 14% supported closer U.S. ties.

As a result, the prospects for the alliance between Britain and the United States in the post-Blair era do not look promising. Despite being an instinctive Atlanticist, Gordon Brown, the most likely successor as Labor prime minister, is thought to be only a reluctant backer of the war in Iraq, according to a new autobiography by former Labor minister David Blunkett.

Meanwhile David Cameron, the new young leader of the opposition Conservative Party, made a speech last month distancing himself from U.S. foreign policy and blaming America for fanning the flames of anti-Americanism. The outcome might be that Britain increasingly snuggles up to the EU over foreign policy while an irritated America, bereft of its principal advocate in Europe, moves toward isolationism.

Much of Britain's anti-Americanism is driven by the usual suspects, such as far-left lawmaker George Galloway or newspapers such as the ultra-left Guardian. Galloway, for instance, said during an interview with GQ magazine earlier this year that the assassination of Blair by a suicide bomber would be “morally justified.”

Left-wing discourse, now staple fare on the BBC and applauded even by conservatively minded audiences in panel discussions, proclaims that the United States is the fount of Third World oppression and the greatest threat to world peace.

But British animosity toward the U.K.'s most important and historic ally is wider and deeper. Partly it derives from simple snobbery, the long-standing British belief that Americans are vulgar upstarts who lack the gravitas that Britain has accrued from a thousand years of history.

Probe further, however, and you discover anguish at the progressive junking of that history. Schools, for example, no longer teach the history or values of the British nation on the grounds that national identity based on a majority culture is viewed as “racist.” Instead, they promote multiculturalism, the doctrine that minority value must have equal status to those of the majority. Loss of confidence in Britain's role in the world has demoralized its governing class so badly that it has come to believe that the nation state is the principal source of all ills from prejudice to war, and that legitimacy resides instead in supranational institutions.

So no international action can be taken without sanctification by that holy of holies, the United Nations. As a result, the British regard Bush's “unilateral” foreign policy with undiluted horror. This is made worse by disdain for Bush himself, regarded as a tongue-tied cowboy who actually believes in God — to the post-religious British, the nearest thing to a certificate of lunacy.

The biggest single cause of British anti-Americanism, however, is Israel. Despite being the target for more than half a century of genocidal Arab and Muslim aggression, Israel is widely perceived in Britain as the regional bully, and its acts of self-defense are viewed as the principal motor behind both the Middle East impasse and Islamic grievance because of its supposed refusal to allow the Palestinians to have a state of their own.

Thus John Denham, chairman of the parliamentary Home Affairs Select Committee, wrote that Israel's policies were making Britain a target for terror. America brought the 9/11 attacks upon itself, goes this type of thinking, because of its support for Israel — and the only reason Britain is now threatened by Islamic terror is because of Blair's support for the United States.

This has opened a Pandora's box of anti-Jewish prejudice in Britain.

A recent report by the Parliamentary Committee Against Antisemitism found that since 2000, anti-Semitism is on the rise in Britain. It is now common to read in the news media, for example, that the Jews are engaged in a global conspiracy that has subverted U.S. foreign policy to serve the interests of Israel and put the rest of the world at risk. In April, for instance, The Independent newspaper illustrated an interview on the subject of the “Israel lobby” in America with a picture of the American flag in which the stars of the union were replaced with the Stars of David. The headline: “The United States of Israel.” Thus the prejudice against America is inextricably conflated with prejudice against Jews and the Jewish state.

The dismaying truth is that, even after the suicide bombings in London, America's defense of the free world against Islamic terror is widely viewed in Britain as the cause of that terror. The paranoid bigotry that drives the jihad — that the United States and its Jewish puppet masters make up a giant conspiracy of evil — is being increasingly echoed within Britain's non-Muslim population.

The very idea that weakening the alliance with the United States would be in Britain's interests is madness. But in a country that has lost its way, rationality is a commodity in short supply.

Veiled Insult (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, October 24, 2006

Quite a long time ago, having briefly joined the herd of 20-something backpackers that eternally roams Southeast Asia, I found myself in Bali. Like all of the other 20-somethings, I carefully read the Lonely Planet backpacker's guide to Indonesia and learned, among other things, that it was considered improper for women to wear shorts or trousers when entering Balinese temples. I dutifully purchased a Balinese sarong and, looking awkward and foreign, wore it while visiting temples. I didn't want to cause offense.

I thought of that long-ago incident during a visit last week to London, where a full-fledged shouting match has broken out over Muslim women who choose to wear the veil. This particular argument had begun because a teaching assistant in Yorkshire refused to remove her veil -- a niqab , which covers the whole body except for the eyes -- in the presence of male teachers, which was much of the time. She was fired; she went to court -- and a clutch of senior British politicians entered the fray.

Jack Straw, the former foreign secretary, called the full-face veil "a visible statement of separation and of difference." Tony Blair, the prime minister, added that he could "see the reason" for the teaching assistant to be suspended.

What followed was predictable: accusations of racism, charges of discrimination and disagreement about whether the veil was even a valid topic of discussion. If Blair and Straw were really concerned about Muslim women, shouldn't they be more interested in underage marriages, or wife beating, or something more important?

The short answer is, yes, probably. But the curious fact is that the veil, as a political issue, won't go away. The French have banned not only the full veil but head scarves in state schools. Some German regions have banned the head scarf for civil servants too, and they are not permitted in Turkish universities at all. Slowly, the issue is coming to the United States: Just this month a Michigan judge dismissed a small-claims court case filed by a Muslim woman because she refused to remove her full-face veil while testifying.

Critics call the veil a symbol of female oppression or rejection of Western values. Defenders say that it is a symbol of religious faith and that it allows women to be "free" in a different sense -- free from cosmetics, from fashion and from unwanted male attention. Debate about the veil inevitably leads to discussions of female emancipation, religious freedom and the assimilation, or lack thereof, of Muslim communities in the West.

And yet, at a much simpler level, surely it is also true that the full-faced veil -- the niqab, burqa or chador -- causes such deep reactions in the West not so much because of its political or religious symbolism but because it is extremely impolite. Just as it is considered rude to enter a Balinese temple wearing shorts, so, too, is it considered rude, in a Western country, to hide one's face. We wear masks when we want to frighten, when we are in mourning or when we want to conceal our identities. To a Western child -- or even an adult -- a woman clad from head to toe in black looks like a ghost. Thieves and actors hide their faces in the West; honest people look you straight in the eye.

Given that polite behavior is required in other facets of their jobs, it doesn't seem to me in the least offensive to require schoolteachers or civil servants to show their faces when dealing with children or the public. If Western tourists can wear sarongs in Balinese temples to show respect for the locals, so too can religious Muslim women show respect for the children they teach and the customers they serve by leaving their head scarves on, but removing their full-faced veils.

It would, of course, be outrageous if Tony Blair or the French government were to ban veils altogether -- just as it is outrageous that Saudi Arabia bans churches and even forbids priests from entering the country. But just because authorities persecute Christians and Jews in some parts of the Muslim world, that doesn't mean we need to emulate them. In their private lives, Muslim women living in the West should be free to use veils or head scarves as they wish. But freedom to practice religion in the West shouldn't imply freedom to hold jobs that impinge on that practice. An Orthodox Jew should not have an absolute right to work in a restaurant that is open only on Saturdays. A Quaker cannot join the Army and then state that his religion prohibits him from fighting. By the same token, a Muslim woman who wants to cover her face has no absolute right to work in a school or an office where face-to-face conversations are part of the job.

It isn't religious discrimination or anti-Muslim bias to tell her that she must be polite to the natives, respect the local customs, try to speak some of the local patois -- and uncover her face.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Says U.S. Image Hurt By Actions (FINDLAW/AP)

By Ciaran Giles, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 25, 2006

(AP) - MADRID, Spain-U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday he believes some of the U.S. actions in its war on terror have done damage to the image of the United States abroad, particularly its commitment to the rule of law.

The U.S. has drawn criticism around the world for the Abu Ghraib prison scandal in Iraq, its treatment of detainees and secret renditions of terrorism suspects to clandestine prisons in allied countries where they are allegedly tortured.

"The notion that the United States does not fully support the rule of law is one I find very disappointing," Gonzales told reporters, especially given that President Bush "believes the Unites States is the leader, is a beacon of hope in the world and it's important that our actions should reflect a total commitment to the rule of law."

He blamed the country's deteriorating image on misunderstanding in Europe about what the U.S. is doing to fight terrorism.

"Part of the misunderstanding is the fault of the United States in the sense that we need to be out there more, talking about what we are doing and why," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0085792

Gonzales was in Madrid for the sixth meeting of a working group set up two years ago to coordinate the fight against terrorism and other police matters.

Gonzales dismissed criticism that prisoners at the Guantanamo Bay detention facility were in legal limbo and said the recent Military Commissions Act ensured fair trials for terrorists and guarantees that evidence acquired through torture will not be used.

"The Military Commissions Act reflects a careful balance by our Congress to respect the rights of terrorists to receive a fair trial but to do so at a time when we are still at war with the enemy," Gonzales said.

Bush signed the act into law last week after a highly publicized dispute with key Republicans over the terms of the legislation. Civil libertarians and leading Democrats have decried the law as a violation of American values.

Spain, US Agree Greater Anti-terror Cooperation (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 25, 2006

Spain and the United States agreed to ramp up cooperation against terrorism and organized crime during a visit by US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the interior ministry said.

The agreement came during talks between Gonzales and Spanish Interior Minister Alfredo Perez Rubalcaba, it said.

Washington offered to make technology which the US Federal Bureau of Investigation uses to index DNA samples available to Spanish police.

Spanish Justice Minister Juan Fernando Lopez Aguilar told reporters after the meeting, which also saw Gonzales confer with Spanish counterpart Candido Conde-Pumpido, that judicial cooperation between the two nations was "excellent."

He added that they were committed to "achieving good long-term results" in fighting terror.

Gonzales said the United States was sometimes "misunderstood" in Europe and it had to "talk more" to explain its position on security.

Asked if Spain was prepared to countenance handing over terror suspects to US military courts, Aguilar told Spanish media that Spain was determined to protect its citizens' rights at all times.

Gonzales did not address a decision last year by the Spanish Supreme Court to overturn a six-year prison sentence for Al-Qaeda membership handed down in October 2005 to a former Spanish inmate at the US base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

In a separate case, the high court this month acquitted a Moroccan former inmate of Guantanamo who also had been accused of Al-Qaeda membership.

Poor Image: Gonzales Knows It's More Than A Misunderstanding (LONGNJ)

Longview (TX) News-Journal, October 25, 2006

Alberto Gonzales, who once made headlines when he authored legal arguments that President Bush had the authority to authorize torture, is now disappointed by our nation's sagging reputation.

Gonzales, then the White House counsel but now the U.S. Attorney General, was in Spain for a meeting of an international working group created two years ago to coordinate the fight against terrorism and deal with other global law enforcement issues. While there, he told reporters, "The notion that the United States does not fully support the rule of law is one I find very disappointing."

According to an Associated Press report, the nation's top lawyer added that Bush "believes the United States is the leader, is a beacon of hope in the world and it's important that our actions should reflect a total commitment to the rule of law."

Of course, Gonzales failed to mention that in order for Bush to live up to his words, he needed to sign legislation last week — the Military Commissions Act — to ensure fair trials for suspected terrorists and assure that evidence garnered through torture will not be used at such trials.

Gonzales told reporters that our country's tarnished image abroad is due to our allies' misunderstandings about what the United States is doing to fight terrorism.

Actually, that tarnished image is due to our allies' growing understanding of measures the United States has taken in its efforts to combat terrorism, including the use of secret prisons abroad, the rendition of prisoners to governments known to use torture and the indefinite detention of people who are suspected but not yet proven terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0085793

Gonzales would like to talk about Bush's "total commitment to the rule of law" but he has often been reticent about discussing the administration's commitment to the spirit of the law. That's because the longtime Bush aide and attorney has played a key role in seeking loopholes that allow the president to sidestep the spirit of the law.

The attorney general's comments were almost laughable when he opined that the way to dispel the "misunderstanding" among our European allies is for the United States "to be out there more, talking about what we are doing and why."

Meanwhile, at home we hear administration officials and supporters raising the specter that members of the media are unpatriotic and possibly traitorous when they report about what the administration is doing — and why.

Of course, when the media reports on the government's actions, the administration loses control of the message. And we all know how important that control is.

It's the administration that decides when retirement accounts are "private" ... until it decides they are personal.

It's the administration that decides how long we will "stay the course" ... until it decides we will no longer do so.

It's also the administration that decides how long we will use the term "cut and run" ... until it is no longer politically profitable to do so.

That's the problem with the Bush administration. We are asked to see things its way, but only as long as its way looks good. If its way of seeing things begins to show some tarnish, then we are told we can no longer see it that way, that it's time to change our point of view.

It's going to be very interesting to see how that approach works if, as many observers of many political viewpoints predict, the Republicans lose control of Congress in the coming election.

Saudi Prisoner Release Gives U.S. Pause (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Rich Connell And Robert J. Lopez

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

U.S. officials, apparently caught off guard by the Saudi government's recent release of more than two dozen former Guantanamo Bay prisoners, are voicing fears that the men will join the camp of violent extremist groups.

The Saudis released the 29 men from jail for observance of Ramadan, the Muslim holy month of fasting and atonement, with instructions to return to custody by the end of this month.

Saudi officials said that although the men were still under investigation for possible terrorist ties, they were not considered serious threats. "Throwing people in jail and letting them rot is not the answer," said Nail Jubeir, spokesman for the Saudi Embassy in Washington.

But the commander at the sprawling camp here for suspected terrorists is skeptical.

"I'm interested in if they go back to the fight," said Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr. He contends that about 50 of 300 men released since Guantanamo became a prison in 2002 for terrorism suspects have resumed plotting against U.S. interests worldwide, but could identify only one confirmed example.

The kingdom's decision to temporarily release the 29 men illustrates the limits of U.S. influence as the Bush administration seeks to shrink the population of Guantanamo by transferring prisoners to other nations. And it underscores how differently the U.S. and other countries, including Britain and Germany, perceive the danger posed by former detainees.

Of the 437 captives at the U.S. naval base in Cuba, 110 have been cleared for release to their home countries, and more are being added to the list. Officials have said fewer than 100 prisoners will face military tribunals, leaving 200 or more to be repatriated.

Guantanamo has come under increasing criticism from U.S. allies and is dogged by allegations of prisoner abuse. Administration officials say that the camp will be needed for the foreseeable future, but that the ultimate goal is to shut it down.

Some nations have refused to accept Guantanamo detainees, denying responsibility for them or balking at U.S. demands for elaborate security measures on transferred prisoners.

Critics say the problem has been exacerbated by U.S. failure to plan earlier for releasing prisoners. Lawrence Wilkerson, chief of staff to then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell in President Bush's first term, recalled repeated high-level meetings in which State Department officials pressed the Pentagon to explain its plans for releasing captives from the U.S.-declared war on terrorism.

Wilkerson, now a vocal critic of administration policies on terrorism, said Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney "refused to deal with it. For these guys, there was never any idea of final disposition."

In the cases of several British citizens, Wilkerson said, Rumsfeld wanted extensive security measures that the British government refused to accept. The British citizens were transferred anyway, and all were released.

Spokespersons for Rumsfeld and Cheney maintained that the administration had worked steadily, in cooperation with U.S. allies, to release or repatriate detainees while trying to ensure they were treated humanely and wouldn't pose threats later.

"The United States government has no desire to hold detainees any longer than necessary," a Defense Department spokesman said.

More recently, the U.S. and its ally have clashed over nine men at Guantanamo who had lived in Britain but were not citizens. A British court case filed on behalf of the men opened a window on the process when top officials had to file statements, copies of which were obtained by The Times.

Earlier this year, according to court records, U.S. and British officials began discussing the possible release of the men. The British officials said the U.S. expected assurances of extensive, open-ended monitoring and surveillance before they would consider returning the men to Britain. The records show that U.S. officials sought guarantees that intelligence officials would know immediately if the men met with Islamic radicals or made threatening statements.

Even if British officials conducted surveillance, used covert agents and intercepted phone calls, the measures would not have satisfied U.S. officials, according to a declaration by William Nye, head of Britain's counter-terrorism and intelligence directorate.

"None of these techniques, individually or collectively, would have been able to provide the sort of guarantees sought by the U.S.," Nye said.

The nine men, Nye told the court, were not considered enough of a danger to warrant diverting intelligence resources "from those who pose a greater threat to national security."

An appeals court in London backed the British government, which also argued that it could not advocate on behalf of the nine detainees because they were not British citizens. The men remain at Guantanamo.

Critics say the ruling served the interests of both U.S. and British officials by creating the appearance that the countries had tried to hammer out a transfer agreement but were thwarted by legal and security constraints.

"This represents a convenient cover for both parties," said Brent Mickum, a Washington lawyer who represents two of the detainees.

British and U.S. officials declined to discuss any specifics of the diplomatic talks.

In another case, that of Murat Kurnaz, a Turk born and raised in Germany, officials in Berlin initially balked at taking him back after the U.S. approved his transfer in 2002. His case languished until this year, when the new German chancellor, Angela Merkel, raised the issue with Bush.

But the transfer was delayed for several more months, in part because of U.S. demands for extensive surveillance and other security measures to keep tabs on Kurnaz's activities, according to interviews and European media reports.

The measures were rejected by German authorities because they would have created "a collision with German law," said Bernhard Docke, the attorney handling Kurnaz's case in Germany.

Kurnaz finally returned to his hometown of Bremen in August and was briefly placed under investigation for possible ties to Islamic extremists. The Germans have since dropped the case.

A spokesman for the German Embassy in Washington declined to comment.

Detainees from Saudi Arabia make up one of the largest groups at Guantanamo Bay. Saudi prisoners have come under particular scrutiny, in part because of the nation's fundamentalist strain of Islam and the fact that 15 of the 19 men who hijacked airliners in the Sept. 11 attacks were Saudi nationals.

So it was not surprising that the releases for Ramadan raised eyebrows among U.S. officials.

DOJ_NMG_0085795

"We're certainly hoping they don't come back and haunt us," said a senior State Department official who requested anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter.

Saudi officials said the men were released to their families to help rehabilitate them. "The idea is to slowly bring them back into the fold of society," said Jubeir, the embassy spokesman.

But Harris, the prison commander, says he has an obligation to know what becomes of the men in his custody. Part of his mission, he said, is to "keep enemy combatants off the battlefield."

"I take it very seriously whether a detainee is going to get to go home or not," he said.

Court Again Rejects Part Of Canada's Antiterror Laws (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

OTTAWA, Oct. 24 — An Ontario judge ruled Tuesday that an "essential element" of Canada's antiterrorism laws was unconstitutional.

The decision, by Justice Douglas Rutherford of the Ontario Superior Court, marks the second time in less than a week that a judge at the court has rejected parts of the nation's new antiterrorism laws.

Justice Rutherford found that the laws, introduced after the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States, improperly defined terrorism as a crime committed with religious, ideological or political motives. That definition, he said, is "an essential element that is not only novel in Canadian law, but the impact of which constitutes an infringement of certain fundamental freedoms," including "those of religion, thought, belief, opinion, expression and association."

The constitutional challenge to the laws was brought by the first person to be charged under them, Mohammed Momin Khawaja, a 27-year-old, Canadian-born software developer.

Mr. Khawaja, a former contract employee of Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs, was arrested in Ottawa in 2004 as part of a series of raids coordinated between the British and Canadian police. In Britain, nine other people were arrested and 1,320 pounds of ammonium nitrate fertilizer, a potential bomb ingredient, was seized.

Mr. Khawaja faces seven charges under the new Canadian laws.

He remains in jail, however, because Justice Rutherford struck down only the specific definition of terrorism, without nullifying the law itself. As a result, the impact of Tuesday's decision on Mr. Khawaja's case is not clear, nor are the implications for the 17 other people who were arrested in the Toronto area in June and charged with a number of terrorism-related offenses. Patrick Charette, a spokesman for Canada's Department of Justice, said that because the bulk of the law was preserved, if not the definition of terrorism, the government would go ahead with Mr. Khawaja's trial as planned in January.

But Mr. Khawaja's lawyer, Lawrence Greenspon, said that if the government attempted to try his client, he would ask the Supreme Court of Canada to drop the charges.

"How can you proceed on charges when every one of them is a terrorism charge, but you've taken away that definition?" he said.

The definition of terrorism as a politically or religiously motivated crime, Mr. Greenspon added, has led to abuses by the Canadian police and intelligence officers. "That's why they're knocking on Muslim Canadians' doors and questioning and detaining people who are Arab or followers of Islam," he said.

Last week, another judge struck down portions of Canadian secrecy laws that were included in the antiterrorism legislation. Those parts had been used to raid the home and office of a reporter for The Ottawa Citizen newspaper.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Hit For Anthrax 'Dead-ends' (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0085796

A senior member of the Senate Judiciary Committee wants Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to explain why the FBI has not made an arrest in its anthrax investigation, citing five years of "dead-ends and a lack of progress."

"There are numerous and serious questions that need to be answered about both the investigation itself and how the FBI has handled it," Sen. Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican, said in a letter yesterday to Mr. Gonzales.

"The FBI's refusal to brief Congress over the last several years is an outrageous response to reasonable requests at getting to the bottom of the attacks."

The FBI's anthrax investigation began in October 2001 after Congress became one of the targets in the first bioterrorist attack on the United States. A letter laced with the deadly bacterium was addressed to Tom Daschle, the South Dakota Democrat serving as Senate majority leader.

Anthrax-tainted letters ultimately killed five persons in the U.S. and infected 17 others.

The FBI took primary responsibility for investigating the attacks and has described its "Amerithrax" probe as one of the largest and most complex in the history of law enforcement. The FBI said recently that it was determined to solve the case, had conducted 9,000 interviews and had issued 6,000 subpoenas.

Nearly 20 FBI agents, working with inspectors from the U.S. Postal Service, continue to pursue the case.

FBI Assistant Director Joseph Persichini Jr., who heads the Washington field office, said last month that FBI and U.S. Postal Service investigators were "fully committed to bringing the perpetrators of these murderous attacks to justice."

Mr. Persichini said the scientific advances gained from the investigation were unprecedented and had strengthened the government's ability to prepare for and prevent biological attacks.

Mr. Grassley said a detailed examination of the probe may reveal the FBI's "institutional resistance to criticism and dissent."

Mr. Grassley, who also serves as chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said many of the resources devoted to the anthrax probe since 2001 were aimed at attempting to prove that former Army scientist Steven Hatfill, once identified as a "person of interest" in the investigation, was involved in the attacks.

The Justice Department has since said that the strain of anthrax used in the attacks was available to a wider circle of people than initially thought.

Mr. Grassley called "outrageous" the FBI's prohibition of further anthrax briefings to Congress and the suggestion that lawmakers were leaking sensitive information.

"Given the allegations about FBI leaks related to [Steven] Hatfill and its similar leaks related to Richard Jewell in the Centennial Park Bombing Case, for the FBI to withhold information from Congress for fear of leaks seems a bit hypocritical, to say the least," he said.

Mr. Grassley asked, among other things, whether the FBI has been able to narrow the number of "persons of interest" and labs.

Anthrax Mystery And Misery Linger For Postal Workers (WP)

By Courtland Milloy

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

The envelope containing the anthrax was postmarked Oct. 9, 2001, and arrived at the Brentwood postal facility in Northeast Washington a few days later. The return address read, "4th Grade, Greendale School, Franklin Park, NJ 08852." But the letter had not been mailed by kids. And you could be forgiven for no longer wondering who had mailed it.

Forgiving those who'd forgotten about them -- that's what some postal workers have been trying to do for five years, ever since two of their own, Thomas L. Morris Jr., 55, and Joseph P. Curseen Jr., 47, died Oct. 21 and Oct. 22, 2001, respectively, after inhaling anthrax from that envelope. They want to forgive our forgetting how badly they had been treated. Forgive our not caring that the killer remains at large. Forgive our lack of concern that it could happen again.

They need to forgive lest bitterness and resentment corrode their souls.

"Like soldiers, we continue to work on the front line, sometimes feeling unarmed, in hopes that our health and safety needs are met, and that the culprits are apprehended," Dena Briscoe, president of a postal worker support group called Brentwood

DOJ_NMG_0085797

Exposed, told a gathering of postal employees at a memorial service last week. "We are not offered an apology from our government leaders for their hesitant reactions during the anthrax attacks, putting the mail first and leaving many still wounded."

The contaminated letter had been addressed to then-Senate Majority Leader Thomas A. Daschle (D-S.D.). The anthrax was discovered after it was opened by one of his staff members Oct. 15. Almost immediately, more than 3,000 Capitol Hill employees were methodically tested for anthrax exposure. But at the Brentwood facility, which sorts mail for the House and Senate, it took days before any of the more than 1,000 postal employees were tested -- and then only after one of them had become ill, from anthrax poisoning.

Making matters worse was the obvious racial disparity: the Capitol Hill employees were predominantly white; the postal workers, predominantly black. Moreover, health officials did not go to the postal workers as they did to those on Capitol Hill; instead, the postal workers were directed to government offices miles away, where they had to line up and wait to get a nasal cavity swab. Curseen and Morris never made it.

The memorial service was held at Israel Baptist Church, not far from the Brentwood postal facility, which has been renamed for Curseen and Morris.

Postal worker Robert Finney sang a stirring rendition of the Lord's Prayer ("And forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us"). Sylvia Berry, a former postal worker who is now a minister in North Carolina, followed up with a message of redemption through forgiving.

"It's easy to have bitterness in your heart when you believe life has been unfair," Berry said. "Some find it difficult to let go. Some never forgive. But now is a time for healing. We must learn to forgive and to love one another."

The challenge of forgiveness was highlighted by a letter from Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.) that was read to the gathering. "I can't believe that we still don't know who is behind these attacks," she wrote. "It is unacceptable that we still have no leads."

But recent expressions of concern, regret and solidarity from Mikulski and others might have advanced the process.

Rep. Albert R. Wynn (D-Md.) told the gathered postal workers: "You have our condolences, which may sound like empty words, given all that has happened. The government has failed you. To this day, we bear a measure of guilt."

And in an op-ed column for The Washington Post last week, Daschle, now a lawyer in private practice, wrote: "Five years later, the alarm I and many others experienced on that dark day has been replaced by a deep discouragement and dismay. The investigation trail has gone cold. Physical evidence that might have been gathered in the first days and weeks after the attacks is long gone. While the FBI has made gains in its scientific capabilities and understanding of anthrax, its slowness to move and its lack of direction in the early stages of the investigation led to missed opportunities."

At the memorial service, Joseph Persichini Jr., acting assistant director of the FBI's Washington field office, told the postal workers that law enforcement agents had worked extremely hard, round-the-clock, and that the failure to solve the crime had caused much grief and frustration.

"We are federal employees, with families, just like you," he said. "We want to do our jobs and do them well."

His humility seemed to soften the crowd. "The FBI now has a human face," Briscoe said.

But the wounds inflicted five years ago are still raw. And it probably doesn't help the healing that some postal workers still feel terribly vulnerable to attack.

Traveler Program In Demand (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Ten of the USA's busiest airports have asked the federal government if they can start Registered Traveler programs that would give pre-screened passengers a shortcut through security lines.

Those programs could begin by the end of the year, launching a much-delayed effort to expedite security for travelers who pass background checks.

Atlanta, Chicago O'Hare and Los Angeles airports — the nation's three busiest — have asked the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) to let them run voluntary Registered Traveler programs, along with 19 other airports.

DOJ_NMG_0085798

The TSA released a list of interested airports for the first time after a Freedom of Information Act request by USA TODAY. The agency must approve airports and companies that would enroll passengers, provide fingerprint-embedded ID cards and usher registered travelers through security.

Carter Morris, a vice president at the American Association of Airport Executives, said programs could start by the end of the year and expand quickly. “It will be a strong start,” Morris said.

Registered Traveler has faced repeated delays since Congress suggested it shortly after the 9/11 attacks. A recent TSA proposal that would have forced participants to pay about $200 a year prompted an uproar. The annual fee is now likely to be about $100.

People in Registered Traveler would go through reserved security lanes that may waive procedures such as removing shoes and coats. Airports and travel groups say the program must operate at a significant number of places to attract millions of passengers nationwide.

Steven Brill, CEO of a New York company that would run Registered Traveler programs, said 10 large airports would provide a “critical mass to ensure this program launches and flourishes.”

However, some airports that have applied have not decided whether to start the Registered Traveler program, including Baltimore and Washington's Dulles and Reagan.

A dozen small to midsize airports that have applied to start Registered Traveler, including Albany, N.Y., and Huntsville, Ala., “are looking at a way to differentiate themselves and attract business travelers,” said Larry Zmuda, a partner at Unisys, a Pennsylvania company that would run the program.

More 9/11 Remains Found At Ground Zero (AP-Y)

By Sara Kugler

AP, October 25, 2006

Mayor Michael Bloomberg acknowledged Tuesday that the city pushed for a swift cleanup at the World Trade Center but said the fast pace was an effort to return remains to victims' families quickly.

Meanwhile, 36 more bone fragments were found Tuesday in subterranean cavities along the edge of the site as workers continued burrowing into areas that were apparently missed during the initial cleanup.

Bloomberg spoke a day after The Associated Press reported that some officials handling the cleanup in 2002 had recommended a more thorough search for remains but felt rebuffed by a city agency that just wanted to finish the job.

The agency in charge of the excavation, the Department of Design and Construction, was applauded for its efficiency in 2002 after it whisked away the 10-story pile of trade center rubble in less than a year.

"Were we under time pressure? Absolutely," Bloomberg said Tuesday. "I don't know any family member that didn't want to find out whatever they could about the loved one that they lost. And we did it as fast as we could, consistent with safety and completeness."

Some victims' relatives dismissed the mayor's explanation for the quick cleanup.

"It had very little to do with the families," said Monica Gabrielle, who has no identified remains of her husband, Richard. "This is another spin — it's a diversion away from the issue, which is that management failed, not the workers. And management needs to be held accountable."

Among the officials who said they raised objections during the nine-month recovery effort was Lt. John McArdle, ground zero commander for the New York Police Department.

"There came a point in time when they said, 'We gotta try to wrap this up,' and they tried to expedite it as much as possible, and they jumped the gun, and now you have all of these families hurt, and they're finding all these body parts," he said.

Several large bones were accidentally discovered last week after a utility crew opened up a non-working manhole. Since then, the city has been tearing up the pavement and examining other underground pockets in the same vicinity, which is a service road along the western edge of the 16-acre site.

In the past few days, more than 100 bones and fragments have been recovered. The medical examiner's office is working to match them to victims.

DOJ_NMG_0085799

Thousands of pieces recovered during the main excavation still have not yielded matches, leaving more than 40 percent of the attack's 2,749 victims without any trace of remains.

The newly discovered bones are just the latest finding of overlooked remains. Hundreds of bone fragments have been found on the roof of a building just south of the trade center site, and officials are eyeing whether other buildings need to be combed again.

Analysis: Whites Challenged Katrina Insurers More (USAT/AP)

By Rukmini Callimachi And Frank Bass

USA Today, October 25, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — The Little and Kitchens families watched helplessly as Hurricane Katrina battered their homes. Both families waited patiently for an insurance adjuster to settle their losses. And both were sorely disappointed with the outcome.

Then, their paths diverged.

Richard and Cindy Little, a white couple living in a predominantly white neighborhood, filed a complaint with the Louisiana Department of Insurance. Eventually, they won full reimbursement.

Doretha and Roy Kitchens, a black couple living in New Orleans' overwhelmingly black Lower 9th Ward, simply gave up and took what their insurer gave them. They didn't know they could appeal to the state.

Though poor and minority neighborhoods suffered the brunt of Katrina, residents living in white neighborhoods have been three times as likely as homeowners in black neighborhoods to seek state help in resolving insurance disputes, according to an Associated Press computer analysis of Louisiana's insurance complaints settled in the first year after Katrina.

“The blacks didn't complain 'cause they got tired,” said Doretha Kitchens, 58, who recalls numerous phone calls to her insurer. Ultimately, she accepted her insurer's offer of about $34,000 for damage that actually totaled more than $120,000.

The insurance industry and state regulators say they made special efforts to reach out to poor and minority neighborhoods.

“The message doesn't get to everyone,” Louisiana Insurance Commissioner Jim Donelon said.

More than 700,000 insurance claims were filed for Hurricane Katrina damage in Gulf Coast states and to date, only $14.9 billion of $25.3 billion in insured losses has been paid, the national risk modeling company ISO estimates.

In Louisiana, more than 8,000 residents have filed Katrina-related complaints with the state insurance office. The AP obtained the files of more than 3,000 settled complaints and analyzed the outcomes.

Nearly 75% of the settled cases were filed by residents currently living in predominantly white neighborhoods. Twenty-five percent were filed by households in majority-black ZIP codes.

Donelon said his department made an extra effort to reach as many people as possible and let them know the agency was willing to press their case with insurers.

That message never reached the water-stained stoop of Doretha Kitchens' house, which was enveloped in a 9-foot surge of muddy water.

Kitchens didn't know she could appeal Allstate's settlement offer to the state, but doubts it would have changed anything. Her husband, she said, simply lost faith that anyone would help.

“My husband didn't want to be bothered. I asked him, ‘Why don't we sue the insurance company?' He said, ‘They ain't gonna do nothing no way.' ”

Richard and Cindy Little's home in Slidell had extensive damage. When their insurer agreed to pay two-thirds of the repair cost, the Littles used their savings to cover the construction, then began battling Allstate over the settlement. Eventually, their efforts paid off.

“We had money in the bank so we could wait them out,” said Cindy Little, 50.

Mike Trevino, a spokesman for Allstate, said the state agency treated minority and white homeowners equally. The figures obtained by the AP support his contention.

Aloyd Edinburgh, 75, who lives in the Lower 9th Ward, couldn't wait it out.

Insurers gave him $35,000 out of a policy worth $85,000.

“The best thing I can do is take the money I did receive and go to work,” he says.

Safer, Stronger, Smarter (USAT)

By Norman C. Francis

USA Today, October 25, 2006

On Aug. 29, 2005, the world watched as federal levees failed our city of 450,000 people — leading to 1,400 deaths and flooding tens of thousands of our homes and businesses. Following the most catastrophic engineering breakdown in U.S. history, the Army Corps of Engineers acknowledged that its levees failed in a storm they were engineered to withstand.

In response to this tragedy, we in Louisiana have pledged to acknowledge our risks and rebuild safer, stronger and smarter. This isoftentimes an unpopular position, but we've stuck to that commitment. Governor Kathleen Blanco, the Louisiana Legislature and the Louisiana Recovery Authority went far beyond what was required of us. We adopted a tough, new statewide building code and FEMA's new flood elevation guidelines. With funding from President Bush and Congress, we created programs to allow families to sell us their flood-damaged homes or elevate as they make repairs.

These incentives are helping people do the difficult work of rebuilding to a higher standard of safety.

Nobody lives risk-free in this world. But federal investments of nearly $6 billion to repair and strengthen our levees, combined with our adoption of the international building code and FEMA's flood guidance, means that we are using the best available science to reduce that risk to a manageable level.

What if Washington, D.C., were hit by a hurricane? Would we question whether to rebuild? What if the levees protecting Sacramento failed as ours did? What good is levee protection if homeowners are not allowed to build behind them? The question that should be answered in cases like ours is not whether to rebuild Louisiana, but how to do so safely.

We are answering these questions as we buy out houses in flood-prone areas and help families elevate in compliance with the best flood guidance available. In doing so, we echo the president's adviser on Gulf Coast recovery, Donald Powell, who said, “These advisories will provide a greater degree of certainty and confidence to the citizens of New Orleans, who are anxious to rebuild their homes and businesses … and to help them make sound rebuilding decisions.”

Norman C. Francis is chairman of the Louisiana Recovery Authority.

New Orleans Plan: Rebuild In Flood Zones, Hand You The Bill (USAT)

USA Today, October 25, 2006

The definition of insanity, according to Benjamin Franklin, is doing the same thing over and over and expecting different results.

Ben, welcome to New Orleans.

Nearly three-quarters of 14,534 New Orleanians who've applied for federal grants say they'll rebuild their Hurricane Katrina-damaged homes in flood areas — even though city restrictions are unlikely to protect their homes if the levees fail again, USA TODAY's Anne Rochell Konigsmark reported last week.

The latest plan calls for the Louisiana Recovery Authority to dole out grants of up to $150,000 to cover uninsured losses, which residents can use to rebuild or relocate. To qualify, homeowners in and around the city must raise their homes by at least 3 feet and purchase federal flood insurance.

So let's see. Federal taxpayers will be subsidizing reconstruction in flood areas, underwriting the insurance on those homes and will no doubt have to bail out the flood insurance program if the homes get wiped out again. The program collected only $2.2 billion last year in premiums but will pay out more than $20 billion in Katrina claims, leaving taxpayers on the hook for the rest. Worse, the program encourages development in areas subject to flooding — not just in New Orleans, but everywhere — by offering insurance at bargain rates in areas where private insurers fear to tread. That increases the population in vulnerable areas, leading to more costly disasters.

It is an absurd use of taxpayers' money, to which New Orleans is adding an expensive new twist.

Certainly, the homeowners in and around New Orleans deserve some assistance because of the magnitude of the disaster and the failure of federally constructed levees to protect them. But encouraging rebuilding in the most flood-prone areas is foolhardy.

DOJ_NMG_0085801

The 3-foot rule, adopted Sept. 1 by the New Orleans City Council, makes little sense and is a poor substitute for a comprehensive rebuilding plan. An extra yard of elevation isn't needed in areas that didn't flood after Katrina, and it's too low in areas that saw as much as 20 feet of water. Just ask those who had to be rescued from their rooftops. If there's another catastrophic event, thousands of homes could flood again under the new rules, says Federal Emergency Management Agency Deputy Director Doug Bellomo.

To prevent such an event, $6 billion is being spent to upgrade the 350 miles of levees around New Orleans. But parts of that system remain suspect, and work won't be done until 2010 at best. This year's tame hurricane season is no reason for complacency. The truth is, New Orleans won't be safe from a Katrina-scale storm for many years.

Recovery after Katrina is a mammoth undertaking that should be managed at the municipal and state level. But if local authorities allow residents to rebuild in the most dangerous areas, it should be at their own risk. Asking taxpayers around the USA to subsidize, underwrite and bail them out again fits Franklin's definition of nuts.

WAR NEWS:

General Weighs 2nd Troop Shift To Calm Baghdad (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 24 — The top American military commander in Iraq said Tuesday that it was possible he might need to call for an increase in American troop levels in Baghdad to reinvigorate a plan to recapture the capital's streets from insurgents and death squads.

In a news conference held after a week of largely bad news from Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad sought to reassure an increasingly restive American public that the war was still winnable.

Mr. Khalilzad laid out a timetable for political measures he said the Iraqi government had agreed to take that the Americans see as crucial to tamping down sectarian violence, and General Casey predicted that Iraqi troops would be able to take over the main burden of the war in 12 to 18 months, allowing American troops to move to a support role. [Military analysis, page A8.]

But the two men, America's top officials in Iraq, did not address what would happen if the government failed to meet the timetable, which includes measures meant to address some of the most intractable issues plaguing the country, including the sectarian militias that have been responsible for much of the worst violence this year.

General Casey declined to specify steps he would take to adjust the Baghdad security plan, which military officials acknowledged last week had failed to stem the violence in the capital. But he said troop increases — on top of several thousand additional American troops deployed when the Baghdad crackdown began in August — were among the options to secure the capital.

"Now, do we need more troops to do that?" he said. "Maybe. And as I've said all along, if we do, I will ask for the troops we need, both coalition and Iraqi."

He said his options could include deploying more Iraqi soldiers, bringing in more American troops to Baghdad from the 141,000 already in Iraq, or getting reinforcements from American troops deployed outside the country.

To increase combat forces further might require calling in some troops on standby in the region or extending the tours of units nearing the end of their 12-month tours in Iraq, which in turn could mean calling up reserves. Such a move would be politically unpopular, particularly in the run-up to an election in which the war has become a highly charged issue.

General Casey said earlier this month that he might need more troops in Iraq, but he gave no indication Tuesday, nor have other senior commanders, that such a request had been made.

Civilian deaths in Baghdad have been at near-record rates, and American casualties are running at their highest level in two years, with 90 troops having lost their lives so far in October. On Tuesday, American troops intensified their search for a soldier the military said had been abducted while visiting relatives in Baghdad on Monday.

In the past 10 days, two Iraqi cities, Balad and Amara, have been briefly taken over by militia gangs after American and British forces withdrew, and the civilian death toll across the country in October has remained at close to the record levels of the summer months, when it reached an average of about 100 a day. The situation has fed uncertainty about the war in the United States, prompting President Bush to reaffirm his commitment to the war, but to express a readiness to adjust tactics as the situation demands.

Maj. Gen. J. D. Thurman, commander of the Fourth Infantry Division who is the operational commander for Baghdad, said in an interview with The New York Times earlier this week that his first requirement was more Iraqi troops. He said the Iraqis had promised four battalions for the Baghdad operation, and committed only two. The general said he had not asked for more American troops.

General Casey and Mr. Khalilzad said that Iraqi leaders must set aside sectarian differences to unite behind "a national compact" within the next 12 months that will help overcome sectarian divisions driving the war. Mr. Khalilzad said the crucial issues to be settled included demobilizing sectarian militias, a fair division of national oil revenues, amendments to the 2005 Constitution to guarantee all Iraqis equal rights, and a new deal for former Baath party members to balance "accountability and reconciliation."

Also required, he said, was an increase in the "credibility and capability of Iraqi forces," whose performance, desertion rates and unwillingness to deploy outside their home areas has continued to disappoint American commanders.

"The recent sectarian bloodshed in Iraq causes many to question whether the United States and the Iraqis can succeed," Mr. Khalilzad said in his opening statement. "My message today is straightforward: Despite the difficult challenges we face, success in Iraq is possible and can be achieved by a realistic timetable." But he added a crucial proviso: "Iraqi leaders must step up to achieve key political and security milestones on which they have agreed."

A copy of the timeline Mr. Khalilzad said had been agreed to by Iraqi leaders was made available to The New York Times by American officials. Entitled "notional political timetable," it sets a seven-month schedule, running from this September to March 2007, to complete a 16-point agenda on divisive issues.

But the document provides deadlines only for the Iraqis to establish the legislative and executive framework for action on the most decisive issues, not for the implementation of policies that American officials believe is urgent if the tide in the war is to be reversed. A case in point is the sectarian militias, whose involvement in the killings of thousands of Iraqis this year has been identified by American officials as the most pressing issue of all. Without an end to the militia threat, they have said, no military action by American and Iraqi forces can win the war.

The timeline provided by the Americans sets a December deadline for Iraq's Parliament to pass laws setting terms for an amnesty for those willing to renounce bloodshed, and for other measures governing the demobilization of militias and means of reintegrating their members into civilian life. Iraqi leaders have promised to move against the militias since Iraq resumed sovereignty in June 2004, but three prime ministers, including Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who took office in May, have repeatedly deferred action.

Even as American and Iraqi troops have battled sectarian militias in the Baghdad crackdown, Mr. Maliki has held firm, saying that persuading the powerful political groups that control the militias to disband them requires a political consensus, not the tough military action favored by American commanders.

For the prime minister, the issue is one of political survival, since the political groups whose power is underpinned by the two main Shiite militias, the Mahdi Army and the Badr Organization, both identified by American commanders as operating death squads, are key partners in the Shiite alliance that controls the government.

The news of the timetable drew reactions in Washington that ran mostly along party lines.

Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina and a member of the Armed Services Committee, called the statements from General Casey and the ambassador "encouraging."

"They understand the security situation is lacking and working with our Iraqi allies, they understand the need to get it right," he said.

But Representative Ike Skelton of Missouri, the senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee said: "After three and a half years of training, this timetable is too long." He said he had been telling the administration to set a timetable for two years and called General Casey's statements, "a sobering assessment from our top military commander of how much farther Iraq's forces still have to go."

DOJ_NMG_0085803

Like Mr. Khalilzad, General Casey alluded to the growing popular and Congressional restiveness toward the war, saying, "I'm sure for the folks back in the United States trying to look at this, it looks very confusing and hard to understand." He said the war had reached "a difficult situation" that was "likely to remain that way over the near term," but offered a more hopeful projection for 2007 and 2008, a period that would carry American troops here to the fifth anniversary of the invasion that overthrew Saddam Hussein.

The American commander said the rebuilding of Iraq's security forces was about 75 percent complete. He said almost 90 of the 112 American-trained Iraqi Army battalions are "in the lead" across Iraq, meaning that they have taken over the primary combat role from Americans.

"Make no mistake about it, we are in a tough fight here in the center of the country and in Anbar Province" to the west of Baghdad, base to much of the Sunni insurgency, the general said. "But I think it's important to remind people that 90 percent of the sectarian violence in Iraq takes place in about a 30-mile radius from the center of Baghdad, and that, secondly, 90 percent of that violence takes place in five provinces" of the 18 that make up Iraq. "This is not a country that is awash in sectarian violence."

General Casey said that American troop withdrawals can and must be made as Iraqi forces improve. But he refused to set any hard-and-fast deadlines, saying that withdrawals would depend on developments in the war. "The Iraqis are getting better," he said.

"I still very strongly believe that we need to continue to reduce our forces as the Iraqis continue to improve, because we need to get out of their way," the general said.

In other developments on Tuesday, the American military command said that four more American troops had died in rebel attacks in Iraq. With a week to go, October has already become the deadliest month for American troops in 12 months and is on pace to become the third deadliest month of the conflict. Three troops — two marines and a sailor — were killed Monday in Anbar Province, the military said, and a soldier died early Tuesday from wounds he sustained when his patrol was struck by a concealed bomb in Baghdad.

In Falluja on Monday, American troops, responding to a report that a fire truck had been hijacked by insurgents, stopped a fire truck matching the description, the command reported. As the truck's four occupants "exited quickly," the statement said, the troops opened fire, killing them.

American troops later found that the men were actually firefighters responding to an emergency call and were not riding in the hijacked truck.

In Baghdad, an intensive military search continued Tuesday for an American soldier who was reported missing late Monday. Military officials said that the soldier, who is of Iraqi descent and works as an interpreter, appeared to have left the fortified Green Zone on Monday afternoon to visit with family members in Baghdad. A military statement, citing witnesses, said the soldier was at a relative's house when men wearing "dark-colored rags over their noses and mouths" pulled up in three cars, handcuffed the soldier and took him away in one of the vehicles.

The kidnappers later called a relative of the soldier using the victim's cellphone, the statement said.

Hundreds of American and Iraqi security forces, backed by attack helicopters and unmanned aerial surveillance drones, surged into the central Baghdad neighborhood of Karada on Monday night, sealing off roads and bridges, searching vehicles, and raiding homes and offices.

The sweep continued all day Monday, snarling traffic throughout the center of the capital. The American military said that among other locations, its troops had raided the Al Furat television station, which is owned by the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a powerful Shiite party; and Saeed Adrees Mosque, a Shiite mosque.

American officials vowed to continue the search until the missing serviceman was rescued. "We will leverage all available coalition resources to find this soldier," said General Thurman.

More U.S. Troops May Be Iraq-Bound (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0085804

BAGHDAD, Oct. 24 -- The top American commander in Iraq said Tuesday that he may call for more troops to be sent to Baghdad, possibly by increasing the overall U.S. presence in Iraq, as rising bloodshed pushes Iraqi and American deaths to some of their highest levels of the war.

The commander, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., also said he now believed Iraqi forces would be ready to take over security responsibility from the Americans no sooner than late 2007 or early 2008. The announcement of a 12- to 18-month target again pushes back the withdrawal of the bulk of the 145,000 or so U.S. troops in Iraq.

Casey spoke alongside U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad at a rare joint news conference in Baghdad's Green Zone, aiming to show that U.S. and Iraqi leaders were confronting surging sectarian violence. Both men acknowledged that both the course and nature of the war have changed this year, as Iraq's Shiite Muslim majority and Sunni minority battle for power, resources and, lately, survival.

"Make no mistake about it: We are in a tough fight here in the center of the country and in Anbar province," Casey said, emphasizing that the worst of the bloodletting was in Baghdad.

"This is not a country that is awash in sectarian violence," Casey said. "The situation's hard, but it's not a country that's awash in sectarian violence."

Casey said later that any additional troops for Baghdad could come from a variety of sources, including from the Iraqi military, from U.S. forces elsewhere in Iraq or from outside the theater.

Khalilzad framed the Iraqi conflict as part of the struggle for security in the Middle East, which he called "the challenge of our age." He sought to rally flagging public support in the United States for the war and answer calls -- led by Democrats -- to set a timeline for American withdrawal.

"The recent sectarian bloodshed in Iraq causes many to question whether the United States and the Iraqis can succeed," Khalilzad said. "My message today is straightforward: Despite the difficult challenges we face, success in Iraq is possible and can be achieved on a realistic timetable."

But events inside and outside the Green Zone on Tuesday highlighted the stubbornness of the basic problems with which U.S. forces have struggled since the 2003 invasion: security and infrastructure. Killings by insurgents in the western province of Anbar helped push up the October death toll among American troops in Iraq by four service members to 91, the U.S. military said Tuesday, the highest monthly total for American forces in the country in 12 months.

And Casey and Khalilzad, the top U.S. military and civilian leaders in Iraq, were left for several minutes to deliver their remarks in darkness illuminated only by the battery-powered lights of TV camera crews. One of Baghdad's frequent power outages cut electricity to the converted parking garage that houses the U.S. military press center, briefly knocking the internationally broadcast conference off the air.

For Casey and his predecessors, the question of whether President Bush dedicated enough troops to the Iraq war has been one of those most frequently asked -- and hotly debated. While Casey has raised troop strength temporarily as high as 150,000 for Iraqi national elections, his stock answer has been that if he felt additional troops were needed, he would ask for them.

On Tuesday, Casey said he might ask for them. If Iraqi leaders can resolve their differences and if Iraqi security forces improve, "I think [we] can put Iraq in a very good place in 12 months.

"Now, do we need more troops to do that? Maybe."

It is not clear whether Iraqi or U.S. forces in Iraq, which already are stretched thin, could provide substantially more troops for duty in the capital, however.

American commanders have complained, usually privately, that the Iraqi government has failed to provide many of the Iraqi troops they requested earlier to try to stabilize Baghdad. In September, commanders had a weeks-old request for 3,000 more Iraqi troops for the capital; only a few hundred arrived, Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman, the U.S. commander for Baghdad, said last month. Some Iraqi battalions have mutinied rather than answer orders to deploy to Baghdad.

U.S. commanders moved at least 6,000 more American troops to Baghdad over the summer for Operation Together Forward, an effort to arrest the violence in the capital. To get those extra troops, commanders had to take the unpopular step of extending one unit's deployment just as it was going home to its base in Alaska, as well as calling in emergency reserves based in Kuwait.

In all, about 15,000 American troops and 9,000 Iraqi soldiers are now deployed in Baghdad for the special security operation.

Despite the concentration of efforts in the capital, violence here has climbed more than 43 percent since midsummer. Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the top U.S. spokesman in Iraq, said last week that attacks had climbed 22 percent in the first two weeks of the Islamic holy month of Ramadan, which began in late September, compared with the preceding two weeks.

The toll is highest among Iraqi civilians. More than 2,660 Iraqis were killed in Baghdad last month alone, the highest such figure for the war. The average daily number of attacks on Iraqi security forces is also at a high, the U.S. Defense Department said in a report in late August.

Casey said U.S. and Iraqi authorities would adjust their Baghdad military plan to combat the rising attacks. He declined to give specifics.

Iraqis and Americans here face "a difficult situation, and it's likely to remain that way over the near term," Khalilzad said.

U.S. and Iraqi leaders were adjusting political goals in Iraq as well, Khalilzad said, to cope with a conflict that has expanded from an insurgency alone to an insurgency increasingly overshadowed by sectarian violence.

Khalilzad said Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki had agreed to timelines for accomplishing several specific goals, including developing a plan to deal with militias and reforming Iraq's Interior Ministry by the end of the year.

Militias connected to the Shiite religious parties that lead Iraq's government are accused by U.S. officials, Iraqi Sunnis and others of being lead players in increasingly brazen attacks on Sunnis. In the south, where Sunnis are few, Shiite militias fight each other.

According to Khalilzad, Maliki told U.S. officials that Moqtada al-Sadr, the Shiite cleric who leads the most feared militia, had agreed to the creation of a plan for disarming militias.

However, Sadr has said he does not consider his armed followers to be a militia, and thus sees them as outside any plan to break up the militias, according to one diplomat here. It was not clear if Sadr's alleged commitment to Maliki superseded that.

On Tuesday, Sadr called for an end to religious killings.

"I totally reject any Shiite-Shiite fighting or Sunni-Shiite sectarian fighting in Iraq under any pretext," he said in a speech in the southern holy city of Najaf. "Protecting Iraq is our main goal, and the expulsion of the occupation troops from the country is our objective, too."

Armed bands claiming to be part of Sadr's militia have kept up the violence despite similar calls from Sadr in recent months. At least in part, Sadr appears not fully in command of the thousands of armed men claiming allegiance to him.

Iraq's Interior Ministry also is controlled by the Shiite religious parties, and U.S. commanders concede it is heavily infiltrated by the Shiite militias.

Khalilzad said Iraqi leaders have agreed that, over the next 12 months, they will come up with a national compact for reconciliation and a plan that fairly shares Iraq's oil wealth, have a program on militias in place and work on Iraq's security institutions.

Since taking office in May, Maliki has postponed promised action on militias and on national reconciliation, frustrating American officials as the U.S. toll rises and Iraq's divisions deepen. Khalilzad on Tuesday urged Iraqi leaders to "step up" to their responsibilities.

American commanders also have repeatedly set rough dates for when U.S. troops might start to withdraw, only to roll back those dates as Iraq's troubles worsened.

Casey said last year that he hoped for "fairly significant" withdrawals by spring 2006, but he said Tuesday that rising sectarian violence had made such a drawdown impossible.

In Washington, some Democrats responded to Khalilzad's and Casey's messages by demanding that the United States pull out troops if Iraqis miss their deadlines.

DOJ_NMG_0085806

"We need to make clear that American troops will be leaving within a year to force Iraqis to make the tough compromises," Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) said in a statement. "Only then do we have a chance to make Iraqis stand up for Iraq and bring our troops home."

"We must accelerate the timeline of training Iraqi security forces" and double the number of U.S. trainers, said Rep. Ike Skelton (Mo.), ranking member of the House Armed Services Committee. "American force readiness is at critically low levels and will only fully recover when significant numbers of personnel and equipment can begin to redeploy from Iraq."

Iraqis To Plan Timeline For Reducing Violence (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The top U.S. military commander in Iraq said today that more U.S. troops might be needed to quell sectarian violence raging in the capital.

In a news conference with the American ambassador, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. said he was open to requesting more American troops given the conflict's complexity and seriousness, especially in Baghdad.

During October, U.S. and Iraqi forces have come under increased attacks, with at least 90 U.S. troops killed in the highest American monthly death toll this year. Another 300 Iraqi troops have also been killed during the holy month of Ramadan, according to Casey. Most of the U.S. and Iraqi casualties have been killed in Baghdad.

The war in Iraq is a key issue in the Nov. 7 U.S. election and the Bush administration has been keen to play down any shift in Iraq policy. At the same time, President Bush has dropped the refrain that the United States will "stay the course" in Iraq, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow confirmed Monday.

"He stopped using it," Snow said of the phrase, suggesting that it left the impression the administration was not adjusting to conditions in Iraq.

Last week, military spokesman Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV described the continued violence in Baghdad as "disheartening," suggesting that the military was recasting its strategy.

In the past, military officials have described the strategy in Baghdad as "clear, hold and build." While the U.S. military is able to clear neighborhoods of insurgents, holding and building has proved more problematic.

"Do we need more troops to do that? Maybe," Casey said at the news conference. "If we do, I'll ask for the troops we need, both coalition and Iraqis."

There are now 147,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

Casey acknowledged that he had initially projected a significant reduction of troops this year but that, by late June, it became clear that more U.S. forces were needed to augment Iraqi security forces still being trained.

"It's going to take another 12 to 18 months or so till I believe the Iraqi security forces are completely capable of taking over responsibility for their own security," Casey said, repeating a statement he made last month.

During the same news conference, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad emphasized a political timetable, saying the Iraqi government has agreed to begin resolving fundamental disputes through a "national compact."

Iraqi politicians differ on issues such as disarming militias and insurgents, revenue sharing and constitutional amendments. "Iraqi officials have agreed to a timeline for making these difficult decisions," Khalilzad said.

However, it was unclear what will happen if the Iraqi politicians fail to meet the agreed upon timeline.

Khalilzad also said the Bush administration has approached some of Iraq's neighbors for help.

"We are reaching out to Arab states, such as Saudi Arabia, the UAE [United Arab Emirates] and Jordan, to help by encouraging these groups to end the violence and work for a united and independent Iraq and to work against Al Qaeda," he said. "These countries have promised to be helpful."

Other neighbors have not been helpful, he said, pointing to Iran and Syria. "Both Iran and Syria continue to be decidedly unhelpful by providing support to the different extremists groups operating in Iraq," Khalilzad said.

U.S. Shifts Onus To Iraqis To Find Political Solution (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

DOJ_NMG_0085807

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

With few military options left to counter the violence across Iraq, top U.S. officials are shifting more of the onus onto Baghdad's beleaguered political leaders to broker compromises they hope might stem the rising bloodshed.

In a sign that Washington is turning up pressure on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to act, U.S. officials in Baghdad and Washington yesterday said progress on resolving Iraq's ethnic and religious rifts must come soon.

The focus on Baghdad's fledgling government follows the U.S. military's admission last week that its four-month-old plan to secure the Iraqi capital by concentrating U.S. and Iraqi forces there hasn't worked as hoped. It also comes amid congressional-election campaigns in which Republicans and Democrats are pressing the Bush administration to radically change its approach in Iraq.

But little in Iraq over the past three years offers reason for optimism that the renewed pressure on Mr. Maliki will produce better results. Over that period, the U.S. has tried various military tactics -- having U.S. troops take the lead, having them step back from major cities, inserting them deep into urban conflict zones or having them stay on the perimeters -- only to see the security situation worsen steadily. At the same time, American officials have been disappointed in Mr. Maliki, considering him too passive in addressing Iraq's deep political rifts and too timid in confronting the militias that increasingly pose serious security problems.

Mr. Maliki took office in May after almost five months of postelection political wrangling among Shiite Muslims, Sunni Muslims and Kurds. From the outset, U.S. officials knew his "unity government" had a weak grip on power and a limited ability to achieve deals on exceedingly divisive issues such as distribution of oil revenue, amnesty for Sunni insurgents and the dissolution of Shiite militias.

As sectarian violence worsened during the summer, top U.S. officials decided to flood Baghdad with troops and checkpoints in an effort to stem the chaos and help the weak Maliki government build some much needed credibility with the Iraqi people. According to the plan, helping the government appear stronger would make it easier for Mr. Maliki to forge much-needed compromises that would in turn enhance security. But the crackdown's failure and the lack of good military options that remain are prompting a renewed emphasis on repairing some of the deep sectarian rifts sooner rather than later.

Recent events suggest it will be hard for Mr. Maliki, who took office with support from radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, to force the changes the U.S. wants. For example, less than two days after Mr. Maliki met with Mr. Sadr and Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's most revered Shiite cleric, Mr. Sadr's militia stormed the city of Amara and clashed with local police forces and a rival Shiite militia. The violence was seen by many Iraqis as a sign of Mr. Maliki's inability to bring Mr. Sadr and his militia under control.

Democrats pounced on the shift announced yesterday as a sign of political desperation. "Today, it is no small irony that Republicans -- who desperately fear the voters' wrath in elections just two weeks from today -- have excised 'stay the course' from their vocabulary and announced that the Iraqis have agreed to a timetable for achieving political and security benchmarks," said Maryland Rep. Steny Hoyer, the second-ranking House Democrat.

In a joint news conference in Baghdad, Gen. George Casey and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, the top two U.S. officials there, said Iraqi leaders have agreed to the outlines of a plan to stabilize the country. The goal would be for Iraqi forces to take full control of security in the country in the next 12 to 18 months with "some level" of American support.

Mr. Khalilzad mentioned several areas in which progress would be measured that depend heavily on Iraqi leaders to reach political compromises on such contentious issues as the distribution of oil revenue, the disarming of militias and some sort of reconciliation program to bring warring Sunni and Shiite Muslims together. He also called for Iraqi leaders to improve the capability and credibility of their police and army forces -- with U.S. help.

"Iraqi leaders have agreed to a timeline for making the hard decisions needed to resolve these issues," Mr. Khalilzad said. He stopped short of laying out specific dates for the milestones. U.S. officials also have rejected suggestions that the U.S. would threaten to withdraw troops if the goals aren't met.

The apparent shift toward achieving a political solution stems from the limited military options available to the U.S. and Iraqis. Since August, thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops have been concentrated in Baghdad to quell violence by insurgents and sectarian death squads. The hope was that tamping down violence in the capital would make it possible to bring the rest of the country under control and give Mr. Maliki's government a much needed boost.

In a way, officials now are describing a strategy that reverses the priorities the U.S. had set for itself and its allies in the Iraqi government. Bush administration officials had long theorized that Iraq's security situation needed to be stabilized before its fledgling government would have the breathing space to solve the difficult sectarian splits and regional feuds. Now, the U.S. is proposing that Mr. Maliki needs to do more to establish a government worth defending before a security force can be built to do that job adequately.

In Washington, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley echoed the message to Mr. Maliki and his government to act now. "I think they've got to do more and they've got to do it faster," Mr. Hadley said in a radio interview at the White House. "And I think if you talked to Prime Minister al-Maliki, he would say to you the same thing."

October has been the deadliest month this year for American forces. The military yesterday announced four more U.S. troops had been killed, raising the U.S. death toll for the month to at least 91 so far. After a brief dip in late August and early September, the number of Iraqis killed in Baghdad also seems to be building again to levels similar to those before the stabilization campaign.

Despite rising casualties, Gen. Casey suggested the extra troops are making a difference. Currently there are about 15,600 American troops, 10,000 Iraqi army troops and 30,000 Iraqi police involved in Operation Forward Together, the joint military effort in the capital. Gen. Casey suggested he might ask for more soldiers to help hold onto areas of Baghdad that the U.S. had cleared of Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads.

"Do we need more troops to do that? Maybe. And as I've said all along, if we do, I will ask for the troops I need, both coalition and Iraqis," he said.

But it isn't clear whether more troops would indeed be available in large numbers. The U.S. has a relatively small force available in Kuwait that it could call on if needed. But the U.S. Army is so stretched right now by missions in Iraq and Afghanistan that it has few active-duty troops ready and equipped to flow into Iraq. Democratic Sen. Jack Reed of Rhode Island warned in a Senate hearing in August that two-thirds of the Army's active force is unready, while the remainder of the force is largely deployed.

Calling up National Guard troops to ease the pressure is also a problem. To increase significantly the size of the reserve force the Bush administration would have to change longstanding Pentagon policies that allow the Army to call up National Guard and Army Reserve troops for a second Iraq tour. Such a move would be politically unpalatable and could spark further calls from Congress to shift the plan in Iraq. Some U.S. officials also worry that sending in more American soldiers may not help much, unless they are partnered with reliable Iraqi troops who know the terrain.

In addition to laying out political milestones, Gen. Casey also said American and Iraqi officials believed that in 12 to 18 months, Iraqi security forces would be "completely capable of taking over responsibility for their own security. That's still coupled with some level of support from us."

The performance of the Iraqi army and police forces in the current Baghdad security initiative has been mixed. U.S. officials have complained that the police have been significantly infiltrated by Shiite militias. And only two of the six army battalions the Iraqis pledged to the effort have been delivered, according to reports in the New York Times. Some U.S. officials say the performance of the Iraqi forces likely will remain uneven without progress on the political front.

"An insurgency is a political struggle," said Kalev Sepp, a professor at the Naval Postgraduate School who has advised U.S. commanders in Baghdad on counterinsurgency strategy. "You can't create security forces if they don't have a government to fight for."

No Major Troop Cut In Iraq For A Year (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, October 25, 2006

BAGHDAD — U.S. officials said Tuesday that Iraq's security forces won't be able to stand on their own for another 12 to 18 months, meaning substantial numbers of U.S. forces will likely remain in Iraq through next year.

U.S. officials had previously expected to begin significant U.S. troop withdrawals by the end of this year. The reassessment follows an upsurge in sectarian violence in Baghdad and fighting in Anbar province in western Iraq. There are about 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0085809

So far in October, 91 American troops have died, making it the deadliest month for U.S. forces this year.

"It is going to take another 12 to 18 months or so till I believe the Iraqi security forces are completely capable of taking over responsibility for their own security," said Gen. George Casey, the ranking U.S. commander in Iraq.

The U.S. military will provide "some level of support" after that, he said.

He did not rule out bolstering the 15,400 American troops now in Baghdad.

In Washington, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said commanders continually reassess U.S. troop levels in Iraq based on the strength and capability of Iraqi armed forces.

"Back in August and July, we thought we might be able to reduce the size of U.S. forces by this Christmas," Pace said. "And then the violence in Baghdad increased."

In 2005, Casey said "substantial reductions" in troop levels were possible in 2006.

Casey and other U.S. officials typically qualify their forecasts by saying plans depend on the enemy and abilities of Iraqi forces.

Two weeks before congressional elections, the Bush administration has been under fire from some Republicans and Democrats for not making a course correction in the face of renewed violence in Iraq.

On Tuesday, Casey and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad held a rare news conference in the Green Zone to discuss progress in training Iraqi forces and building the nation's government.

The officials said Iraq's leaders have agreed to establish benchmarks by the end of the year that will measure the fledgling government's progress.

The milestones include cracking down on militias, creating a law to share oil wealth and persuading Sunni insurgents to lay down their arms.

The benchmarks are designed partly to pressure Iraq to move quicker to reach a political solution. Iraq's government is attempting to reach an agreement with militias and some insurgent groups to lay down their weapons. A political agreement is seen as key to ending religious warfare.

"A lot of what we're seeing right now is hasty knee-jerk reaction to the serious deterioration of Iraq," said Wayne White, who formerly headed the State Department's Iraq intelligence team and is a scholar at the Middle East Institute.

Iraqi Takeover Target Set (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

The top U.S. military commander in Iraq set a timeline yesterday of 18 months for the Iraqi security forces to take over war operations in all the country's provinces "with some level of support from us."

Army Gen. George Casey did not commit to a timeline for removing 147,000 U.S. troops, as House Democratic leaders have demanded and as President Bush has resisted. But achieving Gen. Casey's new benchmark would assuredly mean a smaller American force in Iraq, where about 2,800 U.S. service members have died since the March 2003 invasion. Iraqi forces now control operations in just two of 18 provinces.

At the same Baghdad press conference, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad announced that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has agreed to a series of benchmarks for reaching a "national compact" within 12 months to end Sunni-Shi'ite violence and equitably divide the country's wealth.

Mr. Khalilzad said Mr. al-Maliki also has agreed to come up with a plan for controlling various militias, such as the Mahdi Army of firebrand cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, by year's end. But Mr. Khalilzad offered no specifics on how Mr. al-Maliki will accomplish a task he has so far resisted.

"Iraqi leaders must step up to achieve key political and security milestones on which they have agreed," he said. "The prime minister has a timeline of developing a plan by the end of the year, and we support that."

The joint press conference capped a week of intensified rhetoric on Iraq as the Bush administration urges the al-Maliki government to move faster to take over security chores and let U.S. forces go home.

DOJ_NMG_0085810

Pressed by Democrats and some Republicans to change course as more than 90 U.S. troops have died in Iraq this month, Mr. Bush telephoned Mr. al-Maliki last week to convey a sense of urgency. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld declared last week Iraq must take over more security missions "sooner rather than later."

Gen. Casey, who boosted U.S. troop levels in Iraq from 132,000 to 147,000 in the face of war breaking out in Baghdad, offered no concrete assurances that yesterday's announced plan would result in reductions. He said his forces face a "fundamental change" in the enemy from a year ago. Added to the al Qaeda suicide bombers and Iraqi Sunni insurgents is an outgrowth of armed groups under no one's central control who roam the Baghdad area killing civilians.

Gen. Casey's chief spokesman declared last week that a huge influx of security forces into Baghdad the past three months had failed to reduce violence. Gen. Casey took a different view yesterday.

"The Baghdad security plan continues to have a dampening effect on sectarian violence," he said. "The situation is hard, but it's not a country that's awash in sectarian violence."

There are today more than 300,000 Iraqis security forces. The military says six of 10 army divisions are "in the lead," which means they can conduct operations on their own but need U.S. support.

Mr. Khalilzad predicted that by November 2007 he will have a "national compact in place" that better defines the division of oil wealth among Sunnis, majority Shi'ites and Kurds. The compact also would include changes to the ongoing "de-Ba'athification" program to promote reconciliation among some of Saddam Hussein's old party members.

Two other parts of the overall plan are to induce Iraqi political leaders to get armed groups in Baghdad to disarm, and have moderate neighboring states to persuade Sunni leaders to end their insurgency.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California was not impressed.

"General Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, confirmed this morning that staying the course -- no matter what slogan this administration chooses to attach to it -- means it will be another 12 to 18 months before the Iraqis will be able to provide security for their country," the Democrat said. "With the war in Iraq now more than 3½ years old, Iraq engulfed in chaos, and U.S. casualties continuing to mount, this is simply unacceptable."

The general made his announcement after a Saturday teleconference from Baghdad with Mr. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, Mr. Rumsfeld and other leaders. His announcement is the closest the administration has come to setting a timetable without changing overall war strategy, as critics demand.

Gen. Casey got advice yesterday from House Armed Services Chairman Duncan Hunter of California and 32 other House Republicans. In a letter to Mr. Bush and Mr. Rumsfeld, they urged the two to order more Iraqi battalions into Baghdad.

"Combat experience is gained by one thing -- combat," the letter said. "There is no reason why Iraqi military forces currently deployed in relatively quiet regions of Iraq should not immediately be sent to the fight in Baghdad."

U.S. Says More GIs May Be Needed In Iraq (AP-Y)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, October 25, 2006

Two weeks before U.S. midterm elections, American officials unveiled a timeline Tuesday for Iraq's Shiite-led government to take specific steps to calm the world's most dangerous capital and said more U.S. troops might be needed to quell the bloodshed.

U.S. officials previously said they were satisfied with troop levels and had expected to make significant reductions by year's end. But a surge in sectarian killings, which welled up this past summer, forced them to reconsider.

At a rare joint news conference with the American ambassador, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, said additional U.S. troops could come from inside or outside Iraq to "improve basic services for the population of Baghdad."

"Now, do we need more troops to do that? Maybe. And, as I've said all along, if we do, I will ask for the troops I need, both coalition and Iraqis," Casey said. There are currently 144,000 U.S. forces in Iraq.

The military has expressed disappointment over its two-month drive to cleanse the capital of Sunni insurgents and Shiite militia fighters and death squads. But the Americans also say that for the situation to improve, the Iraqi government must make political concessions to minority Sunnis.

DOJ_NMG_0085811

The timeline grew out of recent Washington meetings at which the Bush administration sought to reshape its Iraq policy amid mounting U.S. deaths and declining domestic support for the 44-month-old war. The plan was made public a day after White House press secretary Tony Snow said the U.S. was adjusting its Iraq strategy but would not issue any ultimatums.

U.S. officials revealed neither specific incentives for the Iraqis to implement the plan nor penalties for their failure to do so. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said Iraqi leaders had agreed to the timeline, benchmarks heavily laden with enticements to Sunni insurgents.

The lack of any real political consensus even among Shiites, however, has made it extremely difficult for Iraqi leaders to keep deadlines; for example, they missed targeted dates on naming a government and in moving forward on constitutional amendments. Moreover, Tuesday's declarations lacked specifics on how to accomplish the goals.

At the news conference with Casey, Khalilzad said the timeline would require Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government to set dates by the end of the year for completing six key tasks.

Five of the markers are clearly designed to mollify Sunni Arabs, the Muslim sect that makes up the bulk of the insurgency and is responsible for most American deaths in Iraq.

The plan seeks deadlines for passing a law that would guarantee the sharing of Iraq's oil wealth, amending the constitution, turning an anti-Baathist organization into a reconciliation body, disbanding Shiite militias and setting a date for provincial elections — all key issues for Sunnis.

The de-Baathification Commission was established after the toppling of Saddam Hussein to ensure that members of the dictator's political organization did not hold government positions.

The sixth measure called for "increasing the credibility and capability of Iraqi forces."

Casey said Iraqi forces would be "completely capable" of controlling the country within the next 1 1/2 years.

"We are about 75 percent of the way through a three-step process in building those (Iraqi) forces," the general said. "It is going to take another 12 to 18 months or so until I believe the Iraqi security forces are completely capable of taking over responsibility for their own security. That's still coupled with some level of support from us."

Casey's estimate of when the Iraqi army will be ready was noteworthy because it has not changed even as the security situation in the country has deteriorated. Iraqis are now being killed at a pace of more than 40 each day in sectarian fighting and revenge killing.

Complicating the matter has been the recent outbreak of sustained Shiite-on-Shiite violence in the once relatively calm south of the country.

To curb the spreading and increasingly brutal killings, Khalilzad said the United States was "inducing Iraqi political and religious leaders who can control or influence armed groups in Baghdad to agree to stop sectarian violence," an apparent reference to recent secret talks the United States has conducted with Sunni insurgents.

Al-Maliki has repeatedly said he would rein in Shiite militias but so far has taken little public action beyond a decision to move aside two police commando leaders. He issued a statement on Monday saying the military had been ordered to take action against any illegal armed group, but the declaration, like the timeline introduced on Tuesday, lacked detail.

His national security adviser, Mouwafak al-Rubaie, sought to add weight to the prime minister's directive in an interview with CNN. He was, however, equally fuzzy about what action would be taken.

"The Iraqi security forces are going to take on anyone who challenges" them," al-Rubaie said.

Khalilzad said he had assurances from al-Maliki that radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr would disband his Mahdi Army. But al-Sadr draws much of his power from his control over the heavily armed fighters. And al-Maliki draws much of his support from al-Sadr.

For that reason, disbanding the feared militia group appears to be a promise that is unlikely to be kept in the near term. Such a move would leave the other main Shiite militia, the Badr Brigade of the Supreme Council for the Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, in a dominant position.

Al-Sadr and SCIRI leader Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim maintain a sharp rivalry for power over Iraq's Shiite majority. Logic dictates that both militias be disbanded simultaneously, which appears highly unlikely.

DOJ_NMG_0085812

While Shiite militias and death squad violence represent a major security problem, curbing them would still leave the other half of the equation unsolved — the continued vibrancy of the Sunni insurgency that has been attacking Americans with a vengeance since summer 2003.

The timeline appeared, therefore, largely directed at luring the Sunni establishment away from violence and into the political process.

October has been the deadliest month this year for American forces. The military Tuesday announced the deaths of two more U.S. Marines, a sailor and a soldier. Since the start of the war, 2,801 U.S. service members have died in Iraq, according to an Associated Press count.

Also Tuesday, the military said it had found no sign of a U.S. Army translator missing after he was believed to have been kidnapped the night before in Baghdad. Troops continued to search the city's downtown on foot and by air.

The military said the soldier, a linguist who was not identified by name, was last seen inside Green Zone on Monday. He was then believed to have left to visit Iraqi relatives in the city.

He was apparently at the relatives' house when three cars carrying masked gunmen arrived. The soldier was handcuffed and driven away. One of the kidnappers then called one of the relatives using the kidnap victim's cell phone, the military said. It didn't say if ransom was demanded.

Across the country, police reported that 11 Iraqis, including two policemen and a soldier, were killed in bombings and shootings; authorities said 14 bodies were found dumped or pulled from the Tigris River.

Iraqi Realities Undermine The Pentagon's Predictions (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 24 — In trying to build support for the American strategy in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. said Tuesday that the Iraqi military could be expected to take over the primary responsibility for securing the country within 12 to 18 months.

But that laudable goal seems far removed from the violence-plagued streets of Iraq's capital, where American forces have taken the lead in trying to protect the city and American soldiers substantially outnumber Iraqi ones.

Given the rise in sectarian killings, a Sunni-based insurgency that appears to be as potent as ever and an Iraqi security establishment that continues to have difficulties deploying sufficient numbers of motivated and proficient forces in Baghdad, General Casey's target seems to be an increasingly heroic assumption.

On paper, Iraq has substantial security forces. The Pentagon noted in an August report to Congress that Iraq had more than 277,000 troops and police officers, including some 115,000 army combat soldiers.

But those figures, which have often been cited at Pentagon news conferences as an indicator of progress and a potential exit strategy for American troops, paint a distorted picture. When the deep-seated reluctance of many soldiers to serve outside their home regions, leaves of absence and AWOL rates are taken into account, only a portion of the Iraqi Army is readily available for duty in Baghdad and other hot spots.

The fact that the Ministry of Defense has sent only two of the six additional battalions that American commanders have requested for Baghdad speaks volumes about the difficulty the Iraqi government has encountered in fielding a professional military. The four battalions that American commanders are still waiting for is equivalent to 2,800 soldiers, hardly a large commitment in the abstract but one that the Iraqis are still struggling to meet.

From the start, General Casey's broader strategy for Iraq has been premised on the optimistic assumption that Iraqi forces could soon substitute for American ones. In February 2005, General Casey noted that in the year ahead the United States would begin to "transfer the counterinsurgency mission to the increasingly capable Iraqi security forces across Iraq."

In June 2006, General Casey submitted a confidential plan to the White House projecting American troop withdrawals that would begin in September 2006 and which, conditions permitting, would lead to a more than 50 percent reduction in American combat brigades by December 2007. Iraq's security forces were to fill the gap. In keeping with that strategy, American forces cut back their patrols in Baghdad during the first half of 2006.

It did not take long before the plan had to be shelved and American forces increased to try to tamp down the sectarian killings there. Still, General Casey continued to portray the current surge in fighting as a difficult interlude before the Iraqi security forces could begin to assume the main combat role and some variant of his withdrawal plan for American forces could be put back on track.

As he said Tuesday, "It's going to take another 12 to 18 months or so till, I believe, the Iraqi security forces are completely capable of taking over responsibility for their own security, still probably with some level of support from us, but that will be directly asked for by the Iraqis."

Certainly, the Iraqi security forces have made some gains. The Iraqi military is larger and better trained, and has taken control of more territory in the past year. Some Iraqi soldiers have fought well. But in Baghdad, which American commanders have defined as the central front in the war, it is still a junior partner.

To improve the Iraqi forces, the American military is inserting teams of military advisers with Iraqi units. American officials also say their Iraqi counterparts are trying to use the lure of extra pay to persuade reluctant troops to come to the aid of their capital.

But longstanding problems remain. A quarter or so of a typical Iraqi unit is on leave at any one time. Since Iraq lacks an effective banking system for paying its troops, soldiers are generally given a week's leave each month to bring their pay home.

Desertions and absenteeism are another concern. According to the August Pentagon report, 15 percent of new recruits drop out during initial training. Beyond that, deployment to combat zones, the report adds, sometimes results in additional "absentee spikes of 5 to 8 percent."

As a result, the actual number of Iraqi boots on the ground on a given day is routinely less than the official number. In areas where the risks and hardship are particularly great, the shortfall is sometimes significant. In fiercely contested Anbar Province in western Iraq, the day-to-day strength of the Seventh Iraqi Army Division in August was only about 35 percent of the soldiers on its rolls, while the day-to-day strength of the First Division was 50 percent of its authorized strength.

Another complication is that the even-numbered divisions in the 10-division army have largely been recruited locally and thus generally reflect the ethnic makeup of the regions where they are based. So, much of the Iraqi Army consists of soldiers who are reluctant to serve outside the areas in which they reside. Several battalions have gone AWOL rather then deploy to Baghdad, an American military officer said.

The Iraqi government is well aware of such problems. Its plan is to increase the overall size of the military by 50,000, calculating that if it assigns extra troops to each unit they can be maintained near full strength when soldiers go on leave or are otherwise absent.

The difficulties with the Iraqi police, who are supposed to play a major role in protecting cleared areas under the Baghdad security plan, are considerable and include corruption and divided loyalties to militias. According to the Pentagon report, the Interior Ministry also lacks an effective management system. The Americans know how many Iraqis have been trained to work as police officers but not how many are still on the job.

The National Police have been a particular worry. One National Police unit has been withdrawn from duty in Baghdad because it was linked to sectarian killings. National Police brigades are now being removed from duty one by one for retraining with an eye to changing, as General Casey put it, the "ethos of these forces."

In the final analysis, the problem is more one of institution building than numbers. Until Iraq has a genuine unity government that its own forces respect and are willing to fight for, it seems likely that the American military will continue to shoulder most of the burden.

More Troops Means More Targets For Snipers (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, October 25, 2006

BAGHDAD — Sniper attacks on U.S. troops have risen dramatically as more Americans have been pulled into the capital to patrol on foot and in lightly armored vehicles amid raging religious violence.

DOJ_NMG_0085814

Sniper attacks, generally defined as one or two well-aimed shots from a distance, have totaled 36 so far this month in Baghdad, according to U.S. military statistics.

That's up from 23 such attacks in September and 11 in January.

The figures were confirmed by Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the No. 2 commander of U.S. forces in Iraq. “The total numbers are elevated, and the effectiveness has been greater,” he said.

At least eight of the 36 sniper attacks in Baghdad in October have been fatal, according to accounts by hometown newspapers reporting on the deaths of individual soldiers and Marines. Snipers have also killed four U.S. servicemembers in Anbar province this month.

Pentagon practice has been to withhold specifics about the cause of death from news releases about casualties to avoid letting enemy fighters know whether their tactics have been successful. The releases typically attribute deaths in such cases to “small-arms fire” or “combat operations.” The military, however, often informs family members of the circumstances of a fatality.

Even with the growing number of sniper attacks, the single largest cause of fatal casualties remains roadside bombs, which the Pentagon calls “improvised explosive devices.” The Army has reported 234 deaths this year attributed to IEDs, alone or with other causes, and 57 attributed to “small-arms fire,” which includes snipers. The Marines do not report such details.

There have been 621 U.S. troop deaths this year.

Attacks by snipers have increased since June, when the U.S. command shifted troops to Baghdad and assigned them to aggressive joint patrols with Iraqi forces as part of a security crackdown called Operation Together Forward.

There are 15,400 U.S. troops in the capital, up from about 9,000 in July. On Tuesday, Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, said more U.S. troops could be sent to Baghdad.

The dense city environment has given snipers the opportunity to fire on U.S. troops and slip away. U.S. troops often can't return fire without risking civilians' lives.

“That could turn the mood of the city against us,” said Lt. Col. Steve Stover, a spokesman for U.S. forces.

The upswing in attacks by snipers “is definitely the result of working in an urban area — with many, many more targets out there — that's made the effectiveness of that particular form of attack higher this month than we've seen before,” Chiarelli said.

Insurgent groups have prepared instructional manuals and videos to train more snipers. Training materials obtained by U.S. intelligence show that snipers are urged to single out medics, engineers and chaplains for attacks on the theory that those casualties will demoralize entire units.

The manuals have been posted on the Internet. U.S. Central Command has verified the authenticity of at least one such training guide.

One recently captured insurgent sniper had a hole in the trunk of his car, which allowed him to fire at U.S. and Iraqi troops while hidden in the vehicle, said Brig Gen. David Halverson, deputy commander of U.S. forces in and around Baghdad. The sniper also mounted a video camera on his car's rear window.

Enemy snipers in Iraq have improved their skills, and their attacks have become “well-aimed and well-disciplined,” said Col. Michael Beech, commander of the 4th Brigade Combat Team in central Baghdad. His brigade has lost two soldiers to sniper fire since September, he said.

In an attack Oct. 2, a sniper shot and killed a soldier in the turret of a Humvee supporting an Iraqi-led operation in Baghdad's Karradah neighborhood, said Maj. Mark Cheadle, a 4th Brigade spokesman. Days later, another soldier was shot in the face while on patrol. The round passed through his sinus cavity and exited his nose, but he survived, Cheadle said.

Military commanders and other U.S. officials met Monday in Baghdad to discuss how to respond to the increase in sniper attacks, Chiarelli said. He declined to talk about details of the meeting. He also declined to identify any factions responsible for sniper attacks.

The U.S. military has dispatched countersniper teams and advised soldiers to be extra vigilant on patrols, Beech said. Countersniper teams consist of specialists trained to spot enemy snipers and kill them before they can attack.

“You're out on the street, and you take one or two rounds at your patrol that's (on foot), and you look out there and it could come from literally several hundred different windows,” Beech said. “And you don't have any idea which one. That's what makes the sniper threat in an urban terrain, in a three-dimensional battlefield like Baghdad, so difficult.”

Envoy Says Not All Is Bad In Iraq (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 25, 2006

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad insisted Tuesday that things are not all bad in Iraq, citing the growing number of satellite dishes on rooftops and consumers with cell phones as signs of economic progress.

"Economically, I see an Iraq every day that I do not think the American people know about — where cell phones and satellite dishes, once forbidden, are now common, where economic reform takes place on a regular basis, where agricultural production is rising dramatically, and where the overall economy and the consumer sector is growing," the American envoy told a Baghdad news conference.

Some Iraqis saw things differently.

"We'd prefer he take those back and return just 10 percent of our prewar life," said Mohammed Ibrahim, a 50-year-old government employee from Baghdad. "Saying things like that shows the Americans' contempt for us Iraqis."

Analogies between conditions in Iraq now and life before the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq are common among Iraqis, angered over what they see as the failure of successive Iraqi governments and their American backers to provide security, services or jobs.

Khalilzad spoke at one of the lowest points in America's involvement in Iraq.

An average of more than 40 Iraqis are being killed every day in October, according to an Associated Press count that is based on AP reporting and considered a minimum. The violence has forced nearly 1 million Iraqis to flee abroad since 2003 and as many as 300,000 more have become refugees in their own country because of sectarian killings.

Mobile phones were introduced in Iraq in 2004 and proved to be an instant hit, with about 1 million subscribers in the Baghdad area alone now. Similarly, satellite dishes, prohibited under Saddam Hussein, also proved popular, and there is hardly a rooftop in Baghdad or elsewhere in Iraq now without at least one.

The advent of the two came as part of the free market economy that spontaneously sprang up in Iraq in the chaos and freewheeling period after Saddam's ouster, filling markets with everything from South American bananas to South Korean electrical goods, Finnish telephones and Iranian biscuits.

But after nearly 13 years of U.N. sanctions that reduced millions of Iraqis to destitution, not everyone was able to enjoy the fruits of the free market. Government employees, about 1 million nationwide, have been the biggest spenders since 2003, thanks to pay raises as high as 100 percent.

Amrah al-Badawi, a Shiite lawmaker and a member of parliament's economic committee, chuckled when told of Khalilzad's comments.

"Iraqis longed for mobile phones and satellite television, but their availability now are of little relevance to the economy," she said. "What we need is economic ventures, and these are not going to happen with security the way it is."

Without substantial economic activity, Iraqis continue to suffer 30 percent unemployment and double-digit inflation.

The price of gasoline, which is often scarce, has increased 12-fold since 2003. Bread prices are up by nearly five-fold and fresh meat by more than 100 percent. Tenuous security means that less farm produce reaches retail markets, causing prices to rise.

Most Iraqis continue to depend on their Saddam-era food ration cards, but many holders say key items like sugar and rice are sometimes unavailable for as long as three months.

The wide access to satellite dishes and mobile phones also hold some unpleasant ironies.

Mobile phones have been widely used to set off many of the bombs that kill and maim across much of the country, with U.S. and Iraqi forces their primary victims. Satellite dishes also have enabled Iraqis to watch programs perceived to have anti-U.S. content, such as Qatar-based al-Jazeera television and Hezbollah's al-Manar TV.

Baghdad residents say they are spoiled by the large number of channels available on satellite TV, something that keeps them entertained when they huddle at home, afraid to go out for fear of falling victim to the violence.

But killing time in front of television needs electricity and that's one of Iraq's big postwar problems. Power outages in Baghdad are a daily occurrence, and they can last up to three days.

DOJ_NMG_0085816

Khalilzad, however, rejected the analogy some Iraqis use on life before and after Saddam.

"The important fact to keep in mind is that, of course, a lot of innocent Iraqis are getting killed, and that's a source of concern to us and to the Iraqis," he said. "But during Saddam, thousands upon thousands of Iraqis were killed as a result of a government policy."

For Alaa Makki of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's largest Sunni party: "We ended up with a worse-than-before dictatorship. We now have slaughter, kidnapping and disenfranchisement."

Gen. Pace Optimistic About Iraq Progress (AP-Y)

By Lolita Baldor

AP, October 25, 2006

The top American general said Tuesday he is not discouraged by what other U.S. commanders have described as disappointing progress in securing Baghdad, but he predicted no quick turnaround.

Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told a Pentagon news conference that his optimism about Iraq's future is based on his belief that most Iraqis want peace and stability. He also said Iraqis have plenty of incentive to halt the sectarian violence that threatens to tear their country apart.

"The great incentive inside of Iraq with the Iraqi people is their own self-pride and determination that they want to stand on their own; they want to be free; they want to determine their own way ahead," Pace said.

While military commanders may not be discouraged, Republicans fighting to keep control of Congress are frustrated with the lack of progress in Baghdad so close to the Nov. 7 elections.

In a letter released Tuesday, 33 House Republicans urged Bush to send into Baghdad any proficient Iraqi units available. Five of the Republicans — Reps. Thelma Drake of Virginia, Marilyn Musgrave of Colorado, Geoff Davis of Kentucky, Rob Simmons of Connecticut and John Doolittle of California — are in tight political races.

"It is crucial that both the U.S. and Iraqi governments recognize that as the battle in Iraq has intensified, so has the need to send Iraqi battalions into the heart of battle," the lawmakers wrote. "Now is exactly the time to do so."

Stephen Hadley, the president's national security adviser, said Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and the fledging government are starting to take steps aimed at quelling the rising sectarian violence and moving Iraq toward prosperity and peace.

"I think they've got to do more and they've got to do it faster," Hadley said in a radio interview at the White House. "And I think if you talked to Prime Minister (Nouri) al-Maliki he would say, to you, the same thing."

Asked if the U.S. is winning in Iraq, Pace responded in terms of the broader war on terrorism that includes Afghanistan and efforts elsewhere in the world to defeat al-Qaida and other terrorist networks.

"Winning in this war on terrorism is having security in the countries we're trying to help that allows for those governments to function and for their people to function," he said.

In Baghdad, U.S. officials said Iraqi government leaders have agreed to develop a timeline by the end of the year for progress in stabilizing Iraq and reducing violence that has killed 300 Iraqi troops during the Islamic holy month of Ramadan alone.

Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander who appeared at a news conference with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, said Iraqi forces should be able to take control of security in the next 12 to 18 months with minimal American support.

Pace said there was not yet a U.S.-Iraqi agreement on specific benchmarks for progress; he said discussions are ongoing with regard to benchmarks in the political, economic and security areas. Pace said it would not be wise to set specific dates for meeting certain markers.

"Having a very precise date I think is not useful, either from the standpoint of forcing yourself to do something too soon or from giving your enemies too much information," he said.

Casey also said he felt the United States should continue to focus on drawing down the number of American forces in the country, adding that he would not hesitate to ask for more troops if he felt they were necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0085817

"We're not making the progress we would like and that's why we have to look at what we are doing and see what we need to change to get the kind of progress that we need," Hadley told National Public Radio. "You don't need a timetable to be able and willing to say to the Iraqis, `Look, if this is going to work and succeed, you have to step up and make some very difficult choices.'"

He predicted that stability and security will not be achieved in Iraq before Bush leaves the White House.

"Is there going to be peace? Is there going to the end of any violence? Of course not. This violence is going to go on for a long time," Hadley said. "But what you hope for is a situation where Iraqi governmental institutions and Iraqi security forces can manage and contain the violence so that it does not threaten the integrity of the Iraqi state and the ability of the Iraqi state to bring prosperity and economic life to its community."

Democrats said Tuesday the suggestion of a timeline has come too late. "While it is helpful to lay out a timeline for the training of the Iraqi forces, after three and a half years of training, this timeline is too long," said Missouri Rep. Ike Skelton, top Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee.

Lawmakers Warm To Plan For Divided Iraq (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, October 25, 2006

As more Republicans join Democrats in pushing for a change of strategy in Iraq, lawmakers and candidates are signaling new openness to dividing the war-torn nation into three autonomous regions, a plan closely associated with Sen. Joe Biden (D-Del.).

Biden, one of his party's most trusted foreign policy voices, has turned up the spotlight on his plan for largely self-governing regions in Iraq. The ranking member of the Foreign Relations Committee even launched www.planforiraq.com this month to marshal support for the five-point proposal he co-authored with Council on Foreign Relations President Emeritus Les Gelb.

The dearth of specific alternatives to the current course in Iraq, where U.S. troop deaths are close to a two-year high, has given Biden's plan and his nascent presidential bid for 2008 an infusion of political capital. Rep. Harold Ford (D-Tenn.) has endorsed a similar policy for Iraq in his Senate campaign, calling for three Iraqi regions dominated by Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds, respectively, with a pact to share oil revenues.

Republicans are also beginning to echo Biden's suggestions in the politically pressurized pre-election environment, whether to praise the plan or simply urge that it remain "on the table." This puts GOP lawmakers at odds with the president, who has ruled out any regionalizing of Iraq.

"I think this idea of maybe the three autonomous regions within one country may be the one that we start to move more and more towards," Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) said during an appearance last week on CNBC.

Brownback used the former nation of Yugoslavia, which was regionally divided by the 1990s Balkan war, as an example of the strategy's potential. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Texas) also cited the Balkans in telling reporters last week that autonomous regions could be the solution to the violent insurgency that threatens to consume Iraq.

Foreign Relations panel Chairman Richard Lugar (R-Ind.) has spoken positively about greater autonomy in Iraq, while stopping short of endorsing Biden's approach. Lugar says U.S. policymakers should ensure the Iraqi parliament moves on the federalism law it passed Oct. 11 over the objections of many Sunni leaders, who fear losing oil revenues.

"All sorts of people, whether they're Republicans or Democrats or independents, believe there's a strong consensus that we need to change course," said a Biden aide. "It's obviously different for them to come out and say this two, three, four weeks before an election."

Other Democrats have hailed the prospect of dividing Iraq in three, including Eric Massa, the retired naval officer challenging Rep. Randy Kuhl (R-N.Y.), and Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), who offered the solution before Biden and Gelb published their first commentary on it in May.

Schumer's office did not return a request for comment on whether his position on autonomous Iraqi regions has changed. Hutchison spokeswoman Jamie Loftus said that the GOP leadership hopeful views a federalist strategy as "one option in Iraq" and prioritized revenue sharing as well as cooperation with Iraq's neighbors.

DOJ_NMG_0085818

House Armed Services ranking member Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), speaking with reporters Friday after a dozen House and Senate Democratic leaders released a letter imploring President Bush to change course in Iraq, called the Biden concept "intriguing" and said the plan should be considered despite potential sticking points.

"It would work in some areas, but what do you do with places such as Baghdad, with the three different ethnic groups there?" Skelton said. "How do you allow the Sunnis to share in oil revenues?"

That Democratic letter points to the Iraqi government's "failure to achieve a political reconciliation plan" without overtly addressing the Biden plan. In the early stages of internal positioning for 2008, any perceived imprimatur from leadership could enflame tensions among other Democrats weighing a White House run.

"Democrats have coalesced around a core set of principles for what we should do. We didn't think it was appropriate in that kind of letter that so many people were signing onto to endorse a particular Democrat's plan," one senior Democratic aide said, adding that Biden concurred with the approach.

Other lawmakers in Biden's party have sought to temper growing talk of the plan's viability. Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), a senior Armed Services Committee member who has served as his leadership's point man on Iraq issues, listed several drawbacks to the federalism approach yesterday at a Center for American Progress event.

"[A] deliberate, conscious policy to separate the country with the idea that this is going to make things easier and let us leave is probably inaccurate," Reed said. He acknowledged that the Iraqis are moving toward their own regional divisions, but expressed "severe reservations that this should be the deliberate policy of the United States."

Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), said via e-mail that Biden's willingness to seek an alternative solution underscores Democrats' commitment to resolving the crisis in Iraq.

"It's a thoughtful plan, and an effort to change course, something the president has been unwilling to do," Manley said. "Senator Biden is for change, President Bush is for more of the same. …"

Yet despite Biden's rising stock on Iraq, his emphasis on a bipartisan approach to Iraq could turn off some of the same anti-war Democrats who have criticized Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) for her unwillingness to disavow her vote to authorize the war.

"I'm not sure how it plays for the base of our party — bipartisanship is probably a dirty word for some of them," said a Democratic aide. "I can understand it, because we've been so beaten over the head by [Republicans]."

The Beltway Retreat (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

"We need to be realist but not defeatist. We need to understand that there is a need of utmost urgency to deal with many of the problems of Iraq but we must not give in to panic."

So said Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Barham Salih on Monday, in a BBC interview while in London for talks with Tony Blair. If only such statesmanship prevailed on this side of the Atlantic, where election politics and a spate of critical new books have combined to paint an increasingly desperate -- and false -- picture of what's happening in Iraq.

As the critics describe it, all of Iraq is in chaos, its new government isn't functioning, the U.S. is helpless to act against these inexorable forces, and it is only a matter of time before we must pack up and leave in abject defeat. "We're on the verge of chaos, and the current plan is not working," declares Senator Lindsey Graham, in one of the purer expressions of this elite inconstancy. Just what Mr. Graham would do about this, he doesn't say; but in the land of blind panic, the sound-bite Senator is king.

Yes, the Iraq project is difficult, and its outcome dangerously uncertain. The Bush Administration and its military generals have so far failed to stem insurgent attacks or pacify Baghdad, and the factions comprising Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government have so far failed to make essential political compromises. But the American response to this should be to change military tactics or deployments until they do succeed, and to reassure Iraqi leaders that their hard political choices will result in U.S. support, not precipitous withdrawal.

The current American panic, by contrast, is precisely what the insurgents intend with their surge of October violence. The Baathists and Sadrists can read the U.S. political calendar, and they'd like nothing better than to feed the perception that the violence is intractable. They want our election to be perceived as a referendum on Iraq that will speed the pace of American withdrawal.

The Bush Administration hasn't helped matters of late with its own appearance of indecision, asserting on one day that we must avoid "cut-and-run" while leaking on another that the forthcoming Baker-Hamilton report might be an opportunity for a strategic retreat. President Bush has sounded resolute himself, but many of his own advisers seem to be well along in their own electoral run for cover.

A measure of rationality at least came yesterday out of Baghdad, where General George Casey and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad tried to put the violence in some larger context. The Iraq government is in fact "functioning," as Iraqis continue to get their food rations, and as more than a million civil servants, Iraqi security force members and teachers continue to show up for work every day and get paid. Just this weekend, Iraq's oil minister announced that production had surpassed pre-war levels.

"Economically, I see an Iraq every day that I do not think the American people know about -- where cell phones and satellite dishes, once forbidden, are now common, where economic reform takes place on a regular basis, where agricultural production is rising dramatically, and where the overall economy and the consumer sector is growing," said Mr. Khalilzad, who for this attempt at hopeful realism will be derided in some quarters as a Pollyanna.

As for security, two provinces have already been turned over entirely to the control of Iraqi forces, with a total of six or seven scheduled to be under Iraqi control by January. While the police forces remain unreliable, the Iraqi army is making notable progress. The joint Iraqi-U.S. operation to make Baghdad safe hasn't succeeded so far, but Iraqis we talk to say the situation in many specific neighborhoods of the capital has been vastly improved.

And while every terrorist success is broadcast far and wide, acts of bravery by Iraqi forces go unheralded. Only 10 days ago, insurgents staged a huge attack on government and police offices in Mosul, but it was successfully repulsed by Iraqi forces. Dozens of insurgents were killed or captured, and one heroic Iraqi police officer gave his life successfully defending others against a suicide truck bomber.

The truth is that the Sunni insurgents are still capable only of hit-and-run attacks, are slaughtered whenever they gather en masse, and have held down no permanent territory since Fallujah was cleaned out in late 2004. Nor have they been successful in their other goal of keeping their fellow Sunnis out of the political process. Sunnis continue to sit in the current government and parliament, despite being labelled "collaborators" and marked for death.

As General Casey observed yesterday, "we've seen the nature of the conflict evolving from what was an insurgency against us to a struggle for the division of political and economic power among the Iraqis." One of the main challenges now is to reassure the Sunnis that it is safe to compromise with Shiite and Kurdish leaders on issues such as the distribution of oil revenue and the shape of Iraqi federalism. Mr. Maliki must also demobilize -- or at least neutralize -- the militias that grew in his own Shiite community in response to Sunni violence.

But the political truth is that none of this will happen any sooner if Americans look like they are heading for the exits. Timetables and deadlines may sound like realpolitik, but they only feed suspicions that the U.S. will abandon Iraq's leaders once they have walked out onto a political limb. Iraq is not yet in a state of "civil war," and it has a functioning, if imperfect, government. If changes of tactics or force levels are needed, by all means make them. But what Iraqis most need from Washington is reassurance of support for the tough decisions and battles that lie ahead.

Insult To Injury In Iraq (WP)

By Frederick W. Kagan

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

It's been coming for a long time: the idea that fixing Iraq is the Iraqis' problem, not ours -- that we've done all we can and now it's up to them.

Such arguments have been latent in the Bush administration's Iraq strategy and explicit in Democratic critiques of that strategy for some time. Now Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has declared: "It's their country. . . . They're going to have to govern it, they're going to have to provide security for it, and they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later."

DOJ_NMG_0085820

The implication of these arguments is clear: The United States should prepare to leave Iraq, after which the Iraqis will work out their own troubles -- or they won't. In any event, we can no longer help them. This notion is wrong and morally contemptible, and it endangers American security around the world.

The current crisis in Iraq is no more just an Iraqi problem than it has ever been. The U.S. military destroyed Iraq's government and all institutions able to keep civil order. It designated itself an "occupying force," thereby accepting the responsibility to restore and maintain such order. And yet U.S. Central Command never actually made establishing order and security a priority. Its commander throughout the insurgency, Gen. John Abizaid, has instead repeatedly declared that America's role is primarily to train Iraqi forces to put down their own rebellion and maintain order.

By allowing violence and disorder to spread throughout the country, the Bush administration has broken faith with the Iraqi people and ignored its responsibilities. It has placed U.S. security in jeopardy by creating the preconditions for the sort of terrorist safe haven the president repeatedly warns about and by demonstrating that no ally can rely on America to be there when it counts.

A rapid U.S. withdrawal would lead to catastrophe in Iraq. The presence of American troops is vital to restraining Iraqi soldiers -- the Iraqis know not to participate in death squad activities when Americans are around. The fact that large numbers of U.S. troops are not embedded with the Iraqi police is a main reason for the participation of those forces in the killings. When the U.S. troops go, the Iraqi army will probably go the same way.

Nor is there any likelihood that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki will be able to simultaneously accomplish all the tasks now demanded of him, especially without American help. These include reforming the Interior Ministry and the police, disarming Shiite militias, fighting Sunni Arab insurgents, establishing functioning local and regional governments connected to the central government, and rooting out corruption. What are his chances if U.S. forces leave, sectarian violence rises and Iraqis grow ever more pessimistic about the success of their democratic experiment?

Americans believe that all problems are soluble and therefore that people who aren't solving their problems must not be trying. They need to be "incentivized," either through promises or threats. Many on the left have long been advocating a withdrawal of U.S. forces, or the threat of it, as just such an incentive for the Iraqis. But what if even then Iraqis cannot accomplish the goals we have set for them? Can we then declare that, by establishing the Iraqi army and helping Iraq elect and establish its government, we have done all that honor requires?

No, we can't. Both honor and our vital national interest require establishing conditions in Iraq that will allow the government to consolidate and maintain civil peace and good governance. It doesn't matter how many "trained and ready" Iraqi soldiers there are, nor how many provinces are nominally under Iraqi control. If America withdraws its forces before setting the conditions for the success of the Iraqi government, we will have failed in our mission and been defeated in the eyes of our enemies. We will have dishonored ourselves.

Our enemies watched the debacle in Somalia and drew conclusions: America is weak, unable to stomach even the smallest level of casualties and willing to lose rather than fight. The invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq changed the equation. Al-Qaeda leaders did not expect us to attack, and they regarded their unanticipated defeat as a catastrophe. Iran's leaders and North Korea's Kim Jong Il saw the invasion of Iraq as the first phase of an attack on the "axis of evil" and were fearful. But the protracted insurgency and the apparent weakening of U.S. will are emboldening them once again.

In 1991 the United States encouraged rebellions against Saddam Hussein and then abandoned to his inhuman vengeance the Kurds and Shiites who answered the call. That abandonment, still fresh in the minds of many Iraqis, is one reason for the suspicion with which the United States was greeted in 2003. What will happen if we abandon the progressive forces of Iraq once again with the hypocritical declaration that the resultant failure is their own fault? What reasonable moderate in the Muslim world -- or anywhere -- will ever again rely on America?

The comparison is often made between Iraq and Vietnam. One implication is that just as it was possible to lose Vietnam and still win the Cold War, so it is acceptable to lose Iraq. But in the Cold War, Vietnam was a sideshow. Iraq is in the heart of the Muslim world and at the center of the struggle against radical Islamism.

It is also worth keeping in mind that as indirect consequences of America's defeat in Vietnam, the Soviets invaded Afghanistan, the Sandinistas seized power in Nicaragua and Ayatollah Khomeini seized Tehran and American hostages. The

"decent interval" between our withdrawal and the collapse of South Vietnam didn't help. Neither will the implausible deniability the Pentagon is now trying to establish in Iraq.

Those who have criticized the administration for failing to send enough troops to fight the war, failing to plan adequately for the postwar crisis and failing to react properly when it came are right. But Democrats should not be so quick to embrace these attacks unless they are willing to accept the corollary: Just because Bush did the wrong thing in 2003 doesn't mean that we can do the wrong thing now.

Success In Iraq Possible, Say US Officials (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, October 25, 2006

Top US officials in Baghdad on Tuesday said Iraqi forces should be "completely capable" of taking responsibility for security within 18 months. The assertion came as Republican support for the White House strategy on Iraq continued to erode just two weeks ahead of November's congressional elections.

Zalmay Khalilzad, the US ambassador, and General George Casey, the top US commander in Iraq, in a rare joint press conference, delivered a unified message: that, despite the images of daily carnage in Baghdad, success was still possible.

In a sign of the growing violence in Baghdad, however, Gen Casey acknowledged that he may have to request more troops. US commanders have previously said they would ask for more soldiers if necessary. But the comments come at a sensitive time for the White House, as October shapes up to be one of the deadliest months for the US military in Iraq.

Reflecting increased pessimism among Republicans that the Iraq war could cost them control of one or both houses of Congress, the White House on Monday said President George W. Bush would no longer use the phrase "stay the course".

Mr Khalilzad emphasised that the US goal of bringing democracy to Iraq had not changed. He said Iraqi leaders had agreed to develop a timeline of progress on both security and economic issues, including changes to the constitution and disbanding militias.

"They have committed themselves to a timetable for making some of those decisions," said Mr Khalilzad, adding that he expected significant progress in the coming 12 months.

Stephen Hadley, the White House national security adviser, on Tuesday said the Iraqi government needed to act more quickly to help improve the situation in the country, although he warned that violence would continue for some time.

"The violence is going to go on for a long time," Mr Hadley told National Public Radio. "But what you hope for is a situation where Iraqi government institutions and Iraqi security forces can manage and contain the violence".

In the latest sign of Republican disatisfaction with the White House, Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican senator and strong supporter of the war, on Tuesday said "We're on the verge of chaos, and the current plan is not working."

Gen Casey dismissed suggestions - most recently by Republican senator Arlen Specter - that Iraq had descended into civil war, insisting that 80 to 90 per cent of the sectarian violence happened in a 30-mile radius of the centre of Baghdad.

The attempt to win back the debate over Iraq comes as the loss of faith in the war reached new highs among the American and British public. A recent CNN poll found that a record 64 per cent of Americans now oppose the conflict.

Officials and analysts in the Middle East have been warning for months that Iraq has been gradually sliding into an uncontrollable civil war, as killings by Shia militias escalate at a faster pace than attacks by Sunni insurgents. Last week, Iraqi Shia and Sunni clerics were invited to the holy city of Mecca in Saudi Arabia to sign a declaration forbidding the shedding of Muslim blood.

The White House has been increasingly forced on to the back foot over Iraq since John Warner, the Republican chairman of the Senate armed services committee, who has been a strong backer of the administration, recently said the situation in Iraq was going "sideways", before warning last weekend that the violence was getting worse.

James Baker, the former secretary of state and Bush family confidante who is leading a bipartisan commission on US policy in Iraq, recently prompted speculation that the White House would gradually move towards a new policy by suggesting that "stay the course" and "cut and run" were not the only two options for Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0085822

The growing doubts about Iraq policy were also aggravated by revelations that the US was increasingly frustrated by the performance of the Iraqi government of Nouri al-Maliki, which had failed to follow through on moves towards national reconciliation with the Sunni minority and was resisting tough action against the Shia militias.

Announcement Draws Skeptical Reaction In U.S. (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - Judging from the initial reactions, Tuesday's announcement by the top U.S. commander and top U.S. diplomat in Iraq of benchmarks for progress and a loose timetable for drawing down American troops appears unlikely to influence the Nov. 7 congressional elections.

Republicans generally ignored the latest midcourse correction in Iraq, and Democrats denounced it as more of the same. Even the White House seemed to downplay the significance of the news conference by U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George Casey.

Casey said he expected Iraqi security forces to take the lead role from American troops over the next 12 to 18 months. Khalilzad said he expected significant progress in the coming year on milestones related to security, economic development and political reconciliation. Both men wrapped their comments in qualifiers and avoided firm predictions, but their tone was unmistakably optimistic.

With congressional elections two weeks away, President Bush is under pressure to ease voters' concerns about the war. A new McClatchy-MSNBC poll of eight Senate battleground states found that Iraq remains by far the dominant issue, despite weeks of news coverage about the page scandal in the House of Representatives, North Korea's nuclear test and record highs in the stock market.

That's bad news for Republicans, because voters who said Iraq was their top concern support Democrats by ratios of 2-to-1 or more. Democrats need to pick up six Senate seats to take control of the chamber, and 15 seats in the House.

"We've been hearing White House promises to turn things over to the Iraqi forces for years - in 2006, in 2005, in 2004, in 2003 - but nothing ever seems to change," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said of Tuesday's announcement in Baghdad. "I don't think the American people are going to take it very seriously."

Others accused the administration of trying to manipulate public opinion for the election.

"Two weeks before the election they're confusing the public by making these conflicting statements. The only thing that's going to change the public's perception of Iraq is a redeployment of our troops and forcing the Iraqis to work this out themselves," said Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa.

Pollsters said voters were much more likely to be influenced by events in Iraq than by policy pronouncements from either political party.

"Whatever it is the president says has to be backed up by reality on the ground showing things getting better," pollster John Zogby said.

Bush and his allies made no effort to draw attention to the remarks in Baghdad. The president focused on the economy while campaigning for Republican candidates in Florida. Vice President Dick Cheney didn't mention the benchmarks or the timetable in a friendly interview with conservative commentator Sean Hannity.

Administration officials are all too aware that timetables and predictions can come back to haunt the person who makes them. On May 31, 2005, Cheney said the Iraq insurgency was in its last throes.

"I think that was premature," he acknowledged last week in an interview with Time magazine.

Another Bin Laden Victory (WT)

By Michael F. Scheuer

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

In a world where leading Western experts have consigned Osama bin Laden and al Qaeda to near-irrelevant status, the gangly Saudi is on the verge of seeing the forces he leads and inspires knock off their third infidel government. Not bad for a guy running from rock to rock and cave to cave.

DOJ_NMG_0085823

First was the defeat of Spanish Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar's conservative government after the Islamists' 2003 attack on Madrid's train station. Spanish voters ousted that rarity, a European leader who recognized bin Laden led much more than a criminal gang, and that Islamists would have to be confronted and smashed with a heavy, prolonged application of Western military power. Sadly, Mr. Aznar allowed himself to believe Washington's delusion that war in Iraq would be an effective, tide-turning extension of the battle against Islamist militancy. He paid the ultimate electoral price for indulging that lethal pipe dream, and the West lost a man who had accurately gauged the severity of the Islamist threat.

Next down the drain was the government of Thailand via last month's military coup. After the coup, rumors of deposed Premier Thaksin Shinawatra's corrupt activities spread, but at base the Thai generals seized power because of the increasing intensity of the Islamist separatist revolt in Thailand's three Muslim-dominated southern provinces. Nearly 2,000 people have died there since 2003, the central government is losing its grip in the region, and Mr. Thaksin's military response to the unrest was making little progress.

The Thai generals named a Thai Muslim as the new premier, and he has said it is time to slow military operations and talk about autonomy for the Muslim south. As always, what seems reasonable to the West and the westernized Thai will be seen by Thai Islamists and their backers as a long step toward victory that requires more military aggressiveness.

Bin Laden, his lieutenants and their allies are no doubt pleased by the destruction of the Spanish and Thai governments and the exhilarating message it sends to the worldwide Islamist movement: The infidels are weak, politically divided, terrified of using full military power and think we can be appeased. In short, war works; keep at it.

Even so, bin Laden, et. al, know the biggest prize looms just ahead — the chance that the Republican Party will be ousted from one or both houses of Congress. There are many factors contributing to this possibility: the Foley abomination, other corruption cases, the trumped?up "crisis" over First Amendment rights and the administration's ill-informed and ham-fisted handling of the Iraq and Afghan wars. If the Republicans are ousted, pundits on both sides of the aisle will find the causes strictly in America's navel.

But what will bin Laden and his Islamist allies think? Well, if Republican defeat comes to pass, they will first thank the Almighty — "Allahu Akhbar!" or "God is the greatest!" — for tangible proof of approaching victory. In Spain, Thailand, and Britain — where Prime Minister Tony Blair suffered the fate of Messrs. Aznar and Thaksin for the same reason, but is leaving gracefully — al Qaeda and its allies see politicians winning power who argue: "The military option has been tried and it has failed. We must seek other-than-martial means to defuse the Islamists' appeal and power." As in Europe and Thailand, this has been the refrain of Sens. Nancy Pelosi, Harry Reid, Charles Schumer, Hillary Clinton, Rep. Jane Harman, and a swath of Republicans who value their seats more than U.S. security.

If Americans vote for what sounds like sweet reason from the Democrats, bin Laden and company will rejoice. What they will hear is the death knell for any prospect of effective U.S. military resistance to militant Islam. With the Republicans out, the Islamists will be confident that Democrats will deliver the best of both worlds: less emphasis on military force and a rigid maintenance of U.S. foreign policies that are hated with passion and near-unanimity by 1.3 billion Muslims. If Osama approved of music, he would be whistling "Happy Days Are Here Again!"

What the enemy thinks is not the sole reason on which to base a vote. I will vote for Republicans, as I always do, because some know unborn babies are human beings who should not be murdered with the Democrats' joyful zeal. Enemy perceptions are worth remembering, however, because if Americans elect Democrats believing them likely to defeat al Qaedaism, history suggests they will be wrong.

The combination of Democratic rhetoric and the indelible fact of the Clinton administration's relentless refusal to try to kill bin Laden — preferring to protect its Arab, arms-buying buddies at the cost of American corpses — ensures that voters will receive what Clinton-era Democrats are best at giving: barely disguised pacifism that has and will continue to allow al-Qaeda and its allies to steadily destroy U.S. security.

Calling Again For Troop Withdrawal (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0085824

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

During the years that he led opposition to the Vietnam War, former senator George S. McGovern (D-S.D.) says, he consoled his family with the proposition that the United States would never again commit such a "tragic mistake," as he put it. But McGovern said in an interview last week that America is headed down "the same road" in Iraq.

McGovern, the 1972 Democratic nominee for president, is out with a new book prescribing what the country ought to do to turn things around. The title neatly summarizes his advice: "Out of Iraq: A Practical Plan for Withdrawal Now."

Co-written with William R. Polk, a former professor and State Department Middle East expert, the 142-page volume calls for a phased withdrawal of 140,000 U.S. troops beginning by year's end and finishing by June 30. The authors say the Iraqi government should request the presence of an international force, including Arab and Muslim troops, to help keep order after the departure of the Americans.

McGovern and Polk call for an aggressive program of U.S. reconstruction aid to rebuild the Iraqi infrastructure destroyed in the war. Among other steps, the two say the United States should "express its condolences" to the Iraqi people for the large number of Iraqis killed, incapacitated, incarcerated or tortured. "A simple gesture of conciliation would go far to shift our relationship from occupation to friendship," they write.

In a telephone interview from his Mitchell, S.D., home, McGovern cast doubt on the assertion by President Bush that withdrawal would embolden U.S. enemies and create a haven for terrorists in the heart of the Middle East. It is the American presence in Iraq, he and Polk believe, that is fueling much of the violence. Their proposal is based on the conviction that the United States will eventually be forced out. Better to leave "in an orderly way" and "in a manner that will prevent further damage to American interests," they write.

At 84, McGovern remains active in civic affairs, speaking on college campuses and addressing the cause that remains his life's passion: world hunger and malnutrition. Along with former senator Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.), McGovern has been promoting an effort to create school lunch programs in developing countries.

Last week, McGovern spent about 50 minutes talking about his ideas for Iraq. Here are excerpts from the telephone interview:

-- Michael Abramowitz

QTell me a little about how this book came about.

AI found that lots of thoughtful people had come to the conclusion that the war was a mistake, but they would say now that we are there, we can't pull out. It's the same argument I combated for 15 years during the Vietnam War. . . . We concluded that instead of reducing terrorism, the [Iraq] war was aggravating it -- that we were in a more dangerous position with regard to Iraq and other countries as a consequence of the invasion.

You interviewed military folk?

Yes, [Polk] did. These are people who are on the job, so they are not eager to have their names attached to a withdrawal plan right now. What he found is that top people in the military don't think this war can be won. . . . How do you end this? You begin to plan a systematic withdrawal. We're not talking about a stampede for the border -- none of this silly business of cut and run.

Reports from Iraq are that the nature of the violence has changed, from a Sunni insurgency to more sectarian violence. Do you think that the book is a little out of date in the sense that any U.S. withdrawal would not affect this kind of violence?

It's possible. We say in the book that we are not promising stability, but . . . we think you are never going to have stability in Iraq as long as a foreign army is in that country.

What are the kinds of similarities that you see between Vietnam and the situation in Iraq?

I think one obvious similarity is that neither Vietnam nor Iraq constituted a threat to America's security in the world. . . . Secondly, we didn't know much about either one. We didn't even have people ready to go into Iraq that spoke Arabic. . . .

All those years we were in the jungle of Vietnam, losing 58,000 young Americans and probably being responsible for a couple of million Vietnamese deaths, my four daughters and my son used to get discouraged about ever ending that war. They would say, "What good does that do? You keep sounding off. You run for president, you got smashed in the election, what good does it do?"

DOJ_NMG_0085825

I would say: "Look, I am an old history teacher. . . . Even bad things in history usually have some good factor. And in Vietnam, the good thing about it is that it is such a tragic mistake we will never again do that again." . . . But I didn't count on terrorism. . . . I really think we are following the same road in Iraq. This time the fear is not communism -- it is terrorism.

Why do you not see the threat the same way [as Bush]?

I see terrorism as a threat to the United States, but I think it's growing worse in the way we are trying to handle it. That's a problem that is not essentially a military problem. . . . I do fear the terrorists. I feel more threatened by six years of the Bush-Cheney-Rumsfeld plan for fighting it than I did before.

Would you have been okay with an effort to just get rid of Saddam Hussein and leave?

I think it's good that he is gone. Now, having said that, I also wonder if, on balance, we improved our own security. We got rid of an SOB -- we all know that. . . . But what has happened as a consequence of that, Iraq is now in a civil war. People say if we pull out, we'll have a civil war. Well, they have got one going now. Saddam Hussein, for all of his viciousness, would not have permitted that to happen.

Is it your point that we should never try to overthrow a bad guy?

I don't like what is happening in the Sudan now. I don't like what happened in Rwanda. . . . It is a very tough, agonizing issue. But frustrating as it is, I still think we're better off trying to work through the United Nations. It's a frustrating organization. It's bureaucratic. But I still think that's the forum where we ought to press these issues.

What would be your advice to the Democratic Party?

They have got to be more assertive. They can't lay down and go along with policies that many of them know are mistaken. . . . I am disappointed in my old colleagues in the Senate, not all of them. . . . But by and large, the Democrats seem to have been intimidated into silence or kind of a mushy policy on foreign questions.

Is there any figure out there you see as someone who is promising for the Democrats in '08?

I haven't settled on anyone yet. . . . I don't think we have really brought our alternative positions into clear focus yet for the American public.

Running Against Themselves (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

Things have become so dire for the Republicans that now even Bush is distancing himself from Bush.

The president is cutting and running from the president.

In a momentous event at the White House on Monday, Tony Snow made a major announcement about an important new strategy for Iraq. The president will no longer stay the course on the rallying cry "stay the course."

A presidency built on message discipline (Message: "Stay the course") is trying to salvage itself with some last-minute un-messaging (Message: "No more stay the course").

Of course, the administration has never really said what "the course" is, so it was never really apparent what "staying" it meant, anyhow.

It was a wacky moment for Tony Snow, who renounced the slogan while sticking to the policy. "It left the wrong impression about what was going on," the press secretary said, "and it allowed critics to say, 'Well, here's an administration that's just embarked upon a policy and not looking at what the situation is,' when, in fact, it's just the opposite."

The important thing was that the cliché sounded good to Republicans, strong and virile, for a while. But pollsters for the White House seemed to be the last to learn that even many of the party faithful had soured on the phrase, deeming it inflexible and stupid. Has Karl Rove, who urged G.O.P. candidates to keep the Democrats on the defensive on national security, lost his magic?

In a White House with a Fox News all-spin sensibility, officials don't think they need to change the strategy as much as they need to change their slogan.

DOJ_NMG_0085826

The overworked Bush phrase suggested "burying your head in the sand," Steve Hinkson, political director at Luntz Research Companies, a G.O.P. public opinion firm, told The Washington Post's Peter Baker. "The problem is that as the number of people who agree with remaining resolute dwindles, that sort of language doesn't strike a chord as much as it once did."

Unwilling to admit mistakes or face the urgent need to go past semantic changes in a protectorate that has fallen into a vicious civil war, in which Americans are merely referees and targets, the White House is falling back on marketing. Just as Andy Card rolled out the war as a marketing event, the Bush team now thinks that all it needs to do is come up with a catchy and chesty new advertising pitch.

Bay Buchanan assured Wolf Blitzer that the president still intended to stay the course and seek victory, he just wouldn't use that phrase, because it gave people the impression that W. was unwilling to change tactics.

After all, Dick Cheney told Rush Limbaugh last week that the inept Iraqi government was doing "remarkably well."

But given the Republican meltdown, it's obvious that Democrats are having better luck mocking the Republicans for staying the course than Republicans are having mocking the Democrats for cutting and running. But Democrats have no ingenious ideas about how to extricate ourselves from this nasty war either.

Yet W. once more accused the Democrats of wanting to cut and run in Iraq at a campaign stop in Sarasota, Fla., yesterday.

Many frantic Republican lawmakers are also running against themselves, either reneging on their support for the war they started, or railing against Washington, the town they absolutely control, claiming that the capital has forgotten their values, or making ads denouncing the Democrats' "homosexual agenda," even though Republicans are now the party of gay scandal.

It's a hilarious spectacle of a whole party re-enacting the classic scene in Mel Brooks's "Blazing Saddles," in which the sheriff holds the gun to his own head to take himself hostage.

The Bushes don't connect words with action. Action is something that's secretly plotted with the inner circle behind closed doors. The public should stay out of it. The Bushes just connect words with salesmanship. Poppy Bush never meant it when he said "Read my lips: no new taxes" at the 1988 convention. It was just a Clint Eastwood-sounding line in a Peggy Noonan speech, meant to pump up his flighty image.

Just so, his son never paid any mind to his campaign promise not to nation-build, and he didn't come through on his bullhorn pledge to catch the perpetrators of 9/11 or his tough-guy vow to bring in Osama dead or alive.

To W., the words he says to Americans don't matter as much as the words Dick Cheney says to him. He just has to hope that daddy's friend, James Baker, the smooth fixer who is co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group and who has already suggested moving past the meaningless partisan jargon of "cut and run" and "stay the course," comes up with a plan to rescue Junior from a fine mess one more time.

The Hard Way Out (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Some months ago, former national security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski was explaining to a senior Bush administration official his plan for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq over 12 months, in consultation with the Iraqis. "We're going to do the same thing," the senior official confided, "but we're going to call it victory."

This week it became official: The Bush administration's Iraq policy is no longer "stay the course" but, in the phrase of White House spokesman Tony Snow, "a study in constant motion." The reality, as near as I can tell, is that the administration isn't sure yet where to move after the November elections. Nor are most of the administration's critics. Major newspapers carried editorials or op-eds this week advocating some version of "change the course," but they were vaporous when it came to details.

So what are the right guideposts for a gradual American withdrawal from Iraq? How can the United States, in its search for an exit, avoid compounding the mistakes it made in invading Iraq? To help light the way, we are blessed with a deus ex machina in the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and ex-congressman Lee Hamilton.

A starting point is to understand what the United States is actually doing in Iraq now. A strategy of phased withdrawal is already underway -- on paper. The latest affirmation was yesterday's proposal by Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George Casey of a security timetable to transfer control to the Iraqis in 12 to 18 months. The plan envisions a "national compact" among Iraq's different factions. By the end of this year, they would agree on terms for demobilizing militias, sharing oil revenue and easing de-Baathification rules. It all looks sensible -- on paper.

The problem is that this approach hasn't been working. Since January Khalilzad has been prodding Iraqi leaders in the Green Zone to make precisely these compromises. But out in the real world, the hopes for reconciliation have fallen apart, for a simple but terrifying reason: Iraq's Sunnis and Shiites are so enraged that they have stopped believing compromise is possible.

How will withdrawal plans deal with the reality of this sectarian hatred? The administration's answer has been to try to build up the Iraqi military so it can impose a monopoly of force. But that hasn't been working, either. The Iraqi troops simply can't match the brutality of the insurgents and death squads. The U.S. military can do the job, but the cost in American lives is becoming unacceptable. If we are serious about a withdrawal timetable, we will have to accept Iraqi solutions, ragged and violent though they may be.

In the weeks after the election, the debate in Washington will focus on two promising exit ramps. But it's important not to attach unrealistic hopes to either one.

The first path is a more federal Iraq -- with power devolved to the Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish regions. But this presupposes a national government strong enough to formulate rules for, say, the sharing of oil revenue. If such a national framework existed, Iraq wouldn't be such a mess in the first place. Another tricky problem is stabilizing the Sunni areas that would be a potential safe haven for terrorists. If the Iraqi army can't control these areas, the only alternative may be, in effect, a Sunni militia drawn from the ranks of the insurgency. U.S. officials have been meeting secretly outside Iraq with insurgent leaders in an effort to draw them into such a framework.

The second exit ramp passes through Iran and Syria. Talking with Tehran and Damascus could be helpful in stabilizing Iraq, but we should recognize at the outset that their influence is limited -- and that it may carry an unacceptable price. Iran's goal in Iraq is a decisive Shiite victory and Sunni submission, but that's a formula for continuing civil war -- and in any event, it's not an agenda the United States should endorse. Syria could be helpful in curbing al-Qaeda in Iraq, but there are limits and drawbacks to Syrian power -- as was clear during its long and brutal occupation of Lebanon.

The real opportunity presented by the Baker-Hamilton process is that it's bipartisan. To get most American troops out of Iraq over the next year will require more patience at home, and a lot less partisan bickering. And our politicians will need strong stomachs: They must manage an orderly retreat under fire. There is a path out of this mess, but we will be lying if we call it victory.

The writer co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues.

'All Over The Place' (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

The president has fled the field from "stay the course," signaling not just the unwinnability of his war but the bankruptcy of his political strategy. For as the president and his party grope for an alternative plan of action in Iraq, Karl Rove's bright line between Republican resolve and Democratic defeatism has become irreversibly fuzzed.

"Stay the course," after all, was never intended to have a free-standing existence. Republicans invoked it only in dialectical contrast to "cut and run," their caricature of the Democrats' preference for a phased withdrawal from Iraq, or for partitioning it into three separate quasi-nations, or for redeploying our troops to neighboring states -- or, more simply, of the Democrats' mounting conviction that our presence in Iraq was growing more pointless each day.

In a strenuous attempt to make lemonade from lemons, George Bush attacked the Democrats for failing to articulate a clear, compelling alternative to his war, though his war created so cosmic a debacle that there were no compelling alternatives. Appearing last week with Don Sherwood, one of many embattled Republican congressmen in Pennsylvania, Bush accused the Democrats of being "all over the place" on Iraq.

Over the past several months, though, more and more Republican candidates have taken to voicing the same doubts and suggesting the same alternatives as those Democrat Defeatocrats. Wobbly Joe Biden has been joined by staunch Kay Bailey

Hutchison -- Republican of Texas, Bush's own senator -- in calling for a tripartite partition. "People say, 'Well, that would balkanize the country,' " she told the editorial board of the Dallas Morning News. "Well, things are pretty stable in the Balkans right now."

Or consider George Allen, Virginia's own Mr. Malaprop, who as recently as last month was preaching the gospel of Stay the Course and disparaging those who would "second-guess" his votes for the war. In just the past couple of weeks, Allen has allowed as how "mistakes have been made, and progress has been far too slow."

Earlier this month Bush stood alongside Allen at a Richmond fundraiser and complained that the Democrats "would have our country quit in Iraq before the job is done. That's why they are the party of cut and run. We will fight. We will stay. We will win in Iraq." But after Bush left, Allen told reporters he didn't embrace all the president had said: "The president has his ideas on Iraq. John Warner has his, and I have mine."

As Iraq descends into a Hobbesian bloodbath, it's every man for himself within the Grand Old Party. In Connecticut, Rep. Chris Shays, after his 14th visit to Iraq, announced he was "losing faith in how we are fighting this war." In New Jersey, senatorial candidate Tom Kean Jr. called for Don Rumsfeld's resignation. Most wondrous of all, in suburban Philadelphia, Rep. Curt Weldon, vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, suggested that the right to make decisions about the future deployment or redeployment of our troops in Iraq should be left to the generals there, rather than remain with Bush, Vice President Cheney and Rumsfeld -- in whose judgment, we must presume, Weldon has lost all confidence. Weldon is under investigation by the FBI over some alleged financial dealings that he and his family have had with Russian businesses. While they're at it, the agents might inquire if Weldon has ever read the Constitution, which designates the president as commander of our armed services.

If a Democrat offered Weldon's remedy for Iraq, the Republicans would flay him alive. When Weldon went woozy, however, they reacted by continuing to funnel money into his coffers. "Stay the course" has been replaced by "anything goes" -- so long as it helps the Republicans cling to power.

Idle Contractors Add Millions To Iraq Rebuilding (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

Overhead costs have consumed more than half the budget of some reconstruction projects in Iraq, according to a government estimate released yesterday, leaving far less money than expected to provide the oil, water and electricity needed to improve the lives of Iraqis.

The report provided the first official estimate that, in some cases, more money was being spent on housing and feeding employees, completing paperwork and providing security than on actual construction.

Those overhead costs have ranged from under 20 percent to as much as 55 percent of the budgets, according to the report, by the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. On similar projects in the United States, those costs generally run to a few percent.

The highest proportion of overhead was incurred in oil-facility contracts won by KBR Inc., the Halliburton subsidiary formerly known as Kellogg Brown & Root, which has frequently been challenged by critics in Congress and elsewhere.

The actual costs for many projects could be even higher than the estimates, the report said, because the United States has not properly tracked how much such expenses have taken from the $18.4 billion of taxpayer-financed reconstruction approved by Congress two years ago.

The report said the prime reason was not the need to provide security, though those costs have clearly risen in the perilous environment, and are a burden that both contractors and American officials routinely blame for such increases.

Instead, the inspector general pointed to a simple bureaucratic flaw: the United States ordered the contractors and their equipment to Iraq and then let them sit idle for months at a time.

The delay between “mobilization,” or assembling the teams in Iraq, and the start of actual construction was as long as nine months.

“The government blew the whistle for these guys to go to Iraq and the meter ran,” said Jim Mitchell, a spokesman for the inspector general’s office. “The government was billed for sometimes nine months before work began.”

DOJ_NMG_0085829

The findings are similar to those of a growing list of inspections, audits and investigations that have concluded that the program to rebuild Iraq has often fallen short for the most mundane of reasons: poorly written contracts, ineffective or nonexistent oversight, needless project delays and egregiously poor construction practices.

"This report is the latest chapter in a long, sad and expensive tale about how contracting in Iraq was more about shoveling money out the door than actually getting real results on the ground," said Stephen Ellis, a vice president at Taxpayers for Common Sense in Washington.

"These contracts were to design and build important items for oil infrastructure, hospitals and education, but in some cases more than half of the money padded corporate coffers instead," he said.

Although the federal report places much of the burden for the charges squarely on the shoulders of United States officials in Baghdad, the findings varied widely over a sampling of contracts examined by auditors, from a low of under 20 percent for some companies to a high of over 55 percent.

One oil contract awarded to a joint venture between Parsons, an American company, and Worley, from Australia, had overhead costs of at least 43 percent, the report found. One contract held by Parsons alone to build hospitals and prisons had overhead of at least 35 percent; in another, it was 17 percent.

The lowest figure was found for certain contracts won by Lucent, at 11 percent, but the report indicates that substantial portions of the overhead in those cases could not be determined.

The report did not explain why KBR's overhead costs on those contracts — the contracts totaled about $296 million — were more than 10 percent higher than those at the other companies audited. Despite past criticism of KBR, the Army, which administers those contracts, has generally agreed to pay most of the costs claimed by the company.

Melissa Norcross, a spokeswoman for KBR, said in a written reply to questions, "It is important to note that the special inspector general is not challenging any of KBR's costs referenced in this report."

"All of these costs were incurred at the client's direction and for the client's benefit," she said, referring to the Army Corps of Engineers, which is in charge of the oil contract.

But a frequent Halliburton critic, Representative Henry A. Waxman, a California Democrat who is the ranking minority member of the House Committee on Government Reform, disputed those assurances. "It's incomprehensible that over $160 million — more than half the value of the contract — was squandered on overhead," Mr. Waxman said in a written statement.

The majority leader of the same committee, Thomas M. Davis III, a Virginia Republican, declined to comment.

A spokeswoman for Parsons, Erin Kuhlman, said the United States categorized overhead and construction costs differently from contract to contract in Iraq, making it difficult to make direct comparisons. "Parsons incurred, billed and reported actual costs as directed by the government," she said.

In Iraq, where construction materials are scarce and contractors must provide security for work sites and housing for Western employees, officials have said they expect the overhead to be at least 10 percent, but the contractors and American officials have grudgingly conceded that the true costs have turned out to be higher.

But even the high of 55 percent could be an underestimate, Mr. Mitchell said, because the government often did not begin tracking overhead costs for months after the companies mobilized. He added that because of the haphazard way in which the government tracked the costs, it was not possible to say how well the figures reflected overhead charges in the entire program.

The report's conclusions were drawn from $1.3 billion in contracts for which United States government overseers actually made an effort to track overhead costs, of the total of $18.4 billion set aside for reconstruction in specific supplemental funding bills for the 2006 fiscal year.

When all American and Iraqi contributions are added up, various estimates for the cost of the rebuilding program range from $30 billion to $45 billion. Language included in the Defense Authorization Act, signed by President Bush last week, states that the inspector general's office will halt its examination of those expenditures by October of next year.

Maj. Gen. William H. McCoy, who until recently commanded the Persian Gulf region division of the Corps of Engineers, disputed some of the inspector general's findings in a letter appended to the report. Things like "waiting for concrete to cure" could still be taking place during what seem to be periods of inactivity, General McCoy wrote, so a quiet period "does not mean that the project is not moving forward."

DOJ_NMG_0085830

But many of the delays came during 2004 and took place in response to political developments in Iraq, the inspector general's report says. The American occupation government, the Coalition Provisional Authority, mobilized many of the companies early that year.

After the authority went out of existence in June 2004, handing sovereignty to the Iraqi government, top American officials then kept the companies idle for months as the officials rewrote the rebuilding plan, and ran up costs as little work was done.

Halliburton Cited For Iraq Overhead (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Administrative overhead accounted for more than half the costs that a Halliburton Co. subsidiary passed on to the government under a key contract to restore Iraq's oil industry, a figure that critics said was unusually high.

A report released yesterday by the inspector general's office overseeing Iraq spending found that at least 55 percent, or $163 million, of $296 million in total costs rung up by Halliburton unit KBR went to expenses such as back-office support, transportation and security. That percentage was significantly higher than it was on work by other firms in Iraq, and experts said it is far above what is typically found on a government contract.

The findings are the latest that call into question KBR's work under the deal, which required the company to rehabilitate oil facilities in southern Iraq. Under the contract's terms, KBR is reimbursed for its costs and then receives a percentage for profit on top, an arrangement that critics contend has given the firm an incentive to run up its bills.

According to internal government documents released in March, auditors found that the company had repeatedly overcharged the government by, among other things, billing for work it didn't actually do and paying suppliers more than they were owed. Meanwhile, work schedules slid and company officials balked at requests for accurate cost estimates. At one point, officials threatened to terminate the deal. Instead, KBR -- which has received more money from the Iraq war effort than any other firm -- was allowed to keep the contract and is now winding up work.

In a statement, Halliburton spokeswoman Melissa Norcross defended the company's administrative spending. "All of these costs were incurred at the client's direction and for the client's benefit, and they have been extensively audited and deemed allowable and legitimate," she said.

The Army Corps of Engineers -- which oversaw the contracts -- acknowledged that some of the administrative costs were high. But in a response to the inspector general's findings, the Corps argued that important work was getting done even when money was being spent on administrative matters rather than directly on Corps projects.

In government contracting, administrative rates can vary widely depending on the kind of work being done and on the circumstances.

Work in Iraq, for instance, often involves high security costs that inflate overhead.

Yesterday's report by the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction does not directly say whether KBR's overhead costs were excessive. But it does offer a more comprehensive look than was previously available at where the money has gone on the firm's oil contract, as well as on deals involving other companies to construct hospitals and schools. In many cases, contractors have failed to meet expectations, leaving the job of rebuilding critical services in Iraq to the Iraqis.

The United States has devoted more than $20 billion to rehabilitate Iraq, but critics contend that much of the money has been wasted as contractors used the government's checkbook to spend lavishly on hotels, food and employee salaries. Halliburton has come under particularly intense scrutiny because of the volume of work it has done in Iraq and because Vice President Cheney was once the firm's chief executive.

"Halliburton was given a blank check by the Bush Administration and the Republican Congress did nothing to stop the hemorrhaging of taxpayer dollars," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), a frequent Halliburton critic, in a statement.

Yesterday's report cites one contract in Iraq that had administrative rates of between 2.3 percent and 17 percent. Of the five contracts that auditors reviewed in depth, rates ranged from a high of 55 percent for the KBR deal to a low of 11 percent. The report cautions, however, that all of the estimates may be too low because of the way they were tabulated.

KBR's "rates are high," said Scott Amey, general counsel of the watchdog group Project on Government Oversight. "They would send up a red flag for me." But Amey said it would take a more thorough review of exactly where the money went to know how much was wasted.

In addition to noting KBR's overhead costs generally, the report focuses on a nine-month stretch between February 2004 -- when KBR was directed by the government to gear up for work -- and November 2004, when substantial work actually began. During that period, KBR spent $53 million on overhead and $13 million on direct project costs.

Report authors said that was due to "poor planning" by the government, which had asked the company to mobilize before key decisions had been made about which projects would be funded.

Halliburton stock jumped $1.58 yesterday, to close at $30.84 after news that the company had beaten Wall Street's expectations for third-quarter revenue and profit.

Halliburton had previously announced that it garnered $611 million in profit last quarter, up from $499 million in the comparable quarter last year.

KBR took in $1.2 billion in revenue for the quarter from Iraq-related work, though the company said the profit margin on that work was just 3.7 percent before corporate expenses and taxes.

Halliburton, which does most of its work in energy services, filed documents yesterday with federal regulators to spin off a portion of KBR as a public company.

Halliburton officials have said in the past that the unit is a drag on the parent company's earnings and share price.

Halliburton Will Sell 17% Of Its KBR Unit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

HOUSTON -- Halliburton Co. will sell 17% of its Kellogg, Brown & Root engineering unit in an initial public offering of stock later this year, according to an updated Securities and Exchange Commission filing by the oil-field services company.

The unit, known as KBR, also reported in the IPO filing that an investigation by a magistrate or a public prosecutor in Algeria "may be pending" regarding sole-source contracts awarded to Brown & Root-Condor SpA, a joint venture with Condor Engineering SpA in which KBR had a 49% interest as of June 30. The company didn't offer further details on the matter.

Halliburton, which put its planned IPO of KBR on hold this summer during a tough period for new stocks, said earlier this week that it wants to go ahead with the deal by the end of 2006 now that market conditions have improved. After selling 27.8 million shares to the public, Halliburton will own the remaining 83% of KBR; it plans to spin that stake off to Halliburton shareholders in April.

Iran's Supreme Leader Seeks Calm In Iraq (AP)

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 25, 2006

Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei on Tuesday called for an end to the bloody sectarian conflict tearing apart neighboring Iraq.

"The Iraqi people should do everything to avoid sectarian conflict," Khamenei told a crowd of thousands, including senior government officials, ringing in the first day of the Eid al-Fitr holiday at a mosque in Tehran. The celebration marks the end of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan.

Iraq's Shiite Muslim-led government has maintained close ties with Washington, as well as Shiite-dominated Iran since the fall of Saddam Hussein's overwhelmingly Sunni Arab regime.

But Iraq teeters on the brink of civil war with Sunni and Shiite factions launching daily attacks against each other and carrying out reprisal killings. The violence has displaced thousands of Iraqis, turning once-mixed neighborhoods into ethnic enclaves.

Many Iraqis believe Tehran has played a role in the unrest since Iran has ties to Iraq's largest Shiite political parties and their militias.

DOJ_NMG_0085832

That view was echoed hours after Khamenei's speech when Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, lambasted Iran and Syria for trying to undermine the American effort to stabilize Iraq. Casey said both countries had been "decidedly unhelpful."

In his address, Khamenei warned other Middle Eastern countries against cooperating with American initiatives that may be designed to divide the Middle East for Israel's benefit.

"Our nation should be aware. The Lebanese nation should be aware. The Palestinian nation should be aware. Arab nations in the region, Iraq and other Muslim nations should be careful not to play along with these U.S. plots," the supreme leader said, adding that the biggest priority for the U.S. in the Middle East was protecting Israel's interests.

"What is considered success for the U.S. is harming all Islamic nations," Khamenei said.

No Word On Soldier Missing In Baghdad (AP)

By Sinan Salaheddin

AP, October 25, 2006

The U.S. military carried out house-to-house searches in an upscale Baghdad neighborhood for an Army translator missing after reportedly being kidnapped, but said Tuesday they had found no sign of him.

The military said the U.S. soldier, who was not identified by name, was last seen Monday in the heavily guarded Green Zone in central Baghdad, after which he was believed to have left to visit relatives elsewhere in the capital.

U.S. and Iraqi forces threw a security cordon around the central Karradah district Monday night and Iraqis seeking to pass through the downtown area Tuesday were turned away at roadblocks. Army Kiowa OH-58 reconnaissance helicopters circled the area in pairs.

American soldiers patrolling Karradah showed photocopies of the missing man's photograph to residents in a search for leads as they checked houses and buildings across the area, which lies in a bend in the Tigris river.

The military said the soldier was a linguist with the Provincial Reconstruction Team in Baghdad. American troops who raided Baghdad's al-Furat TV on Monday said they were looking for an abducted American officer of Iraqi descent who went to join relatives in Karradah.

"We will leverage all available coalition resources to find this soldier," Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman said in a statement. "Our thoughts and prayers go out to his loved ones, and we are working for his safe return."

The soldier was reportedly at a relative's house when he was grabbed by masked men who handcuffed him and forced him into a vehicle. One of the men then called a relative with the soldier's cell phone, the military said. It did not say whether a ransom demand was made.

The last time U.S. soldiers were reported missing in Iraq was in June, when two Americans were captured in an attack on their checkpoint south of Baghdad. The soldiers were later found dead, their bodies brutalized, the military said. Al-Qaida in Iraq claimed responsibility.

Few American soldiers have been abducted in Iraq, due largely to strict military procedures for those on patrol or at checkpoints.

The U.S. military has rules for soldiers operating outside their bases that are designed to ensure they are under supervision and also to protect them. Soldiers leaving base are supposed to be accompanied by a noncommissioned officer and travel in at least two vehicles.

Military Mounts Search For Missing U.S. Soldier (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 24 -- U.S. forces scoured central Baghdad on Tuesday looking for a missing U.S. soldier who was presumed kidnapped by insurgents while visiting his Iraqi relatives. The troops went door-to-door, manned checkpoints, stopped and searched cars and showed pedestrians a picture of their missing comrade, hoping to generate leads on his whereabouts.

The U.S. military said in a statement that the soldier, who was not identified, was an Iraqi American who was assigned to a provisional reconstruction team as a translator.

DOJ_NMG_0085833

The soldier apparently has family in Baghdad and left the Green Zone -- the heavily fortified area in the city that is headquarters for the U.S. military, several embassies and the Iraqi government -- to visit relatives Monday to celebrate Eid al-Fitr, one of the biggest holidays of the Muslim year.

While he was at a relative's house, the statement said, three cars pulled up and men with rags over their faces "handcuffed the soldier and forced him into one of the vehicles."

A relative "who claimed to be at the residence when the abduction occurred was reportedly contacted by the kidnappers using the soldier's cell phone," the statement said. It did not say whether a ransom had been demanded or other demands had been made.

"We will leverage all available coalition resources to find this soldier," said Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman, commander of coalition forces in the capital. "Our thoughts and prayers go out to his loved ones."

"The search is ongoing," said Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington, a spokesman for the U.S. military command in the city. "We are committing all available coalition resources to find him."

The military said it searched the offices of al-Furat TV in Baghdad on Monday night. The station is owned by the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the country's top Shiite political party and the dominant party in the government.

An employee at the station told the Associated Press afterward that the soldier's wife, also an Iraqi American, reportedly was in the capital visiting family.

A U.S. military spokesman said the soldier was not authorized to be outside the Green Zone for the visit. His duty status has been listed by the military as "whereabouts unknown," the statement said.

The last time a U.S. soldier was abducted was in June, when two soldiers were seized during an insurgent ambush of a U.S. checkpoint south of Baghdad. The mutilated bodies of the two were found three days later. Al-Qaeda in Iraq asserted responsibility for the attack, in which a third U.S. soldier also was killed.

In an unrelated matter, U.S. forces in Fallujah shot and killed four Iraqi firefighters Tuesday, mistakenly believing that they were insurgents who had commandeered a firetruck, the U.S. military said in a statement.

The statement said that after reports had aired that insurgents had hijacked a truck and crew, soldiers spotted a firetruck responding to a call and pulled it over for an inspection. As the firefighters were quickly exiting their truck, "coalition forces thought they were armed" and opened fire, killing them all, the statement said.

A few minutes later, the statement said, the hijacked firetruck was spotted and pulled over, and the occupants fled.

At least five people were killed and more than 30 were wounded in violence in Baghdad on Tuesday.

Troops Fortify Hold On Plant That Once Housed Insurgents (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

YUSUFIYAH, Iraq, Oct. 24 -- When U.S. troops effortlessly occupied an enormous power plant that had been used by insurgents, they found blankets littering the steel risers, one room with the air conditioning running and a pot of tea ready to pour, and machine-gun cartridge cases strewn about. They saw cages -- one containing a pair of shoes and what appeared to be human feces -- on the bottom floor, what U.S. commanders said they believe is an indication that prisoners had been held there and possibly tortured.

U.S. and Iraqi soldiers on Tuesday began fortifying their position inside the plant in this Euphrates River town as part of a concerted effort to deny insurgents a safe haven scarcely 10 miles from Baghdad's southern edge.

The power plant is a half-finished relic. Though it never came close to being operational, it was a major target for the 2nd Brigade Combat Team, 10th Mountain Division, because of its long-standing use as a transient base for insurgent fighters. Its smokestack juts high above the horizon, and its beautiful vistas of the lush Euphrates River valley belie the sometimes chaotic battlefield below.

The move to take the plant comes amid an aggressive operation to push the insurgents out of a haven that has existed for years. U.S. officials said that the area's string of small rural Sunni towns has played host to leaders such as the late Abu Musab al-

Zarqawi and that teams of insurgents continue to intimidate the local populace while launching complex and coordinated attacks on U.S. patrol bases.

Soldiers at the bases, which in the past three weeks have been plunked down right on the edge of the most hostile areas, are now charged with rooting out the insurgents and winning over the local people, a task they acknowledge is not going to be easy.

"We're fighting somebody very smart, a group of people who have been fighting all their lives," said 1st Sgt. David Schumacher, 37, of Watertown, N.Y., who helped lead A Company of the 2nd Battalion, 14th Infantry Regiment, into the power plant this week. "Even with everything we have, we find them and destroy them but we can't find everyone."

The insurgents have found ways to blend in easily with the surrounding communities, in part because the Sunni villagers say they are distrustful of the fledgling Iraqi army units in the area and fear the insurgents and their threats. On Thursday, a group of 20 black-clad insurgents made a run on U.S. positions near the power plant, using machine guns and mortars to attack in a very organized fashion, said Capt. Brendan Hobbs, 30, of Tampa.

On Sunday, a similar group used heavy machine guns, rockets, rocket-propelled grenades and mortars to attack a U.S. base in Rushdi Mullah, a small farming village that represents the front line for U.S. troops. One U.S. soldier was killed in that attack.

But Capt. Chris Vitale, 29, of Washington, Pa., said his B Company, 4th Battalion, 31st Infantry Regiment, is working to connect with residents who live yards away to convince them that the insurgents are their enemy, too. Vitale said that last week the residents came to his unit when a little girl accidentally drank diesel fuel and needed immediate medical attention. After soldiers helped save her, people in the streets openly thanked them.

"They're not afraid to come and talk to us now, and they say they just want to live their lives," Vitale said, adding that men in the neighborhood have recently waved the soldiers down to point out suspicious activity. "Insurgents are coming in and smacking the locals around, going on their roofs, and they don't like it. I think it's a matter of days before we start getting really good intelligence from them."

Attacks, including several powerful roadside bombs and attempted car bombings, have increased in recent days because U.S. troops have been pushing forward and trying to squeeze out the insurgents, said Col. Michael Kershaw, the 2-10 Mountain's commander.

"We've got them up against the river now, and they don't have many options," Kershaw said. He surveyed the region Tuesday from atop the power plant and visited his forward patrol bases. Special Operations Forces also were in the area Tuesday going after insurgents, using helicopters to attack a home in the late afternoon, sending up plumes of smoke visible miles away.

In the most contested region under the 2-10's responsibility, the Iraqi army battalion is still performing at a low level and is probably many months from being able to operate on its own, according to U.S. soldiers. While the Iraqi soldiers said in a brief interview Tuesday at the power plant that they are committed to the fight, the difficulty comes in winning over the local populace.

Juad Kazim, a resident in Mulla Fayyad, a tiny Sunni town a few miles from the power plant, said residents fear leaving their town because of Shiite militias. People are afraid to send their children to school because they have been told the schoolhouses will be targeted, and they fear the Iraqi army, unless they are escorted by U.S. troops, because the units are mostly Shiite.

"All we want is security and safety, that's it," Kazim said through an interpreter.

Military Trains Personnel In Advisory Roles (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

tt riley, kan. — Within the Army's tightly knit community of counterinsurgency experts, Lt. Col. John Nagl is something of a star.

When the Army and Marine Corps decided to rewrite their field manual on how to fight insurgents last year, Nagl was chosen as one of its authors. His doctoral thesis on guerrilla wars was just republished in paperback with an approving forward by the Army's chief of staff.

DOJ_NMG_0085835

But when Nagl's two-year stint in the Pentagon ended this month, he did not, like most accomplished soldiers of his rank, take command of an armored battalion headed back to Iraq. Instead, he shipped out to this sprawling base in rural Kansas where the Army is attempting what some consider its most ambitious structural change since the Vietnam War.

Here, amid rolling fields dotted by scores of quickly built barracks, the Army is building a training base that by early next year will be turning as many as 2,000 of its most promising midlevel officers into military advisors every two months, most of them headed to Iraq.

The mission reflects the U.S. military's vision of its long-range role in Iraq -- as advisors for local forces who will be doing the actual fighting. But it represents something of a gamble as well: The effort is sucking thousands out of their normal combat deployments at a time when American forces are facing personnel shortages and violence in Iraq is surging.

It is also a signal that, as commanders in Iraq move to re-evaluate tactics in the wake of a faltering Baghdad offensive and rising U.S. casualties, the work of military advisors is likely to emerge as a pillar of any plan to withdraw American troops. In Baghdad on Tuesday, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, said it may take more U.S. troops to quell violence in Baghdad.

Already, there are 3,600 military advisors in Iraq, training, organizing and accompanying Iraqi units into action. But as the effort at Fort Riley ramps up, Army officials acknowledge that number could grow by thousands -- and perhaps tens of thousands, once Afghanistan is added to the program -- in the coming months.

"This is much bigger than ... sending Special Forces teams down to El Salvador or Colombia to work in small groups," said Gen. Richard A. Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff, referring to past U.S. advisory efforts.

The size and the scope of the new effort, which began in June with the arrival at Fort Riley of the first class of prospective advisers, is a sign of how seriously the Army is now taking the mission.

"I feel like we'll be the last men standing at the end of the U.S. presence here," said Brig. Gen. Dana Pittard, the Army officer sent to Baghdad in July to take over the adviser program.

The Army has begun pouring resources into the effort. Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, has assigned an entire division headquarters -- the 1st Infantry, one of only 10 divisions in the Army -- to take over the training mission, and has ordered two of its combat brigades to rid themselves of all their tanks and infantrymen to devote their officers exclusively to training advisers.

"The fact he took one of his divisions, at a time he needs divisions, and two heavy brigades, at a time he needs heavy brigades, that by itself speaks volumes of how important this is," said Maj. Gen. Carter F. Ham, the 1st Infantry's new commander.

The Army in April added a series of incentives to convince its best officers to volunteer for the program. The most attractive is a guarantee that volunteers will get an assignment of their choice after a year as an adviser.

The effects of the advisor program are already visible. Kalev Sepp, an instructor at the Naval Postgraduate School, said he was taken aback when, before a recent lecture to Iraq combat veterans going through a course for captains at Fort Knox, he was repeatedly told by officers that they were headed to Fort Riley.

"I finally just said, 'How many people here are going back to Iraq as advisors?' and half the people in the room raised their hand," said Sepp, himself a military adviser in El Salvador as a Special Forces major 17 years ago. "That's extraordinary."

But until the start of the year, the Army's attention to its military advisor program was haphazard at best.

The concept itself started on an ad-hoc basis. Early in the Iraq war, some commanders adapted quickly to fighting a counterinsurgency and set up embedded military adviser teams on the fly.

Most prominently, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli -- now the commander of all ground forces in Iraq, but also the commander of the 1st Cavalry Division in Baghdad's Sadr City slums in early 2004 -- took hundreds of his soldiers from their assigned units to create 70 small teams who "lived, ate, and trained with the Iraqi Army," Chiarelli wrote in a summary of his deployment. Maj. Gen. John Batiste, who commanded the 1st Infantry Division the same year, took similar steps in the Sunni Triangle north of Baghdad.

But Chiarelli and Batiste were exceptions to the rule. Most commanders, when ordered to provide soldiers for military training teams -- dubbed MiTT teams in military jargon -- would turn over men who were not needed for essential operations.

"Some took it very seriously and picked very good people," said Pittard. "Some said, 'Well, who can we spare?' "

DOJ_NMG_0085836

The result was predictable. When Sepp, who has traveled to Iraq as a counterinsurgency adviser to U.S. commanders, met military trainers in Taji as recently as December, he was "unimpressed with the quality of people."

"The lieutenant colonel that I met there, the first thing on his mind was how much longer he had before he left," remembered Sepp. "He had it down to hours. He was completely uninterested in what they were doing."

Adviser teams were thrown together and, in many cases, did not meet each other until arriving in Iraq -- a drastic change for combat units who normally spend a year together before deployment.

While the huge shift under way at Fort Riley will address many problems, it also raises some new ones.

The Army already is scrounging for soldiers to send to Iraq in combat brigades. Two senior military planners said in interviews that the move to push thousands of officers into adviser roles has exacerbated readiness problems already plaguing the Army.

The military advising mission is particularly debilitating because it is officer-heavy. The typical 11-man U.S. team sent to advise an Iraqi battalion consists of five enlisted officers above the rank of staff sergeant, and six commissioned officers.

Cody acknowledged the overhaul of the adviser mission will "put added strain on the force." He said the Army is compensating by filling some senior officer jobs with more junior officers, particularly in units that have just returned from Iraq.Perhaps more troubling, however, is the time it has taken to make the adviser program a priority. While Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and President Bush have mentioned military advisers as central to plans to hand security duties to Iraqis, it has taken three years to begin to fix the program.

Counterinsurgency experts said that the U.S. must make a long-term commitment to the program and support the Iraqi military with money and American airpower, or risk a catastrophic, Vietnam-like collapse of the Iraqi armed forces.

But it is unclear how long the Army is willing to stay with the program. Ham, the 1st Infantry commander, said he views the training mission to be a two- to three-year commitment. Cody said he is preparing for five years.

But even that might not be long enough. Nagl, the army guerrilla war expert, recalled that the British counterinsurgency that began in 1948 in Malaya lasted 12 years.

"These are long wars," Nagl said. "These are long, hard wars."

Grass-Roots Group Of Troops Petitions Congress For Pullout From Iraq (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

More than 100 U.S. service members have signed a rare appeal urging Congress to support the "prompt withdrawal" of all American troops and bases from Iraq, organizers said yesterday.

"Staying in Iraq will not work and is not worth the price. It is time for U.S. troops to come home," reads the statement of a small grass-roots group of active-duty military personnel and reservists that says it aims to give U.S. military members a voice in Iraq war policy.

"As a patriotic American proud to serve the nation in uniform, I respectfully urge my political leaders in Congress to support the prompt withdrawal of American military forces and bases from Iraq," it reads. The group, which aims to collect 2,000 signatures and deliver the message to Congress in January, is sponsored by antiwar activists including Iraq Veterans Against the War, Veterans for Peace and Military Families Speak Out.

The unusual appeal -- the first of its kind in the Iraq war, organizers say -- makes use of a legal protection afforded by the Military Whistle-Blower Protection Act, which provides that members of the military, acting in their capacity as citizens, can send a protected communication to Congress without reprisal.

"Just because you put on the uniform of our country doesn't mean you've given up your rights as a citizen," said J.E. McNeil, a lawyer for the group and executive director for the Center on Conscience & War, a Washington organization that protects the rights of conscientious objectors.

But the service members can exercise this right only while off duty and out of uniform, and they must otherwise make clear they are not speaking for the military. In addition, they cannot say anything disrespectful about their commanders, including the president, McNeil said.

Navy Seaman Jonathan Hutto of Atlanta was the first service member to sign the appeal.

"I hear discussions every day among my shipmates about the war in Iraq and how it doesn't make any sense at this point," said Hutto, who is based in Norfolk and served from September 2005 until March on a ship off Iraq's coast. "There is no victory in sight, and war is still inevitable." He said he opposes the war because of its human and economic tolls, adding that the billions of dollars should be spent on jobs and education at home.

Marine Corps Sgt. Liam Madden, 22, served in Iraq's restive Anbar province from September 2004 until February 2005 and found his opposition to the war intensified after he returned to the United States. "I don't think any more Iraqis or Americans should die because of the U.S. occupation," he said, expressing disappointment that Iraqi elections in January 2005 did not lead to a decline in violence.

"I think some things are worth fighting for, I just don't feel Iraq is one of them," said Madden, of Bellows Falls, Vt. The Quantico-based Marine plans to leave the service to attend college in January.

Madden said he and Hutton met and learned of the vehicle for expressing their views to Congress when they attended a lecture at the YMCA in Norfolk by David Cortright, the author of "Soldiers in Revolt: GI Resistance During the Vietnam War."

War Critics Try To Recruit Military (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, October 25, 2006

Anti-war groups are trying to rally active troops to speak out against the war in Iraq — a political tactic they hope will sway voters Nov. 7.

A small group of active-duty members opposed to the war created a Web site last month intended to collect thousands of signatures of other service members. People can submit their name, rank and duty station if they support statements denouncing the U.S. invasion.

The electronic grievances are then passed along to members of Congress, according to the Web site.

"Staying in Iraq will not work and is not worth the price. It is time for U.S. troops to come home," the Web site says.

Jonathan Hutto, a Navy seaman based in Norfolk, Va., who set up the Web site a month ago, said the group has collected 118 names and is trying to verify that they are legitimate service members.

There are 1.4 million troops on active duty, including members of the National Guard and Reserve.

Retired veterans have long waded into politics, including the 2004 presidential campaign when a group of veterans challenged Sen. John Kerry's war record. More recently, several retired military generals have called on Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to resign, contending he botched the war and put troops at risk.

Hearing publicly from active-duty troops is rare. Military laws bar officers from denouncing the president and other U.S. leaders, and regulations typically prevent service members from lobbying for a particular cause while on duty or wearing the uniform.

Legal experts who reviewed the Web site said the effort probably would not violate any rules because the site is not a personal attack on members of the administration and allows service members to quietly pass their grievance to Congress in their free time.

Backers of the Web site also cite a "whistle-blower protection" law as added protection. Under the law, service members can file complaints to Congress without reprisal.

But at least two senators — both critical of the administration's handling of the war in Iraq — said they were concerned that service members speaking out against the president may undermine the military's apolitical status.

"We expect our soldiers to follow ... the legitimate orders of their commanders," said Sen. Jack Reed of Rhode Island, who is helping lead Democratic opposition to the war this election season.

"And if you feel a course of action is inappropriate, your choice is just getting out of the service, basically, if you can and making your comments as a civilian," said Reed, a West Point graduate and former Army Ranger and paratrooper.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, a former reserve judge for the Air Force, said vocal complaints by active-duty members represented a "disturbing trend" that threatened to erode the cohesiveness of the military.

DOJ_NMG_0085838

"We've had a long tradition making sure the military doesn't engage in political debate," said Graham, R-S.C. "We don't need a Democratic Army and a Republican Army," he added.

Hutto and supporters of his Web site said they see no problem with active-duty military personnel weighing into politics.

"We're doing this on our own time," Hutto said. Also, "We're speaking as American citizens," rather than service members.

Scott Silliman, director of Duke University's Center on Law, Ethics and National Security, said he sees the increasing political noise being made from military members — active and retired — as a relatively new phenomenon resulting from an increasingly unpopular war.

"Fifteen, 20 years ago you wouldn't have seen it happen," Silliman said.

Still, Silliman said, he sees little wrong with troops speaking out on their own time so long as they are not senior-ranking officers needed to carry out the president's orders. "It depends certainly on who it is" ramping up opposition to the executive branch, he said.

Cynthia Smith, a Pentagon spokeswoman, said members can share their views with the press so long as they are not wearing the uniform and make clear that they are not speaking on behalf of the armed forces.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

Out and about

That was Margaret Carlson, the Washington editor of the Week magazine and a longtime Washington figure (she wrote for Time before that, and was managing editor of the New Republic, as well as Washington bureau chief for Esquire magazine, and editor of both Washington Weekly and the Legal Times of Washington) welcoming guests into her Northwest home last evening to toast Slate chief political correspondent John Dickerson and his new book, "On Her Trail: My Mother, Nancy Dickerson, TV News' First Woman Star."

Meanwhile, Washington's younger crowd convened late into the night at the new Hotel Palomar on P Street NW, helping Grey Goose Vodka and Capitol File magazine crown the "Best Bartender in Washington."

And the winner, as voted by D.C. bargoers: Alex Rivera of Gua-Rapo, the popular Latin American fusion restaurant in Arlington.

Fun facts: By day, Mr. Rivera is a program officer at the Academy for Educational Development. He also was lead singer in the rock band Stars Hide Fire, once featured on MTV. His winning cocktail is called "duck, duck, GOOSE!"

No morality here

Question: What ex-lawmaker, a Newt Gingrich disciple who swept into Congress during the 1994 Republican revolution, was once a roadie for the Allman Brothers band?

Answer: former Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican and centerpiece of the congressional page scandal.

Just one intriguing tidbit about Mr. Foley that Inside the Beltway learned yesterday, passed on by veteran investigative reporter Alicia Mundy, the Washington correspondent for the Seattle Times.

Miss Mundy recalled her wide-ranging interview several years ago with Mr. Foley when she worked for E! Online. He had just become Hollywood's point man on Capitol Hill as chairman of the congressional Entertainment Industry Task Force.

"Looking back, I recall wondering at the time why a conservative Republican member of Congress followed Heather Locklear and 'Dynasty.' It was different from other political interviews," she told us.

In fact, Mr. Foley told her about his personal relationships with actors Don Johnson (they used to play golf together) and Julia Roberts, and how he was star-struck with Miss Locklear.

He also spoke about his friendships with Gregg Allman, drummer Butch Trucks and guitarist Dickey Betts of the Allman Brothers (a former Palm Beach, Fla., real estate agent, Mr. Foley even sold Mr. Betts a house), and recalled the time he toured with the band.

"Yeah. It was crazy. I was on the bus. It was wild," said Mr. Foley, adding that when the tour closed, "I ended up at one of the Allman Brothers' houses in Vegas."

DOJ_NMG_0085839

Mr. Foley also was asked about his vote to block fellow Republican Rep. Henry J. Hyde's so-called "culture amendment," introduced in the wake of Colorado's Columbine school shootings to curtail the extreme violence seen in some Hollywood films.

"We should not be the ones to tell the public what they should let their children see. We can't be the divining rod for what's moral or what's decent," he replied.

Asked why he didn't march more in step with other Republican leaders on such issues, Mr. Foley said: "I admire William Bennett ... and definitely John McCain. But they're trying to blame society's ills on one aspect only -- entertainment. As for their impact -- hey, I don't think anyone sees a politician as being a moral leader."

Plame game

Even if Republicans can't bring themselves to read David Corn and Michael Isikoff's new book, "Hubris: The Inside Story of Spin, Scandal, and the Selling of the Iraq War," they might find amusing the lengthy written exchange between the latter co-author and columnist Bob Novak in the latest issue of one conservative Washington magazine.

"I was amused, to say the least, to see that my old friends at The Weekly Standard asked Bob Novak to review ... the new book I co-authored with David Corn," writes Mr. Isikoff, who wonders: "Was Scooter Libby unavailable?"

The Newsweek reporter cited "a few inaccuracies and misrepresentations" in the columnist's critique -- from events leading up to former CIA officer Valerie Plame's being "outed" to Mr. Novak's assertion that the book "comes close" to being "an unmitigated apologia" for former Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, Mrs. Plame's husband and critic of the Bush administration.

Finally, Mr. Isikoff takes issue with Mr. Novak's portrayal of Mr. Corn, the Washington editor of the Nation magazine, as a left-wing polemicist more interested in furthering an ideological agenda than seeking the truth.

"If only some conservative journalists showed the same willingness to report stories that conflict with their initial assumptions," he wrote in defense of Mr. Corn.

Mr. Novak?

"I regret that my friend Mike Isikoff, in his letter, is still peddling the story of Scooter Libby and Karl Rove attempting to discredit Wilson by revealing his wife's intelligence background," the columnist writes. "Apparently, he joins David Corn in not being able to accept that the conspiracy theory was demolished by his own book."

War On West Shifts Back To Afghanistan (LAT)

By Sebastian Rotella

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

The conflict in Iraq is drawing fewer foreign fighters as Muslim extremists aspiring to battle the West turn their attention back to the symbolically important and increasingly violent turf of Afghanistan, European and U.S. anti-terrorism officials say.

The shift of militants to Afghanistan this year suggests that Al Qaeda and its allies, armed with new tactics honed in Iraq, are coming full circle five years after U.S.-led forces ousted the Taliban mullahs.

Until Sept. 11, 2001, Afghanistan was the land of jihad: hallowed ground where fighters from across the Muslim world helped vanquish the Soviet Union in 1980s, fought alongside the Taliban in the 1990s and filled training camps overseen by Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden. Loss of the Afghan sanctuary scattered the networks and sent Bin Laden fleeing toward the Pakistani border region, where many anti-terrorism officials believe he remains.

After the fall of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein in 2003, Muslim extremists from the Arabian Peninsula, North Africa and Europe flocked to confront the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq. Although foreigners have been a minority in the Iraqi insurgency, militants such as Jordanian-born Abu Musab Zarqawi played a major role in suicide attacks and kidnap-killings.

But insurgent leaders in Iraq are now mainly interested in foreign recruits ready to die in suicide attacks, anti-terrorism officials say. Moreover, the conflict is dominated by violence between Sunni and Shiite Muslims. In contrast, an accelerating Afghan offensive by the resurgent Taliban offers a clearer battleground and a wealth of targets: U.S. and other North Atlantic Treaty Organization troops, and the Western-backed government.

As Iraqis have solidified control of their insurgency, the movement of foreign fighters to Iraq has "significantly declined in recent months," said Pierre de Bousquet de Florian, director of the DST, France's lead counter-terrorism agency.

"There is less need for them in Iraq, because there's a need above all for kamikazes and there are not an infinite number of volunteers," Bousquet, whose agency works closely with U.S., European and Arab counterparts, said in a recent interview. "The Iraqi insurgency is now very well organized around Iraqis.... Those who want to fight, but not necessarily to die as martyrs, go elsewhere."

Simultaneously, Bousquet said, anti-terrorism agents have detected a new flow of militants heading to Afghanistan, where more than 1,000 French soldiers are among the approximately 40,000 foreign troops deployed.

Iraq attracted many Arabs, including Saudis, Yemenis and Syrians, Bousquet said. Algerians, Tunisians and other North Africans made up the second-largest group. About 100 fighters from Europe have gone to Iraq over a three-year period, he said.

"Today they return to the route of Afghanistan, or the tribal zones of Pakistan, where clearly they are thriving," Bousquet said. "Certainly there are some Europeans, but very few. In contrast, in Afghanistan there are certainly many Pakistanis and people from Arab countries and some from North Africa."

A leap in violence in Afghanistan this year has featured tactics such as suicide and roadside bombings that are trademarks of the insurgency in Iraq, according to Bousquet and other officials.

Despite decades of warfare, suicide bombings were rare in Afghanistan. But the number has shot up from six in 2004 to at least 78 so far this year.

"Clearly, methods have been transposed in Afghanistan that did not exist during previous wars in Afghanistan," Bousquet said. "Like suicide attacks. And that's directly influenced by what's happening in the Middle East, in Iraq."

Muslim extremists from North Africa make the odyssey to Afghanistan through routes that converge in Pakistan, another senior French anti-terrorism official said.

"There's a new route along which [North Africans] pass through Peshawar and down into Afghanistan to carry out operations," the senior anti-terrorism official said. "And what's new is the suicide operations. That's not at all part of the Afghan mentality."

North Africans have been detected traveling to Koranic schools in Quetta and Peshawar, said Louis Caprioli, who retired as chief of the DST's anti-terrorism division in 2004. The fighters use the schools as covers for their presence in Pakistan and as staging areas to cross into Taliban-dominated areas of Afghanistan, Caprioli said.

Foreign fighters are predominantly Sunni. They increasingly prefer fighting alongside the Taliban to getting embroiled in the Sunni-versus-Shiite bloodshed in Iraq, said Caprioli, who works closely with the intelligence community at the Paris-based GEOS security firm.

"There are a certain number of foreign jihadis who aren't interested in massacring Shiites," Caprioli said. "In Afghanistan, you have NATO troops to fight as well as Americans, all the 'crusaders.' "

In addition, veterans of combat in Iraq have made their way to Afghanistan, officials said.

"There's a definite increase in foreign fighters going to Afghanistan from all over," said a U.S. anti-terrorism official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "They go through Pakistan. Or they train in Iraq and then keep going to Afghanistan."

U.S. Special Forces officers in Afghanistan learned last year that Arabs were being trained as suicide bombers in Iraq, then traveling through Iran to Pakistan, according to an intelligence document on a computer drive smuggled out of a U.S. base in Afghanistan and sold at a bazaar in April. Extremists transported the aspiring bombers, mostly Yemenis and Syrians, from Quetta across the border into Afghanistan, according to the document on the drive.

The U.S. anti-terrorism official said that militants from as far as away as the Caribbean island of Trinidad, which has a large number of residents of South Asian origin, had traveled to Afghanistan via South Africa.

Afghan officials blame foreigners for the escalating violence in their country. In several suicide bombings this year, witnesses and officials described attackers as Arabs.

"I think this is true that they are shifting Al Qaeda suicide attackers from Syria, and not only Syria but other countries like it, from other parts of the world, to Afghanistan through Iran and Pakistan and countries like that," said Sayed Anwar, who recently served as deputy chief of the Afghan Interior Ministry's counter-terrorism branch.

DOJ_NMG_0085841

Basir Salangi, a police chief in eastern Nangarhar province, said Arabs, Chechens and Pakistanis conduct suicide and other attacks in the border regions, but that attacks in Kabul, the capital, are primarily carried out by Afghans who have been trained in Pakistan. And the combatants in Afghanistan still are overwhelmingly Afghans.

Afghan officials allege that key training centers for the Taliban are in Quetta, Peshawar and Miram Shah, and that militants use mountain routes to cross the border. "There are foreign fighters from several countries who have sanctuary and training in our neighboring country," said Gen. Zahir Azemi, chief spokesman for the Afghan army, referring to Pakistan.

Pakistani officials deny such allegations. This year, Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, a spokesman for the Pakistani military, said the "sweeping statement" that Pakistan harbored training camps for cross-border Taliban networks was "absurd."

The movement of fighters to Iraq began to decline last year as insurgent leaders in Syria, who serve as a conduit to the combat zone, began screening volunteers aggressively, turning them back unless they had strong military skills or were eager to carry out suicide attacks, European anti-terrorism officials said.

Some newcomers were redirected to training camps in North Africa. Others were told to launch attacks in Europe, said a senior Italian anti-terrorism official. He described the confessions of Milan-based Tunisian and Moroccan suspects who got to Syria, but then were sent back: "They said the representative of Zarqawi's group really grilled them: 'Do you have military experience? Here's an AK-47; do you know how to use it? Have you ever fired a mortar? If not, we don't want you.' "

Instead, they were directed to bomb a basilica in Bologna because it displays a painting of the prophet Muhammad as depicted in Dante's Inferno, investigators say. Moroccan and Italian police broke up the alleged plot and arrested the group this spring.

Meanwhile, Afghanistan's historical allure for Islamic militants, the lawlessness of the Pakistani border region and the aggressiveness of the Taliban make for an ominous combination, anti-terrorism officials said.

Besides fighting in Afghanistan, Al Qaeda and its allies could once again use training venues and combat zones in the Afghan-Pakistani borderlands to groom terrorists for attacks in the West, Caprioli said. The suicide bombers who struck the London transport system last year and other British suspects in foiled terrorist plots traveled to Pakistan for training, expertise and direction, anti-terrorism officials say.

"Right now [extremists] go to Afghanistan to fight alongside the Taliban," Caprioli said. "But the concern is that we could return to a situation like the one that existed before 2001, when they went for training and then came back. We have not reached that point yet. But people are beginning to get worried."

Pakistan's Sovereignty (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

Our finest foreign-policy minds have been abuzz lately trying explain how and why the U.S. and its NATO allies are, as a recent Newsweek International cover has it, "Losing Afghanistan." But no need for deep thoughts here: The largest part of the problem is neighboring Pakistan.

In September, the Pakistan government of Pervez Musharraf agreed to abandon its North Waziristan province -- which shares a long border with Afghanistan -- to the de facto rule of its "tribal elders" and the Taliban and mujahadeen terrorists they harbor. Since then, as Barnett Rubin observes nearby, the number of cross-border raids into Afghanistan has risen threefold.

It's true that the agreement the Pakistan government signed with these elders explicitly forbids such raids. But General Musharraf surely knew that the Taliban would not keep idle in Waziristan for long, especially since he also agreed to the release and pardon of all Taliban prisoners and the return of their confiscated weapons.

From day one in the war on terror, the Bush Administration has said it would make no distinction between terrorists and those who harbor them. So far, Mr. Musharraf has earned an exception to this rule by helping to capture al Qaeda suspects early on, and then by pleading that his government cannot control its unruly tribal areas. But then he cannot also refuse to allow NATO troops and U.S. Predator missiles to do the job for him.

We don't know what General Musharraf promised President Bush and Afghan President Hamid Karzai during their recent conclave in the White House. But we hope it was more tangible cooperation than we have been seeing of late. Sovereignty has responsibilities, and General Musharraf is not exercising them.

A Border Affair (WSJ)

By Barnett R. Rubin

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

It will take more than a dinner at the White House -- such as the one held for Pervez Musharraf and Hamid Karzai last month -- to overcome the longstanding antagonism between Pakistan and Afghanistan. Of course, the political clumsiness on the part of the U.S. does not begin or end there. Had we paid more attention to pre-9/11 history, we might not face a rising Taliban insurgency with sanctuary in Pakistan.

U.S., NATO and Afghan intelligence agree that the Taliban leadership's safe haven in Pakistan, especially in the city of Quetta and some tribal agencies, is essential to the insurgency's ability to exploit Afghanistan's internal weaknesses. Gen. Musharraf admitted in Kabul on Sept. 7 that while Pakistan had worked against al Qaeda, "the focus had now shifted to the Taliban." In other words, Pakistan had theretofore done nothing to hinder them.

On Sept. 5, Gen. Musharraf's government signed an agreement in the North Waziristan tribal agency with tribal elders, local mujahadeen, Taliban and ulama (Islamic clergy), under which the Pakistani army would withdraw to bases, and the fighters would end attacks into Afghanistan. The number of such attacks, however, has tripled since the agreement.

Pakistan has never fully acted on U.S. demands to fight the Taliban, not because Gen. Musharraf is "against us" rather than "with us," but because the Pakistan army sees its interests in a regional context, not as part of the U.S. war on terror. The conflict between Pakistan and Afghanistan, the anomalous status of Pakistan's tribal areas, the contest between Talibanization and Pashtun nationalism in the borderlands, the struggle over military control of the Pakistani state, and the refuge for terrorists along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border are all linked, as are the policies that could address these problems.

Except for the five years of Taliban rule in Kabul, Pakistan and Afghanistan have had largely hostile relations since Pakistan was created almost 60 years ago. Even under the Taliban, Afghanistan never accepted the incorporation of Pashtun and Baluch territories into Pakistan. This dispute had led Afghanistan's monarchy to seek Soviet military aid to counter Pakistan's U.S.-aided army, and to align itself diplomatically with India.

Pakistan's military has used jihadi militants to accomplish several goals: to wage asymmetrical warfare in Kashmir and Afghanistan; to spread Islamism among Pashtuns on both sides of the border to counter Pashtun and Baluch nationalists who it feared would break up the country; and to cement its alliance with Islamist parties, whose street power intimidates and marginalizes the centrist parties that have dominated fair elections in Pakistan. The Pashtun tribal agencies (known as the Federally Administered Tribal Areas, or FATA), play a key role in this strategy: The absence of national administration or political institutions creates a space where Islamist militias can organize and train, while the Pakistani state denies responsibility for it.

Pakistan's rulers depict these tribal areas as repositories of ancient traditions, but they are actually relics of colonialism. In 1901, Lord Curzon, viceroy of India, promulgated the Frontier Crimes Regulations under which FATA is still run. The "tribal elders" of whom Gen. Musharraf speaks are not representatives of traditional society, but objects of manipulation by the government's "political agents," who wield slush funds with no accountability. Elders who oppose the Taliban are summarily executed. Such murders are so common that the term used for them, "target killings," was incorporated in English into the Urdu-language text of the Waziristan agreement. Two of these supposedly banned killings took place within a week after the agreement was signed.

Pakistan thus pursues the goal, inherited from the British Empire, of using violence and manipulation to assure that no hostile forces gain a foothold along the border, or in Afghanistan. The main force that concerns Pakistan is India, which has opened consulates in Jalalabad and Qandahar, near the Pakistan border. Pakistan charges that Indian intelligence uses agents to spy on and destabilize Pakistan, for instance by fomenting unrest in Baluchistan, where Islamabad faces the fifth insurgency since its government incorporated the area in 1947.

Gen. Musharraf's ethnic charges -- that the Afghan government is dominated by Tajiks who marginalize Pashtuns like President Karzai and the majority of his cabinet and provincial governors -- are linked to the goal of purging Afghanistan of Indian influence. By "Tajiks," Gen. Musharraf means the remaining officials (head of the intelligence agency and army chief of staff) from the Northern Alliance faction that received aid from Iran, Russia and, worst of all, India, during its resistance to the Pakistani-supported Taliban. At last month's White House dinner, President Karzai refuted these erroneous ethnic charges, while President Bush pointed out that the U.S., not India, is supporting the Afghan military and intelligence services.

This archaic border arrangement has created a space for Pakistan to allow militant parties and former intelligence agents to support the Taliban. Firm pressure to shut down the Taliban command and control must be accompanied by efforts to support democracy and civilian rule in Pakistan, which would empower the centrist and nonsectarian parties that have actually won elections in Pakistan. Democratization should be extended to the tribal areas, where political parties are now outlawed, giving radical militias a political monopoly. Several mainstream Pakistani parties have proposed such reforms.

The U.S. and Afghanistan should also recognize legitimate Pakistani concerns. The sizes of Indian consulates should be limited, and the U.S, Afghanistan and India should agree to confidence-building measures about their roles. Once Pakistan acts against Taliban sanctuaries, President Karzai should also take the courageous and politically difficult step to initiate a political dialogue in both Afghanistan and across the border over resolution of all outstanding issues, including the recognition of an open border between the two countries. In return, landlocked Afghanistan will need guaranteed access to Pakistani port facilities.

The U.S. and other NATO countries would have to act as guarantors of this process and provide aid to develop the border area, where unemployment and illiteracy facilitate recruitment to armed groups. These policies would address the roots of instability and violence in this region, and make those on both sides of the frontier genuine partners in protecting both their own security, and ours.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

First Senior Executive Admits Options Fraud (FT)

By Kevin Allison In San Francisco And Agencies

Financial Times, October 25, 2006

David Kreinberg, the former chief financial officer of Comverse, the voicemail software company, on Tuesday became the first top executive to plead guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud in connection with options backdating.

The guilty plea, part of a deal struck with federal prosecutors, came as the US Securities and Exchange Commission announced that Mr Kreinberg had agreed to pay almost $2.4m to settle civil fraud charges.

Mr Kreinberg, who has been free on $1m bail since he surrendered to the Federal Bureau of Investigations in August, was one of three former Comverse executives to be charged over backdating.

Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, Comverse's founder and chief executive, was arrested in Namibia earlier this month after being branded a fugitive from justice by US authorities. Mr Alexander, who has denied wrongdoing, is fighting extradition to the US, where he could face more than 20 years in jail if convicted.

William Sorin, Comverse's former general counsel, is also facing charges. His lawyers could not be reached for comment on Tuesday.

Mr Kreinberg entered his guilty plea in a federal courtroom in Brooklyn. He told a judge that he "knew at the time that my actions and agreements with others at the company to act as I have were wrong."

Options-granting practices at more than 150 companies have come under scrutiny in one of Silicon Valley's biggest scandals since the dotcom collapse, according to Glass Lewis, an institutional shareholder service.

The FBI and securities regulators are examining whether managers intentionally misled shareholders by manipulating the grant dates of stock options in order to inflate their value.

Mr Alexander is alleged to have led a complex scheme to manipulate the grant dates of stock options at Comverse. Among other offences, Mr Alexander is alleged to have created a secret options slush fund by awarding options to fake employees. Mr Alexander has said he plans to fight the charges if brought to trial.

Mr Kreinberg's guilty plea marked the first concrete legal fallout from the options backdating scandal. Two former top officials from Brocade Communications Systems, a networking equipment maker, have pleaded not guilty to backdating charges.

DOJ_NMG_0085844

The SEC said Mr Kreinberg, without admitting or denying wrongdoing, had agreed to pay $2.4m and to accept a permanent ban on serving as a company director or officer.

Although backdating is not in itself illegal, experts say executives who changed the grant dates of stock options without disclosing the practice to shareholders may have fallen foul of securities laws.

Accounting problems arising from the practice have led dozens of companies to announce they will be forced to restate past earnings, some to the tune of billions of dollars.

Forty-five executives and directors have stepped down as a result of backdating, according to Glass Lewis.

Comverse's Former Finance Chief Pleads Guilty (WSJ)

By Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

NEW YORK -- The former chief financial officer of Comverse Technology Inc. pleaded guilty to securities-fraud charges stemming from a stock-options backdating scheme, making him the first executive to admit criminal wrongdoing in a wide-ranging probe involving more than 100 companies.

David Kreinberg, 41 years old, is cooperating with the government and is fingering the company's former chief executive, Kobi Alexander, as the mastermind of the backdating scheme at the New York voice-mail software maker.

Mr. Kreinberg has told prosecutors that Mr. Alexander offered him a "name your price" bribe if he would take sole blame for the fraud, according to people familiar with the situation. The alleged bribe started with offers of $2 million and then $5 million, according to prior court documents from prosecutors.

At a hearing yesterday in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, Mr. Kreinberg admitted to helping Mr. Alexander select particularly favorable dates on which to grant options, using hindsight. "I was asked by the CEO to bring him a printout of the company's trading prices over a past year period to enable him to select the 'as of' date that would be used for the exercise price of the option grant," he said in court.

The scheme understated Comverse's compensation expenses, thus inflating net income on financial statements that Mr. Kreinberg signed and submitted to the Securities and Exchange Commission, he said in court. He added that he knew his actions were "wrong."

Mr. Kreinberg's cooperation strengthens the government's case against Mr. Alexander, who fled the country and was later arrested in the African country of Namibia. Mr. Alexander is free on bail in Namibia. The U.S. government is seeking his extradition to face a 35-count indictment that includes charges of securities fraud, money laundering and bribery.

Robert Morvillo, a defense attorney representing Mr. Alexander, said his client denies that any bribe offer to Mr. Kreinberg took place. He added that Mr. Alexander plans to contest the charges "if and when he comes back."

Mr. Kreinberg faces up to 10 years in prison for securities fraud and a maximum of five years in prison for conspiracy. Prosecutors are seeking an estimated $51 million in restitution. A sentencing date wasn't set. Mr. Kreinberg reached an agreement with the SEC yesterday to give back $2.4 million, according to his attorney, Guy Pertillo.

Mr. Kreinberg's guilty plea comes as prosecutors and regulators continue to investigate the backdating matter. More than 35 executives or directors have lost their jobs.

In addition to Messrs. Kreinberg and Alexander, Comverse's former general counsel William F. Sorin was charged in August with conspiracy to commit mail fraud, securities fraud and wire fraud. He is in plea discussions with the government, according to court papers.

Comverse Ex-CFO Names Jacob Alexander In Guilty Plea (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Patricia Hurtado

Bloomberg, October 25, 2006

Oct. 24 (Bloomberg) -- Comverse Technology Inc. ex-Chief Financial Officer David Kreinberg implicated his former boss as he pleaded guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud in the U.S. probe of illegal manipulation of employee stock option grants.

DOJ_NMG_0085845

Kreinberg, 41, is the first executive to plead guilty in the biggest probe of corporate wrongdoing since late trading of mutual funds three years ago led to $4.3 billion in penalties. Almost 150 U.S. companies have disclosed internal or government inquiries into the backdating of options.

Former Comverse Chief Executive Officer Jacob ``Kobi'' Alexander directed a scheme to systematically backdate stock option grants, Kreinberg claimed today in Brooklyn federal court. Contrary to Comverse's securities filings, Kreinberg told U.S. District Judge Nicholas Garaufis ``the company was in fact issuing backdated options with an exercise price lower than the fair market value on the grant date.''

Alexander was arrested in Namibia last month and is the subject of a U.S. extradition request. Kreinberg, who faces a possible 15-year prison sentence, agreed to cooperate with the government in its prosecution of Alexander, and in related civil lawsuits as part of a separate $2.4 million settlement with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission.

The U.S. Justice Department is trying to persuade the government of Namibia to return Alexander to the U.S. to face charges related to stock-option backdating, including conspiracy, securities fraud, making false filings to regulators and money laundering.

Namibian Court

Alexander, 54, was freed by a Namibian court Oct. 3 on N$10 million ($1.32 million) bail following his Sept. 27 arrest in the African nation's capital of Windhoek. Assistant U.S. Attorney Linda Lacewell said in an affidavit read in Namibian court that Alexander was negotiating his surrender to U.S. authorities when he fled, eventually traveling to Namibia.

Kreinberg's lawyer, Guy Petrillo, declined to comment following today's plea hearing. Alexander lawyer Robert Morvillo, who was in the same court attempting to get access to more than $40 million of his client's assets frozen by the U.S., said the plea is ``going to have an impact -- the question is whether it's going to have a positive or negative impact.'' He declined to comment further. The judge didn't rule on his request.

At least 149 companies have disclosed investigations into their options grants, and more than 65 have said they found or expect to find additional costs tied to the awards. So far, the revisions and charges exceed $3.6 billion. More than 40 executives and directors have retired, resigned or were reassigned or fired after options probes, and about 265 lawsuits have been filed against more than 70 companies.

Low Prices

Kreinberg was originally charged on Aug. 8 with one count of conspiracy, along with Alexander and William Sorin, 56, former general counsel of New York-based Comverse, the world's largest maker of voice-mail software.

Prosecutors claim the three men backdated stock option grants so employees could buy shares at low prices and make the maximum profit, prosecutors said. Stock options typically give an employee the right to buy a specified number of company shares at the market price on the option grant date.

On Oct. 12, federal prosecutors in Brooklyn filed a new indictment against Alexander, including charges of attempted bribery and securities fraud. Alexander was accused of obstructing a federal investigation by offering ``millions of dollars'' to buy a witness's silence. That witness wasn't named in the indictment.

Extradition Papers

Alexander offered the unnamed witness $2 million, then $5 million in March, according to prosecutors. The former CEO told the witness he would leave the country instead of going to jail, prosecutors said. In her affidavit, Lacewell said Alexander told the unnamed witness there was no reason both of them ``should go down.'' Lacewell said the individual is cooperating with authorities.

Following the new indictment, U.S. officials submitted documents arguing for Alexander's extradition. Namibian authorities said yesterday they are studying the papers.

Kreinberg may help the extradition effort, said Scott Christie, a former U.S. prosecutor. Some countries, including Namibia, require testimony from someone with first-hand knowledge of the alleged crime as a requirement before granting extradition.

Concealing

``To have the cooperation of someone on the inside who can provide the most relevant and critical facts to assist in convincing the authorities of the country holding the defendant is a measurable advantage to the government,'' Christie said.

During today's hearing, Kreinberg said that, in 1999, Alexander directed the creation of a ``secret options holding account'' that would provide an ``available pool of options with which principally to address employee retention and recruitment challenges,'' Kreinberg said.

Kreinberg assisted Alexander by concealing the account from Comverse's compensation committee and from Deloitte & Touche, the company's accounting firm, he said. Some options held in the account were submitted for committee approval ``under fictitious names.'' Paul Baker, a spokesman for Comverse, wasn't immediately available for comment.

Kreinberg, who had to be prompted by the judge to state his former boss's name, admitted that he approved Alexander's omission of options information in reports to the committee.

$1 Million

Kreinberg said Alexander backdated options by ``selecting a date, with hindsight, to issue the options and notifying either the general counsel or the CEO's assistant, sometimes through me, to prepare paperwork for the compensation committee to approve the grant `as of' the earlier date.'' He didn't name the assistant.

Alexander sometimes asked him to bring ``a printout of the company's trading prices over a past period to enable him to select the `as of' date that would be used,'' Kreinberg said.

Prosecutors in Brooklyn have said they identified almost $1 million in profit that Kreinberg made from allegedly backdated options. The government claimed Sorin earned ``more than $1 million'' from the scheme while Alexander made almost $6.4 million due to backdating.

Kreinberg and Sorin both originally pleaded not guilty and were freed on $1 million bail. Prosecutors have twice asked a magistrate for a delay in the prosecution of the two men to allow for plea negotiations. Sorin's lawyer, James Brochin, wasn't immediately available for comment.

Not Guilty

Lacewell said that, as part of his plea agreement, Kreinberg faces up to 15 years in prison for both counts, fines of up to $1.25 million and restitution of $51 million.

Alexander was the second CEO to be charged in the options backdating scandal. The first was ex-Brocade Communications Systems Inc. CEO Gregory Reyes, 44. In July, federal prosecutors in San Francisco charged Reyes with securities fraud along with Stephanie Jensen, a former Brocade human resources vice president.

Reyes and Jensen, who were indicted by a federal grand jury in San Francisco on Aug. 10, have pleaded not guilty to the charges and are awaiting trial.

Kreinberg is a certified public accountant and former senior manager at Deloitte & Touche. He has an accounting degree from Yeshiva University and a master's degree in finance and international business from Columbia University.

$2.4 Million

Separately, Kreinberg today agreed to pay $2.4 million to settle a civil lawsuit by the U.S. Securities Exchange Commission, the agency said. The SEC also permanently barred him from acting as a director at a U.S. company.

Kreinberg, who neither admitted nor denied wrongdoing in that settlement, will cooperate in other lawsuits filed by the regulator, the SEC said. The settlement is subject to court approval. The SEC claimed in its complaint that the three former Comverse executives fraudulently granted themselves and others backdated options from 1991 through 2001.

Comverse shares fell 16 cents to $21.61 at 3:29 p.m. in Nasdaq composite trading.

The criminal case against Kreinberg and Sorin is U.S. v. Alexander, 1:06-mj-00817, U.S. District Court, Eastern District of New York (Brooklyn). The case against Alexander is U.S. v. Alexander, 06-CR-00628, U.S. District Court, Eastern District of New York (Brooklyn).

Former Comverse CFO Pleads Guilty To Backdating Scheme (LAW)

By Beth Bar And Tom Perrotta, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 25, 2006

David Kreinberg, the former CFO of Comverse Technology, pleaded guilty Tuesday to helping engineer a scheme to illegally backdate millions of dollars in stock options.

"I knew at the time that my actions and agreements with others at the company to act as I have were wrong," said Kreinberg at a court hearing Tuesday before Eastern District of New York Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis.

Kreinberg, who has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors in the Eastern District U.S. Attorney's Office, is the first person in the country to plead guilty to illegally backdating stock options. He pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud, mail fraud and wire fraud, and one count of securities fraud. He faces up to 15 years in prison and $1.2 million in fines when he is sentenced Feb. 23. He also could be ordered to pay tens of millions in restitution.

Kreinberg's plea clears the way for him to testify against former CEO Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, who fled the country before charges against him were filed in August. Alexander, a fugitive who was discovered in Namibia last month, has been indicted in connection with charges that include using fictitious names to generate hundreds of thousands of backdated options, which he and others then parked into a secret slush fund.

William F. Sorin, the company's former general counsel, also has been engaged in plea negotiations. Prosecutors have until Nov. 9 to indict Sorin on criminal charges.

Kreinberg has separately settled civil charges against him. As part of an agreement with the SEC, he is permanently suspended from practicing as an accountant and must pay $2.4 million in disgorgement and prejudgment interest.

Former Top Comverse Official Pleads Guilty To Securities Fraud (AFP)

AFP, October 25, 2006

NEW YORK (AFP) - The former chief financial officer of software maker Comverse Technology Inc (CMVT - news) . pleaded guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud for using back-dated stock options, the US Justice Department announced. David Kreinberg pleaded guilty to a two-count felony information charging one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud, mail fraud and wire fraud, and one count of securities fraud, US Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf of the Eastern District said in a joint statement with a local FBI official. The charges "stem from the stock options backdating and slush fund schemes" at the New York-based company from 1998 to 2006, the statement read. The conspiracy charge carries a sentence of up to five years prison and a 250,000 dollar fine, while the securities fraud charge carries a maximum sentence of 10 years prison and a fine of up to one million dollars. "The charges also require restitution in an amount to be determined by the court at sentencing, currently estimated at 51 million," the statement read. The government said that Kreinberg, former chief executive officer Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, and ex-general counsel William Sorin backdated the options to days when Comverse stock was trading at a low price, and below the market price on the date when the options were actually granted, thereby maximizing their gains. The investigation was led by the Justice Department's Corporate Fraud Task Force, but it was triggered in early March when a Wall Street Journal reporter became suspicious about Comverse's stock option practices.

End Of Enron's Saga Brings Era To A Close (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 24 -- The sentencing Monday of former Enron Corp. chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling ended the saga of the scandal-ridden Houston energy company and effectively closed the book on an era of high-profile corporate malfeasance.

Skilling's sentence capped a string of lengthy prison terms handed down to top executives for economic crimes, including WorldCom Inc. founder Bernard J. Ebbers, now serving 25 years, and Adelphia Communications Corp. founder John J. Rigas, facing 15 years pending appeal.

But Enron remains that period's signature scandal. The company's December 2001 breakdown ushered in a wave of corporate collapses that roiled investor confidence and prompted the government to enlist a special band of prosecutors and FBI agents to mount the most complex business fraud investigation in history. Their pursuit of top Enron officials helped change the way corporate wrongdoing is prosecuted and spurred companies to more aggressively police themselves.

Hours after a judge sentenced Skilling to more than 24 years in prison, the leaders of the Enron Task Force announced that they would close up shop, saying their mission was mostly complete. But even as officials packed their files and prepared for other jobs in government and the private sector, there were fresh signals about the direction post-Enron corporate crime enforcement would take.

DOJ_NMG_0085848

A new wave of investigations is targeting executive greed, insider trading and investment pools known as hedge funds. On Tuesday, the former finance chief of Comverse Technology Inc. pleaded guilty to covering up a scheme to trigger big paydays for employees by changing the grant dates on stock options. Meanwhile, federal prosecutors charged the former finance chief of Refco Inc. for his role in a $1 billion accounting scandal that hurled the commodities brokerage into bankruptcy proceedings.

"There is an awful lot to do in the world of corporate fraud," said Chip Burrus, assistant director in the FBI's criminal investigation division.

Policing corporate malfeasance after Enron, it seems, won't be slow -- only different. The task-force model, criticized by defense lawyers for its single-minded pursuit of Enron's top officials, is unlikely to be repeated anytime soon. But the governance changes wrought by the company's collapse mean that more chief executives are losing their jobs because of allegations of wrongdoing and that more businesses are paying for costly internal investigations to ferret out fraud on their own.

Over its life span, the Enron Task Force secured guilty pleas from more than 15 executives, including the leaders of three top Enron business units, its finance chief and its chief accounting officer. Their testimony helped win convictions in May against Skilling and company founder Kenneth L. Lay, who died weeks later, of leading an accounting fraud that cost investors and employees billions of dollars.

However, the group's record in trials against lower-level executives has been mixed, legal analysts said.

Last week, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit rejected a task-force request to re-hear its appeal in a case against former Merrill Lynch & Co. officials convicted of engaging in a sham deal to help Enron meet earnings targets in late 1999. A three-judge panel last summer threw out the conspiracy charges against the Merrill bankers, ruling that they did not deprive the investment bank of their honest services. The government still has the option of asking the Supreme Court to consider the case. The Justice Department's fraud section will pick up any remaining cases from now on, officials said.

Separately, the prosecution of executives in Enron's highly touted Internet broadband unit produced mixed results. A jury acquitted one defendant, former accountant Michael Krautz, and failed to come to a unanimous decision against several others.

Washington defense lawyer Barry Pollack, who won an acquittal in a jury trial for Krautz this year, criticized the task force for using aggressive legal theories and said the group has "precious few convictions after trial to show for its efforts."

"The task force will likely be remembered only for its success in obtaining convictions of Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling, but its overall record in other cases of not-guilty verdicts and reversals by appeals courts is equally part of its legacy," Pollack said.

Task-force leaders also declined to retry defunct accounting firm Arthur Andersen LLP in its obstruction-of-justice case after the Supreme Court, in a serious setback, unanimously tossed its conviction in 2005. The firm's conviction four years ago nonetheless sounded alarms across the corporate landscape and spurred accountants to become more skeptical of their clients, leading to more rigorous audits and a greater number of restated financial results.

Enron became "the leading symbol of corporate scandal," in the words of U.S. Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty, but the shuttering of the task force will by no means mark the end of regulators' pursuit of business crime, government officials said.

The FBI's Burrus added that while Enron amounted to "an amazing criminal phenomenon," the bureau still has more than 400 open investigations in such areas as stock options backdating, political corruption and related offenses.

Already, federal prosecutors have filed criminal charges against former executives at Comverse and Brocade Communications Systems Inc. for allegedly failing to disclose schemes that triggered bigger payouts for certain employees awarded stock options, which allow workers to buy stock at a set price and a specific time.

At least 30 executives this year have lost their jobs over options scandals, as board members now appear far more willing to fire top executives for questions about the propriety of their behavior, in part because corporate accountability legislation passed after the big-name frauds clarified directors' responsibility to investors.

But some legacies of the recent scandals may be more short-lived. In early 2002, President Bush created a government-wide panel to combat business fraud, a move that spurred federal prosecutors across the country to pour resources into such investigations. But after Richard M. Scrushy, the founder of HealthSouth Corp., was acquitted by an Alabama jury in 2004 and a criminal case against former Kmart Corp. executives in Michigan was dismissed, the difficulties of bringing and winning such cases became more clear.

As a result, there may be a natural devolution as complex fraud cases congregate once again in such hot spots as New York, San Francisco, Los Angeles and Chicago, said Leslie R. Caldwell, a former federal prosecutor and the first leader of the Enron Task Force.

Moreover, business groups already are pushing back on the regulatory crackdown, attacking accounting strictures in the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley federal law as too expensive and pushing lawmakers and securities regulators to weaken the rules. Two independent committees, including one led by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, are studying ways to change the law. Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. has made statements criticizing the rules, as well.

Timothy J. Coleman, a former prosecutor and Justice Department official, predicted that the legions of investigators hired by securities regulators, federal prosecutors and the FBI will pay lasting dividends because they will become a "standing army" ready to target business wrongdoing.

"Whether it's stock options, mutual funds or something else, corporate America should expect a continuing series of major, nationwide investigations for the foreseeable future," said Coleman, now a defense lawyer in Washington.

NEC Probed Over Delay In Filing Results (FT)

By Michiyo Nakamoto In Tokyo

Financial Times, October 25, 2006

NEC, the Japanese electronics group, said on Tuesday it was being investigated by the US Securities and Exchange Commission in connection with its delay in filing results for the last financial year.

NEC said it had received “a letter of informal inquiry from the SEC requesting voluntary production of certain documents” following the delay to its annual results.

The Japanese group gave no further information but said it intended “to co-operate fully with the SEC in connection with this inquiry”.

NEC earlier this month received notice from Nasdaq that it could face de-listing as a result of its failure to provide its annual report for last year. The filing was due not later than October 2 this year.

The Japanese group said it intended to maintain its Nasdaq listing but could not say when it might be able to provide last year’s results under US GAAP.

“We are working on the analysis in order to obtain an auditor’s report and maintain our Nasdaq listing,” NEC said. “At the earliest it will take until the end of November.”

According to its filing with the SEC last month, NEC’s US auditors failed to recognise revenue from certain maintenance and support services.

NEC said it had been unable “to gather the data necessary to complete the audit with respect to the vendor-specific objective evidence of the relative fair value of maintenance and support services”.

It warned further that it was unable to determine whether any adjustments to previously announced financial results would be required as a result of the review.

The group also said that its delayed results filing would reveal that its “disclosure controls and procedures are ineffective”. The filing would also show that NEC “does not have an adequate system of internal control” to ensure that material errors do not occur in the preparation of US GAAP consolidated financial statements.

It said it had identified a number of irregularities during the past two years, including “improper accounting practices for revenue recognition related to two US subsidiaries, fictitious sales transactions occurring for more than three years at a Japanese subsidiary, and several irregularities at certain other business units”.

NEC said it would change its accounting principles for consolidated financial statements for the first half in Japan from US GAAP to Japanese GAAP in order to be able to report its first-half results in Japan.

Going In-House? It Might Be A Wise Move (LAW)

By Janice K. Mandel, Legal Times

Legal Times, October 25, 2006

Corporate scandals and an increased emphasis on ethics have raised the profile of top legal officers

Earlier this year, Judge J. Michael Luttig of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals stunned the legal world by surrendering his lifetime appointment to the bench in favor of the top legal job at Boeing Co. In his letter of resignation, Luttig called the job a "singular opportunity," one that he could not pass up. Luttig's move did not come as a surprise, however, to the in-house bar, which has noted that the career door that used to swing between government and law firms now revolves with a corporate stop as well for many top lawyers.

The demand for top legal talent in in-house departments has been growing as increased regulation and an increasing emphasis on corporate accountability have put greater emphasis on the attorney's role in helping to foster an ethical corporate culture.

In the current environment it is not enough for companies to be ethical and compliant; they have to be seen as such. As a result, companies are evaluating candidates for top in-house positions on the strength of their reputation for scrupulous ethics, judgment and objective decision-making beyond narrowly defined legal issues. In addition, law firms are seeing the benefits of seeking out new partners from in-house ranks because of the perspective on client service (and potential clients) that these lawyers can bring.

The increased demand has brought with it a rise in the stock of in-house counsel. Top lawyers are increasingly interested in exploring in-house careers because of their greater visibility and significance, combined with more competitive compensation. They also know that today, going in-house does not necessarily preclude them from returning to top jobs in private practice or public service. For instance, Deval Patrick, who was general counsel of the Coca-Cola Co. from 1999 to 2004, is now the Democratic candidate for Massachusetts governor.

THE PLAYERS

In the past 18 months, the legal profession has noted the career moves of several other prominent lawyers from noteworthy private-practice and public service positions to in-house positions at some of the nation's most prominent corporations, including the following:

• Larry D. Thompson, former deputy attorney general of the United States, became senior vice president, government affairs and general counsel and secretary at PepsiCo Inc. in early 2005.

• David G. Leitch, former deputy counsel to the president, became general counsel and senior vice president of Ford Motor Co. in April 2005.

• James B. Comey, also former deputy attorney general, was appointed senior vice president and general counsel for Bethesda, Md.-based Lockheed Martin Corp. in August 2005.

• Beth Wilkinson was appointed in February as the new executive vice president, general counsel and corporate secretary for Fannie Mae after serving as a partner in Latham & Watkins' Washington, D.C., office and as a Justice Department prosecutor.

"Although many major companies had in-house lawyers and legal functions of high stature for years, we've certainly seen the prominence of the legal function increase in a lot of companies post-Sarbanes, post-Enron," notes James Wilber, a principal with Altman Weil, a management-consulting firm.

At the same time that corporations are demanding more of their in-house lawyers in terms of managing the company's compliance, regulators and others are also expecting more. For example, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act required, for the first time, that the Securities and Exchange Commission establish formal standards of professional conduct for attorneys representing public companies. And the behavior of in-house lawyers faces scrutiny similar to that placed on other business executives. For example, in the recent scandal involving Hewlett-Packard's use of private investigators to determine the source of boardroom leaks to the press, former general counsel Ann Baskins was called before a congressional subcommittee, and Kevin Hunsaker, former HP chief ethics director and senior legal counsel, was charged with fraud and conspiracy in California earlier this month.

"Typically, lawyers have always had an enhanced concern and recognition of their responsibilities to be vigilant," says Martha Ann Sisson, a former in-house counsel at Mobil Oil Corp. and co-founder of Garrison & Sisson, an attorney-search firm that fills many in-house positions. "There is now external pressure -- board pressure and shareholder pressure and regulator pressure -- in order for that to be accomplished. It's always been a duty, but now it's a business imperative; it's a legal requirement."

MAKING 50 DECISIONS A DAY

From the attorney's point of view, in-house work offers significant attractions and challenges.

When Beth Wilkinson was hired, for example, Fannie Mae was fighting its way back from a major accounting scandal and criticism of what some characterized as an arrogant corporate culture. The offer to join Fannie Mae "kind of landed in my lap," Wilkinson says. "I wasn't sure I would like in-house work because I love trial work and making decisions." Wilkinson was one of the lead Justice Department prosecutors in the case against Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh. "Ironically, when I got here, I found I make 50 decisions every day. That, I love."

It falls to in-house lawyers to be proactive in helping corporate clients understand what needs to be done to ensure that the company is aware of its obligations and the pitfalls it should avoid.

"On a day-to-day basis, often it falls upon the law department to help steer the company through those tricky waters encountered when running any major business," says Walfrido "Wally" Martinez. He just returned to Hunton & Williams as worldwide managing partner of the firm after serving as senior vice president and general counsel of Diageo North America, a producer of alcoholic beverages.

Martinez's move from Diageo to Hunton points out another notable change in the perceptions of the in-house career path. Now, more than before, attorneys have the chance to move between private practice and in-house practice, with law firms increasingly interested in hiring in-house counsel. Lawyers who return to law firms say their in-house experience has given them valuable insight into what their clients need from them. It is that insight that makes them particularly attractive to law firms.

Marc Martin, a partner in Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Nicholson Graham's D.C. office, has been able to tap into his experience as founding chief legal officer of three communications companies. "An in-house lawyer has a lot to juggle," he says. "In addition to being at the top of your game substantively, you have to gain and maintain the trust of your internal clients -- who are not obligated to let you in the inner circle merely because you are on the payroll -- and manage both the internal legal team and outside counsel.

"My stint as a general counsel was an invaluable opportunity to view the world from the client's perspective and from the in-house lawyer's perspective," says Martin. This insight, he believes, makes him more effective in collaborating with in-house clients.

Steven Fabrizio agrees. He started out at top-tier firms in New York and Washington before he moved on to start and head the litigation department for the Recording Industry Association of America. There, he gained industry expertise and contacts that he then parlayed into a successful entertainment and new-media practice at Jenner & Block. Fabrizio emphasizes the value the in-house experience brings to his work as outside counsel.

"When I was in-house litigation counsel purchasing legal services, it became clear to me that even the best and most skilled outside counsel fell into two categories: those that internalized the pressures I faced and the interests of my constituents, and those that did not or could not," says Fabrizio. "I only wanted to work with the former. As simple as it sounds, that experience has made me a better private-practice lawyer."

ON THE MONEY

The increased significance of the role of in-house counsel is accompanied by an upward trend in compensation. According to the newly released 2006 Law Department Survey by the management-consulting firm Hildebrandt International, the chief legal officers from the 164 companies nationwide that participated in the survey had a median total cash compensation (salary and bonus) of more than $700,000, with bonuses making up about half of the total.

In the Washington region, chief legal officers at the largest public companies have a median total cash compensation of $1 million or more, according to data gathered from the companies' SEC filings. On top of that, most receive stock awards and stock options that can boost their total direct compensation by several million dollars. General counsel at midsize public companies may have total cash compensation of at least a half-million dollars, as well as significant stock awards and options.

Hildebrandt's data also show median total compensation for chief legal officers increasing by 8.9 percent from 2004 to 2005 and by 6.4 percent from 2005 to 2006.

More than ever before, companies are putting greater emphasis on merit bonuses, consistent with the pay-for-performance corporate model. Lauren Chung, a consultant and law-department-survey editor with Hildebrandt, expects that bonus and noncash incentives will continue to make up a greater portion of total compensation, particularly at the more senior levels of the law department. "While base salaries will rise steadily, the significant earning potential lies with bonuses and noncash or long-term incentives," she says. "Participation in long-term incentives will only increase as many more companies seek methods to retain talent and pay for performance."

No one maintains statistics on the number of in-house counsel, so it is unclear whether the raw number, or the number of companies with in-house counsel, is increasing. Martindale-Hubbell lists some 5,100 in-house lawyers and more than 1,400 organizations with in-house staff in Maryland, Virginia and the District. The Washington Metropolitan Area Corporate Counsel Association, the professional association for in-house counsel in that area, has tripled its membership in the past eight years, from 500 to almost 1,500. At the same time, WMACCA has seen an increased demand for services to meet the needs of both former law firm experts now practicing in-house for large legal departments and the general counsel of small companies.

"The current corporate environment requires sophisticated counsel who possess deep organizational knowledge. Expectations regarding corporate culture have changed, and so have the expectations for in-house counsel," says Eric Reicin, president of WMACCA and vice president and associate general counsel at Sallie Mae Inc. "More than ever before, in-house counsel need to act as business partners who bring to the table the legal perspective on potential risks."

In the post-Sarbanes-Oxley world, increased emphasis on compliance and corporate accountability has opened doors for lawyers to move among law firms, the government and business. And the professional challenges associated with meeting those requirements help ensure that corporate America will have a high-quality pool of attorneys to draw on for in-house leadership.

Steven Fabrizio notes that in-house counsel work "puts every skill you have as a lawyer to the test every day. You get to -- in fact, you have to -- see individual legal issues as part of a broader constellation of organizational issues in ways that outside lawyers just don't. For people who like to challenge themselves, that is an attractive environment in which to practice law."

Study Finds Options Scandal Has Cost Companies Billions (MERCN)

By Therese Poletti

The San Jose Mercury News, October 25, 2006

A financial advisory firm has released an analysis estimating the stock-option backdating scandal has cost at least 152 companies nationwide about $10.3 billion.

A recent tally by institutional shareholder advisory firm, Glass Lewis in San Francisco, found that at least 152 companies have announced internal reviews, inquiries from the Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department subpoenas related to their stock options granting practices.

Glass-Lewis said its internal analysis also showed that the backdating scandal has resulted in an unadjusted initial decline of $5.1 billion in the companies' market value, based on the initial drop in their stock prices. The analysis also pegged an additional $5.2 billion in additional pre-tax compensation costs to the companies.

The firm said that at least 44 executives and directors at 24 companies have been fired or resigned to date. Of the 152 companies nationwide, 42 have headquarters in Silicon Valley.

The analysis was included as an appendix in Glass-Lewis weekly ``Trend Alert" advisory, dated Monday. The report said the information was current as of Oct. 19.

Many of the companies face federal investigations or internal reviews to determine whether they manipulated stock options by backdating, to give recipients a head start toward profits. Backdating can also lead to overstated company profits by failing to follow the proper accounting and tax rules.

In another development Tuesday, Electronics For Imaging, a developer of technology for high-speed printers and copiers, became the latest Silicon Valley company to announce an investigation into its stock options granting practices.

The Foster City company, also known as EFI, said Tuesday it has begun an independent review of its stock options granting practices, based on errors that management discovered in a recent review of historical grants.

DOJ_NMG_0085853

EFI said it has voluntarily contacted the staff of the Securities and Exchange Commission to inform them of the ongoing review. The company disclosed the internal review when it released third quarter earnings Tuesday that were slightly below Wall Street's expectations.

The company also said two shareholder lawsuits, known as derivative lawsuits brought by investors on behalf of the corporation, were filed against EFI in Superior Court in San Mateo. The suits, filed Aug. 16 and Sept. 11, allege current and past officers and directors breached their duty to EFI by backdating certain grants of EFI's stock.

In a conference call with analysts Tuesday, EFI executives declined to comment when asked whether the two lawsuits preceded the company's review of its options granting practices, or visa versa.

In trading after the regular stock market closed, EFI's shares plunged 10.5 percent, falling $2.42 to $20.60. The company also announced a disappointing fourth quarter forecast. Both the third quarter miss and the disappointing forecast were due to some delays of printer products developed by its customers, executives said. EFI develops technology for professional super-wide format printers and copiers.

Throwing Back The Big Fish (NYT)

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

Among the worst impressions the Securities and Exchange Commission could foster is that it pulls punches on delicate matters involving the rich, powerful and politically connected. Now two Senate committees are investigating whether the commission staff, rather than doggedly pursuing possible insider trading by the hedge fund Pequot Capital Management, held back when it came to taking the testimony of a prominent Wall Street player.

A commission investigator, Gary Aguirre, sought permission from higher-ups to question John Mack, who had briefly worked at Pequot, about his dealings with Pequot's founder, Arthur Samberg. As Walt Bogdanich and Gretchen Morgenson reported in The Times on Sunday, the tone of the inquiry shifted drastically once it came to light that Mr. Mack was being considered for the job of chief executive at Morgan Stanley.

A supervisor then wrote about Mr. Mack's "juice" and "political clout" in internal e-mail messages. Mr. Aguirre was not permitted to interview Mr. Mack and ultimately was fired — immediately after receiving a merit-based pay raise.

The Senate Finance and Judiciary Committees are pursuing the question of how the Pequot investigation proceeded and why Mr. Aguirre was fired. So far, there is hardly enough information available to jump to conclusions about the conduct of Mr. Mack or Mr. Samberg. The commission has informed both men that it is not seeking enforcement actions against them. What is more important to the public is not the specifics of the case as much as how easily the commission staff can be influenced, whether by reputation, connections or future job prospects.

Senator Charles Grassley, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said in a statement that additional questions had arisen because of conflicting statements and documents that had come to light over the course of the Senate panel's inquiry. "My initial concerns haven't been put to rest by what I've learned so far," Mr. Grassley said. Neither have ours. A full airing is in everyone's interest.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Hastert Wants Fast Action On Foley (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning And Richard Clough

Chicago Tribune, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- House Speaker Dennis Hastert testified Tuesday before an ethics subcommittee investigating conflicting accounts of his handling of complaints about a Republican congressman's suggestive messages to underage male congressional pages.

The scandal over former Florida Rep. Mark Foley's sexually explicit electronic communications with teenage pages and House leaders' handling of reports of inappropriate conduct have threatened political support for the speaker and reverberated through the mid-term election campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0085854

The testimony from Hastert and two of his top aides—one testified on Monday and the other began his testimony immediately after Hastert—indicated the panel may be wrapping up its investigation. But it is unclear whether the Ethics Committee will issue its report before the Nov. 7 elections.

Speaking briefly to reporters from a prepared statement after his testimony, Hastert said he told the panel "that they needed to move quickly to get to the bottom of this issue, including who knew about the sexually explicit messages and when they knew about it."

Hastert, who testified behind closed doors for just under three hours, added that he answered investigators' questions "to the best of my ability."

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said the speaker would not answer any questions about his testimony.

Republican officials said confidence in Hastert, an Illinois Republican, has ebbed as the controversy over Foley has continued. Foley resigned last month. Though the party establishment concluded weeks ago that an ouster of Hastert prior to the election would be counterproductive, Republican officials privately indicated it would be difficult for Hastert to hold on to his leadership post afterward, even if the party retains the majority.

At least one key Hastert aide recently explored potential new employment, according to a source familiar with the discussion.

The contradictions between the public accounts offered by Hastert and his staff, and those given by other congressional officials—who have spoken publicly about warnings that Foley was behaving inappropriately toward pages—is a major focus of the committee's probe.

Hastert has said he only learned of Foley's suggestive communications as they became public on Sept. 29.

But the House Republicans' national campaign chief, Rep. Tom Reynolds of New York, who testified before the ethics committee earlier in the day, has said he warned Hastert of inappropriate conduct by Foley last spring.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) also has said he informed Hastert last spring but that the speaker assured him the matter had been "handled."

Hastert has said he does not recall either conversation.

His staff has put out a timeline of events indicating his office received a complaint during fall 2005 about e-mails Foley sent to a former Louisiana page asking the boy for a photo and what he would like for his birthday. But the office's timeline indicates that the matter was handled by Deputy Chief of Staff Mike Stokke and Counsel Ted van der Mied without informing Hastert or Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer.

The aides said they referred the matter to then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl, a Republican patronage appointee, who together with House Page Board Chairman John Shimkus (R-Ill.) met privately with Foley to ask him to cease contact with pages.

Another inconsistency to be resolved by investigators involves a claim by former Foley chief of staff Kirk Fordham that he warned Palmer of Foley's inappropriate behavior several years ago, indicating Hastert's office had an earlier warning.

In a written statement, Palmer denied the claim, saying, "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen." But he has otherwise kept publicly silent.

Another congressman has indicated he provided a warning even earlier. Retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), who was chairman of the page board at the time, said he received a complaint of a suggestive e-mail from Foley to a former page during either 2000 or 2001. He said he referred the matter to Trandahl, the House Clerk.

Palmer testified more than six hours Monday. Stokke began testifying immediately after Hastert and refused to comment after emerging five hours later.

Hastert Urges Quick Action On Foley (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, October 25, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert urged ethics investigators to work quickly to unravel the congressional pages scandal Tuesday, testifying before them just after a GOP lawmaker whose recollections differ from his.

DOJ_NMG_0085855

The investigation is focusing on which House leaders were told about sexually explicit messages sent by Rep. Mark Foley to former pages, when leaders were told and what was done in response. Hastert and some other Republicans have suggested revelations about the messages were timed to hurt the GOP in next month's elections.

Tuesday's appearances by Hastert, R-Ill., and House GOP campaign chair Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., could signal that the four-member ethics committee is nearing the end of its testimony-taking phase. Both men testified behind closed doors as committee rules require.

Hastert said afterward that he had told the committee "that they needed to move quickly to get to the bottom of this issue, including who knew about the sexually explicit messages and when they knew about it."

Hastert has said he first learned of Foley's inappropriate e-mails to a former Louisiana page — and sexually explicit e-mails to another page — just last month as the matter became public and the Florida Republican resigned.

But Hastert's appearance followed that of Reynolds, who has said he learned of Foley's inappropriate e-mails to the Louisiana teen last spring and discussed the matter with Hastert.

Hastert has said he didn't recall that conversation. He has also assured conservative activist Paul Weyrich that Majority Leader John Boehner was wrong when Boehner said he and Hastert discussed Foley's problems last spring.

Hastert said he answered investigators' questions "to the best of my ability."

The Foley scandal continues to weigh on GOP poll numbers just two weeks before midterm elections that could cost the Republicans control of Congress. The ethics committee's top Democrat, Howard Berman of California, would not say in a brief exchange whether the panel would release any findings before Election Day.

What has emerged to date is a pattern in which incidents involving Foley's inappropriate behavior with former pages have been handled by a few staff aides and lawmakers, rather than being referred to the ethics committee or the full membership of the bipartisan board overseeing the page program.

The ethics panel has heard from most of the key witnesses except Foley himself. Since he resigned in disgrace, the ethics committee no longer has jurisdiction. The FBI has opened an inquiry but it's not evident that Foley broke any laws.

One of Foley's attorneys, William Taylor of Washington, declined to comment on whether Foley had been asked to appear before the panel.

There is a separate question as to when Hastert's top aides first learned about Foley's behavior toward pages. An account issued by the speaker's office describes how "over friendly" e-mails to the Louisiana page were handled last fall. Other alleged incidents have since surfaced.

For instance, Foley's former chief of staff Kirk Fordham has testified that at least three years ago he asked top GOP aides, including Hastert's chief of staff Scott Palmer, to intervene to stop Foley's inappropriate behavior. Palmer testified for more than six hours Monday; his only public comment thus far is, "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen."

Fordham has testified about an episode several years ago in which Foley is said to have been drunk and trying to enter the page dorm.

Former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl and Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., learned in 2001 or 2002 of an episode in which Foley sent an ex-page inappropriate e-mails.

The four-member investigative team is also expected to hear this week from Hastert aide Ted Van Der Meid, who was the chief contact between the speaker's office and Trandahl about House operations, including the page program.

A question for the panel to determine is whether Van Der Meid and Palmer knew of the Foley problem prior to the single incident handled by Hastert's office last fall — and if so, how other incidents were handled.

Hastert, Reynolds Testify About GOP's Handling Of Foley Case (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) spent nearly three hours behind closed doors with the House ethics committee yesterday, describing what he knew about then-Rep. Mark Foley's relationships with young male pages and when he knew it.

DOJ_NMG_0085856

The extraordinary appearance came just a few hours after the House Republican campaign chief, Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), went before the committee to reiterate his contention that he personally told Hastert in the spring about suspicious e-mails that Foley had sent to a Louisiana teenager. Hastert has said he has no recollection of that conversation and did not learn of the Foley matter until it surfaced in late September.

"Since I had requested prompt action by the committee, I took the opportunity to thank them for moving expeditiously to look into this matter," Hastert said as he emerged from the committee's Capitol basement hearing room. "I answered every question they asked fully and to the best of my ability."

The twinning of Hastert's appearance with that of Reynolds surprised House Republican and Democratic leadership aides, and it only heightened the drama of the committee's deliberations.

Hastert is the first House speaker to testify before the committee since Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) discussed a much-criticized book deal in 1997. But in that case, committee members scheduled Gingrich's testimony at night, sparing him a daylight walk through the throng of reporters and camera crews camped outside the hearing room.

Also unlike Gingrich, Hastert had to appear immediately after the chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, Reynolds, who had already challenged Hastert's version of events.

"I was happy to voluntarily do my part to assist in their inquiry and answer any questions they had," Reynolds said yesterday. "Earlier this month I had several opportunities to answer your questions and tell you what I know, but the committee has asked us not to share the substance of our discussion.

"I would only add that a full and fair investigation of the facts is vital to ensuring the continued integrity of this institution, which is why I strongly encourage any of my colleagues who have information that may be of relevance to bring it to the committee's attention at once."

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) testified last week that he also told Hastert in the spring about concerns stemming from what House leaders have termed "over-friendly" e-mails from Foley to the former page from Louisiana.

Yesterday's drama was the strongest indication yet that the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, as the ethics committee is formally known, may be nearing the end of its investigative work. The committee interviewed Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, on Monday and could call up his deputy chief of staff, Mike Stokke, and his counsel, Ted Van Der Meid, this week.

But neither Democratic nor Republican leadership aides believe that a final report will be released ahead of the Nov. 7 elections, which have been roiled by the Foley matter.

The inquiry has been focused on the handling of Foley by House leaders. As far back as 2000, Foley's advances on former pages over the Internet had come to the attention of one congressman, Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.). Kolbe had brought the matter to then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl, who reported to the speaker's office.

According to sources close to Trandahl, the former clerk repeatedly brought concerns about Foley to the congressman's chief of staff, Kirk Fordham. Fordham told the committee that when he was unable to stop Foley's advances, he asked Palmer to intervene in 2002 or 2003. Palmer has said Fordham's version of events did not happen.

Aides in the speaker's office have said that the matter did not come to their attention until the fall of 2005 and that it was handled without Hastert's involvement.

Hastert tried to deflect attention from GOP leaders yesterday, suggesting, as other Republicans have, that Democrats may have known about Foley's explicit instant messages but did not report them to authorities. Instead, Republicans have said, Democrats shopped them to the news media before the elections.

Hastert said he encouraged the committee "to continue to move forward to get to the bottom of this, including finding out who was aware and when they were aware of the sexually explicit instant messages that were created three years ago."

Two former pages who were the sources of the instant messages have told The Washington Post that they did not come forward until after ABC News published the suspicious but not the sexual e-mails. A Republican former page said he wanted to expose Foley's more outrageous actions and had no intention of sparking a wider scandal. A Democratic former page, who supplied the messages to The Post, did so several days after ABC News obtained its messages.

Speaker Testifies In Foley Ethics Inquiry (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24 — Speaker J. Dennis Hastert testified before the House ethics committee on Tuesday, answering questions under oath for more than two hours about when he first learned of complaints regarding Representative Mark Foley's behavior toward Congressional pages.

On this day, two weeks before Election Day, Mr. Hastert had planned to be hopscotching from district to district across America, working to preserve Republican control in the House and protect his own seat of power. Instead, he made his way from the speaker's suite to a dim corridor in the basement of the Capitol where the committee was meeting behind closed doors.

With his speakership on the line, even if the Republicans hold their majority, Mr. Hastert hoped to move beyond the scandal by voluntarily appearing before the bipartisan panel, which is working to determine if Republican leaders and their staff members ignored repeated warnings that Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, was making advances toward the high school students who work as messengers on Capitol Hill.

"I answered all the questions they asked to the best of my ability," Mr. Hastert said after exiting the hearing room. "I also said that they needed to move quickly to get to the bottom of this issue, including who knew about the sexually explicit messages and when they knew about it."

Mr. Hastert has said that he was unaware of suspicions surrounding Mr. Foley until he resigned his seat late last month after an e-mail exchange with a former page became public. Other Republican leaders, though, say they discussed the matter with him last spring.

Mr. Hastert, illuminated by camera flashes and flanked by his lawyer, declined to answer questions as he returned to his office in the Capitol. While he praised the bipartisan panel "for expeditiously looking into this matter," he urged investigators to look into whether anyone in the House — Democrats included — had known about Mr. Foley's explicit online chats with former pages.

"They need to make sure that they ask all the questions of everybody," Mr. Hastert said.

His testimony followed a three-hour appearance by Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, Republican of New York, who leads the party's Congressional campaign committee. Mr. Reynolds, whose own re-election prospects are suddenly less certain, has taken out television advertisements to distance himself from the leadership in this controversy.

Mr. Reynolds has said that he informed Mr. Hastert this year of concerns regarding Mr. Foley. The speaker has said that he cannot recall any such conversations.

As he left the hearing room, Mr. Reynolds called for a "full and fair investigation of the facts." He, too, raised the notion that the inquiry should not be focused only on Republicans, calling on "any of my colleagues who have information that may be of relevance to bring it to the committee's attention at once."

Mr. Reynolds shared a particular link with Mr. Foley: each employed Kirk Fordham as his chief of staff. Mr. Fordham stepped down this month as a senior adviser to Mr. Reynolds after saying that he warned the speaker's office about Mr. Foley's troubling behavior at least three years ago, when he worked for Mr. Foley.

As the ethics inquiry stretched into a third week, one theory was that investigators were trying to determine whether Republican leaders had not acted on concerns about Mr. Foley in part to avoid contending with an open seat in his Florida district.

But the investigation revolves around the speaker's office, which oversees the page program.

In addition to Mr. Hastert, the panel is focusing on three advisers: Scott Palmer, the speaker's chief of staff, who testified Monday; Mike Stokke, the deputy chief of staff, who was questioned Tuesday night; and the chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid, who is to testify Wednesday.

Mr. Hastert said this month that members of his staff should be fired "if there was a cover-up." Yet he has also said he has no reason to believe they acted improperly after learning of a friendly, but not sexually explicit, exchange between Mr. Foley and a former page from Louisiana.

DOJ_NMG_0085858

Early Tuesday evening, Mr. Hastert walked out of the Capitol for one of the last times before Election Day. The longest-serving Republican speaker in United States history, he vows to extend his streak. He said that he was leaving Washington.

His destination? The campaign trail out West.

Hastert, Reynolds Testify To Ethics Panel (HILL)

By Amy Sherman

The Hill, October 25, 2006

Two senior House leadership officials testified yesterday to the ethics committee about what they know about the Mark Foley page scandal.

Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), the National Republican Campaign Committee chairman, and House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), took time out from their busy campaign schedule to meet with the ethics panel during separate appearances.

Hastert sneaked into the ethics committee, avoiding public areas of the Capitol in an apparent move to avoid reporters. As he exited his offices, he utilized the seldom-used Strom Thurmond hallway, and an esoteric attic elevator transported him to the basement.

U.S. Capitol Police officers blocked the staircase between the crypt and the basement. Hastert's entourage, which included all three members of his communications staff, three Capitol police officers and his attorney, escorted him to the ethics committee hearing room.

Hastert attempted to dodge photographers by repeatedly moving behind his staff. The Speaker testified to the ethics committee for two-and-a-half hours.

He then delivered a brief statement: "I thank the committee for promptly acting ... I answered all questions asked to the best of my ability... [I hope they] move quickly to get to the bottom of who knew about the sexually explicit messages and when they knew about it."

Reynolds testified for three hours and then read a short statement to the media: " … I was happy to voluntarily do my part to assist in the inquiry and to answer any questions they had. Earlier this month, I had several opportunities to answer your questions and tell you what I know. But the committee has asked us not to share the substance of our discussions."

Lawmaker's Influence In Land Deals Probed (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

U.S. prosecutors in Arizona have opened a preliminary investigation into whether Rep. Rick Renzi (R-Ariz.) twice pressured landowners to buy a 480-acre parcel owned by his former business partner, a major backer of Renzi's political campaign, according to federal law enforcement sources.

The deal ultimately netted the business partner a $3 million profit, according to Arizona land records.

Renzi is the latest lawmaker whose land deals have come under scrutiny. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) have drawn criticism from political opponents for deals with home-state business partners that netted earned them hundreds of thousands of dollars or more.

The Arizona transaction has drawn the interest of the U.S. attorney's office and the FBI's Phoenix field office. Three law enforcement officials said both are investigating Renzi's involvement in two land deals -- one of which was not completed -- designed to put the 480 acres under federal protection from development in exchange for land more fit for commercial development.

One of the officials said the inquiry is at a preliminary stage. No subpoenas have been issued, and public developments are not likely before the Nov. 7 midterm elections, said the official, who along with the other two spoke on the condition of anonymity because the investigation has not been publicly announced.

A spokesman for U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton in Phoenix declined to confirm or deny the existence of an inquiry. Spokesmen for the Justice Department and the FBI in Washington also declined to comment.

The inquiry was revealed by two liberal Arizona blogs last weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0085859

Grant Woods, a former Arizona attorney general who is Renzi's lawyer on the matter, said neither he nor Renzi has been contacted by law enforcement officials. He ascribed any inquiry to political gamesmanship by the two-term lawmaker's Democratic opponent, lawyer Ellen Simon.

"When I was attorney general, we dealt with this all the time in the last 30 days before an election, when candidates came to us with an accusation. We had to look at it, but it was designed to use politically," Woods said.

According to sources, the investigation is focusing on whether, in exchange for political contributions and business support, James Sandlin received special treatment from Renzi for a parcel of land that earned him a $3 million profit .

Sandlin bought into Renzi's real estate firm in 2001, then paid about $200,000 for half the business and, after he was elected to Congress, $1 million to $5 million for the rest.

Investigators want to know whether Renzi twice attempted to arrange deals for Sandlin, including once by proposing legislation, two sources with knowledge of the investigations said.

According to land developer Guy Inzalaco, Renzi was approached last year by an investment group that included Inzalaco and former Arizona governor Bruce Babbitt, a Democrat. The group sought legislation that would put environmentally sensitive watershed land under federal protection in exchange for opening other federal land to development.

Renzi said he would back the legislation if the Sandlin tract was included, Inzalaco said.

Woods said Renzi was trying to include a tract of land that environmentalists had been trying to preserve for years and did not know until later that his business partner owned it.

That fall, Renzi announced he would introduce the San Pedro River Land Exchange Act, a bill that would include the Sandlin property. Within days, Sandlin sold the tract to the Inzalaco-Babbitt group, turning a $3 million profit in three years. The land-swap legislation was never enacted.

Inzalaco said yesterday that he knew nothing of Sandlin's connections to Renzi.

Congressman From Arizona Is The Focus Of An Inquiry (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24 — Federal authorities in Arizona have opened an inquiry into whether Representative Rick Renzi introduced legislation that benefited a military contractor that employs his father, law enforcement officials said Tuesday.

The officials said the inquiry was at an early stage and that no search warrants had been issued, suggesting that investigators had yet to determine whether there was a basis to open a formal investigation or empanel a grand jury.

Mr. Renzi, 48, a Republican who represents the First Congressional District, is a former insurance executive and real estate investor who was first elected in 2002. Almost from the start, he has been a target of citizen watchdog groups who have accused him of ethical laxity in office.

Law enforcement officials said that the most serious accusation involved Mr. Renzi's sponsorship of legislation in 2003 that appeared to indirectly benefit the ManTech International Corporation, a communications company based in Virginia that employs Mr. Renzi's father, Eugene, a retired Army general, as executive vice president.

Representative Renzi's office did not return a reporter's telephone calls on Tuesday to discuss the inquiry. In the past, Mr. Renzi has dismissed questions about whether his efforts aided ManTech, saying it did not need any assistance from him.

Mr. Renzi's legislation, which was signed into law in November 2003, exempted the Fort Huachuca Army base in Arizona from maintaining water levels in the nearby San Pedro River, as base officials had agreed in a 2002 deal with the United States Fish and Wildlife Service. Environmentalists criticized Mr. Renzi's measure, saying it threatened water levels in one of the last undammed rivers in the West and would benefit private contractors like ManTech that operated at the base and relied on its continued operation.

ManTech has more than $450 million in military contracts at the base, which include classified military work, as well as options for more than $1.1 billion in additional contracts, according to news reports about Mr. Renzi's legislation. Employees of the company were the largest contributors to Mr. Renzi's campaign in 2002 and the second-largest in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0085860

Groups like Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington have raised additional questions about Mr. Renzi, like his employment of a top staff member in December 2005 who continued to operate a fund-raising consulting business while she worked for Mr. Renzi. House ethics rules limit outside earned income to less than $25,000 a year.

Experts: Ban Won't Stop Online Gambling (AP)

By Adam Goldman, AP Business Writer

AP, October 25, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- Gamblers may look over their shoulder now, but experts say a new Internet gambling ban won't keep bettors from ponying up, just turn them on to overseas payment services out of the law's reach.

"It has put a terrible scare into people," said I. Nelson Rose, who teaches gambling law at Whittier Law School. "But it won't by any means wipe out Internet gambling."

The fright swept through the $12 billion industry on the heels of the recent arrests of two gambling company executives and a new law President Bush signed Oct. 13 that seeks to ban most online gambling and criminalizes funds transfers.

The law has wiped out billions of dollars in shareholder value of British companies, leaving the industry's future in doubt as U.S. lawmakers initially trumpeted they had found a way to halt bets coming from America. But serious questions remain about whether the legislation can be effective in stopping U.S. residents from playing poker or betting on sports.

The "Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act" goes after the money, not the millions of players, which would be nearly impossible to enforce. It will essentially try to choke off the way Americans fund their gambling habits, hoping to prevent the transfer of dollars to the popular Internet sites.

It's also widely understood that the law has online poker in its gun sights, identifying it as a game of chance - something the poker companies dispute. They believe poker is a game of skill and therefore not subject to the new rules.

But they're fearful nonetheless.

"Their mission is to kill the funding of online poker, and that's what this law does," said Mike Sexton, who hosts the popular World Poker Tour and has won millions as a professional player.

Buy AP Photo Reprints

The new law comes amid an explosion in online gambling, fueled by the Texas Hold 'em craze and widespread access to the Internet. In addition, dozens of Web sites have sprouted up that allow any gambler with a credit card to bet on any sport they choose, for any amount of money they want.

Industry experts say there are an estimated 2,000 Internet sites that take bets for sports and poker. American players have fueled Internet gambling, supplying $6 billion of the $12 billion in revenues generated annually.

"The time has been one of rapid growth," said Sebastian Sinclair, president of Christiansen Capital Advisors, a gambling consultant. "This industry was well on its way to becoming mainstream in a great part of the world. Capital was tripping over itself to fund these companies."

The new law gives the U.S. Treasury and Federal Reserve, along with the Attorney General, 270 days to establish policies and procedures.

"The regulations are clearly going to prevent banks from doing electronic fund transfers to gambling sites, but that is no big deal," Rose said.

Clamping down on the banks won't serve as a panacea, Rose said. In some cases, banks simply move the money to payment processors, known as e-wallets. Non-U.S. payment processors such as the widely used Neteller then transfer the money to the Internet gambling sites.

The U.S. government has no authority over processors like Neteller that are operating legally.

Anthony Cabot, a well-known gambling lawyer in Las Vegas, thinks language used in the bill provides a loophole for the payment processors and the U.S. banks that want to be free to do business with them.

"Unless you have some fairly Draconian measures ... the likelihood of stopping payment to them is small," Cabot said.

Much damage has already been done to the offshore sports betting industry without the looming regulations.

DOJ_NMG_0085861

British BetOnSports PLC folded after its chief executive was arrested in July by U.S. authorities. David Carruthers faces 22 counts of fraud and racketeering charges and remains under house arrest in the St. Louis area.

London-based Sportingbet's chairman was detained last month in New York on a state fugitive warrant charging him with illegal online gambling. He was eventually freed.

Both arrests sounded serious alarm bells for those running sports wagering sites that take American bets.

The new legislation has already had a dramatic effect. It supposedly clarifies the 1961 Wire Act, explicitly outlawing Internet gambling, including online poker.

It creates new criminal penalties, which have rattled investors and executives - although Rose said it doesn't expand the act, and there's no indication the Justice Department is about to launch a huge campaign to enforce the law.

Still, the biggest publicly traded names in Internet gambling on the London Stock Exchange and AIM, the exchange's global market for growing companies, could not afford to flout American law. When news broke earlier this month that Congress has passed the bill, Internet gambling companies traded on those exchanges lost a combined $7 billion in market capitalization.

PartyGaming PLC, once the envy of online gambling with its more than $8 billion IPO in 2005, is now trying to figure out how to save its business model. It runs what was once the world's biggest poker site, PartyPoker, and has said it will no longer take payments from the U.S., eliminating nearly 80 percent of its revenue and sending its stock plunging.

Another poker company, 888 Holdings PLC, also said it would stop taking U.S. bets, ensuring its profits will fall dramatically.

Sportingbet and Leisure & Gaming both sold their U.S. operations for a dollar. Sportingbet said its exit from the U.S. market cost it nearly $400 million.

The bleeding didn't stop there. Neteller and FireOne, which owns e-wallet FirePay, also saw their stock price plummet. On Oct. 2, FirePay announced it had stopped doing business with sites that might take U.S. bets, including PokerStars. The decision forced PokerStars, now the biggest poker site in the world and a registered business in Costa Rica, to rely on Neteller to take money for bets headed to its site.

"There are privately owned operators that will continue to take play as long as they have payment processors that will work with them," said Sue Schneider, publisher of the online gaming magazine Interactive Gaming News. "I think the big question is whether the volume remains the same. But I don't think any of this means there will be less people playing on the Internet."

Neteller has said it is evaluating the law. If Neteller abandons PokerStars and other sites, their bottom lines, no doubt, will be hit hard.

But so far, Neteller's decision to work with PokerStars has amounted to good news for sites not afraid of scorning U.S. law.

Experts say while the new law has forced the public companies out of U.S. market, it has left poker players and bettors gravitating toward private companies.

Both PokerStars and FullTilt have already seen traffic on their Web sites surge, taking advantage of any short-term gain now that some of the competition has been sidelined. On its Web site recently, FullTilt boasted: "We're Here to Stay!" and offered bonuses to sign up.

This isn't the first time the industry has faced a serious setback. In 2001, Visa and MasterCard and other merchant banks stopped allowing money to be sent to Internet gambling sites.

Like then, Sinclair thinks Internet gambling will recover again. It's simply too lucrative.

"There will be a big hit to the industry," Sinclair said. "A big hit. But it's not going to be long term, it's transitory until somebody finds a solution to whatever roadblocks are put in their way. There's too much money for it to go away."

Ex-Refco CFO Accused Of Defrauding Investors Of $1 Billion (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, The Associated Press

AP, October 25, 2006

The former chief financial officer of Refco Inc., one of the world's biggest commodities brokerages, was accused in an indictment Tuesday of defrauding investors in a scheme that resulted in losses of more than $1 billion.

An indictment in U.S. District Court in New York charged Robert C. Trosten with conspiracy, securities fraud, false filings and wire fraud. It also added new charges to the case against Refco's former chief executive officer, Phillip R. Bennett.

DOJ_NMG_0085862

Prosecutors said Trosten assisted Bennett in hiding hundreds of millions of dollars of debt owed to Refco by a company controlled by Bennett.

The superseding indictment also added new charges against Bennett concerning fraud against holders of Refco's bonds.

Trosten, 37, of Sarasota, Fla., was scheduled to make his initial court appearance Wednesday. Bennett, 57, of Gladstone, N.J., is free on $50 million bail and subject to electronic monitoring.

A lawyer for Bennett, Gary P. Naftalis, said: "Mr. Bennett reaffirms that he is not guilty of any of the government's charges and looks forward to his day in court."

A lawyer for Trosten did not immediately return a telephone message seeking comment Tuesday.

If convicted, Trosten could face up to 45 years in prison while Bennett could face up to 85 years in prison.

Bennett was already charged with conspiring to commit securities fraud for hiding from auditors and investors losses that Refco and its customers had incurred in the financial markets.

The indictment charged Trosten and Bennett with conspiring to defraud Refco's auditors and investors from the mid-1990s to October 2005, when Refco announced it had discovered it was owed $430 million by a company controlled by Bennett.

The announcement caused the price of Refco stock to plunge. The company, which went public in August 2005, was later delisted by the New York Stock Exchange, and it and many of its subsidiaries filed for bankruptcy a week after the announcement.

According to the indictment, Refco sustained hundreds of millions of dollars in losses through its own and its customers' trading in the mid-1990s, when Refco was privately held and controlled in part by Bennett.

To hide the losses, Bennett transferred them to appear as a debt owed to Refco by a company controlled by Bennett, prosecutors said.

The indictment accused Bennett and Trosten of manipulating the company's financial records from 1999 through 2005 to make it appear as if the debt owed to Refco was owed by a Refco customer.

The indictment charged Trosten with assisting Bennett in carrying out the year-end transactions, including defrauding the purchasers of $600 million in notes issued by Refco in 2004 by hiding from the purchasers the existence and size of the debt owed to Refco.

It also charges Bennett with defrauding the purchasers of $583 million of Refco's common stock when the company went public.

The indictment alleged that Bennett caused Trosten to receive a payment of about $48 million in August 2004, when the leveraged buyout transaction was being handled.

Drug Raid Yields Los Alamos Documents (SFC/AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, October 25, 2006

(10-25) 03:06 PDT WASHINGTON (AP) --

A drug bust at a trailer park in New Mexico turned up what appeared to be classified documents taken from the Los Alamos nuclear weapons laboratory, authorities said Tuesday.

Local police found the documents while arresting a man suspected of domestic violence and dealing methamphetamine from his mobile home, said Sgt. Chuck Ney of the Los Alamos, N.M., Municipal Police Department. The documents were discovered during a search of the man's records for evidence of his drug business, Ney said.

Police alerted the FBI to the secret documents, which agents traced back to a woman linked to the drug dealer, officials said. The woman is a contract employee at Los Alamos National Laboratory, according to an FBI official who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the case.

The official would not describe the documents except to say that they appeared to contain classified material and were stored on a computer file.

FBI special agent Bill Elwell in Albuquerque, N.M., confirmed that a search warrant was executed on Friday night, but he refused to discuss details.

DOJ_NMG_0085863

"We do have an investigation with regard to the matter, but our standard is we do not discuss pending investigations," Elwell said.

A spokesman for the Los Alamos National Laboratory, in Los Alamos, N.M., declined to comment.

Los Alamos has a history of high-profile security problems in the past decade, with the most notable the case of nuclear scientist Wen Ho Lee. After years of accusations, Lee pleaded guilty in a plea bargain to one count of mishandling nuclear secrets at the lab.

In 2004, the lab was essentially shut down after an inventory showed that two computer disks containing nuclear secrets were missing. A year later the lab concluded that it was just a mistake and the disks never existed.

But the incident highlighted sloppy inventory control and security failures at the nuclear weapons lab. And the Energy Department began moving toward a five-year program to create a so-called diskless environment at Los Alamos to prevent any classified material being carried outside the lab.

Even though Los Alamos is now under new management, Danielle Brian, executive director of the watchdog group Project on Government Oversight, said the lab has not done much to clean up its act.

"Los Alamos has always seemed to be rewarded for its screw-ups," Brian said. "We're waiting with bated breath to see if anything has changed."

The idea that police found classified documents at a home where a drug sting was being conducted is disturbing, she said.

"The problem is when you actually have those materials that are supposed to be protected inside the lab and you find them outside the lab in the hands of criminals — that should worry everybody," Brian said.

The FBI and the U.S. attorney's office in Albuquerque were "evaluating the information obtained as a result of the search warrant," Elwell said.

The federal charge of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material is a misdemeanor that carries a maximum sentence of a year in prison and up to a $100,000 fine.

Safavian Argues For No Jail Time In Abramoff Case (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - A Utah congressman and a former aide to a Virginia congressman have written letters in support of former Bush administration official David Safavian, who is trying to avoid jail time in the Jack Abramoff investigation.

Safavian, former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, was convicted in June of lying to investigators about his dealings with Abramoff.

Prosecutors are seeking a three-year prison sentence in Safavian's case, which was the first guilty verdict by a jury in the corruption probe surrounding Abramoff, the Republican lobbyist who pleaded guilty in January in a conspiracy to corrupt public officials.

In seeking a sentence of probation or house arrest, Safavian's attorneys submitted letters from supporters including a church leader, a former congressional aide and Safavian's former boss, Rep. Chris Cannon, R-Utah.

"When David was my chief of staff, he worked tirelessly in my Washington office. He would come in early, stay late, and devote his undivided attention to the needs of the people in Utah's 3rd Congressional District," Cannon wrote.

The letters are sealed but Safavian's attorney referred to excerpts of some in a court filing Monday.

The list of letter-writers also included Melissa Wojciak, former staff director for Rep. Tom Davis, R-11th, at the Government Reform Committee. Wojciak wrote that Safavian "always ensured that he was responsible in managing the taxpayer's dollars."

Safavian is scheduled to be sentenced Friday. Prosecutors argue that letting him off without prison time would be a "miscarriage of justice."

DOJ_NMG_0085864

E-mails presented at trial showed how Abramoff showered Safavian with trips and other perks while badgering him for information about GSA-controlled property the lobbyist wanted - including the historic Old Post Office in downtown Washington.

Defense attorneys wrote that Safavian did not harm anybody and committed no fraudulent acts. They have presented a list of past cases they believe are comparable.

That list includes: Henry Cisneros, the Clinton administration housing secretary who paid a $10,000 fine for lying to the FBI about payments to an ex-mistress; former Rep. Chris Perkins, D-Ky., who was sentenced to three months in a halfway house in 2000 for lying to a probation officer about his income; and businesswoman Martha Stewart, who received five months in prison for lying to investigators about a stock sale.

Cannon Writes Judge On Behalf Of Convicted Former Chief Of Staff (SLT)

By Robert Gehrke, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Rep. Chris Cannon is asking a judge for leniency for his former chief of staff, David Safavian, who was convicted with obstructing a federal investigation into his ties with lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

"When David was my chief of staff, he worked tirelessly in my Washington office. He would come in early, stay late, and devote his undivided attention to the needs of the people in Utah's Third Congressional District," Cannon wrote in a letter quoted by Safavian's attorneys in court filings.

Prosecutors have asked Judge Paul Friedman to sentence Safavian to as many as 37 months in prison. He was convicted of four

Read Cannon's letter regarding Safavian counts of obstruction of justice and false statements for lying to investigators about his relationship with Abramoff.

Safavian's attorney, Barbara Van Gelder, argued that Safavian has been a committed public servant and family man, that his career has been ruined by his arrest and conviction, and asked the judge to impose probation or home confinement.

"The government's caricature cannot detract from the fact that, as acquaintances, supervisors, and colleagues attest, Mr. Safavian's history and character reflects dedication to his family, his community, and country," Van Gelder said.

Prosecutors said it would be a "miscarriage of justice" not to impose prison time.

Letters vouching for Safavian's character also were written by Rep. Walter Jones, R-N.C.; Clay Johnson, deputy director at the White House budget office; and a police officer at the Maryland precinct where Safavian did volunteer work.

Safavian was convicted of misleading ethics officials, Senate investigators and the Government Service Administration inspector general about a lavish golf trip he and others took to Scotland with Abramoff and others in 2002, when Safavian was chief of staff at the GSA, which manages federal property.

E-mails used as evidence during the trial show that Abramoff provided numerous gifts and perks to Safavian who provided Abramoff information about two business deals the lobbyist was trying to make through the GSA.

Abramoff has pleaded guilty to five felony counts of fraud and corruption and has been sentenced to nearly 6 years in prison. He has been cooperating in the ongoing Justice Department investigation, but is expected to report to prison in Maryland next month.

Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, who also went on the trip to Scotland, also has pleaded guilty to corruption charges. Also pleading guilty was Neil Volz, Ney's former chief of staff and an Abramoff colleague who was on the trip.

Safavian got his start in lobbying alongside Abramoff before becoming a partner in Janus-Merritt Strategies. He took a leave of absence to become Cannon's chief of staff in 2001, leaving open the door to return to his firm.

During Safavian's tenure with Cannon, the congressman took positions that helped several of Safavian's former clients, including the online gaming industry, telecommunications firms, a media giant and an Indian tribe. Cannon's spokesman has said the two simply agreed on those issues.

E-mails introduced during Safavian's trial indicate that Abramoff was encouraging Safavian to return to lobbying in 2002 and he was in discussions with Abramoff's firm, Greenberg Traurig.

But the firm didn't immediately hire Safavian, and he was offered the position of chief of staff at GSA, hinting he could rejoin Abramoff later. Eventually, Safavian was appointed the top procurement officer at the White House budget office, where he served until just before his arrest late last year.

Suburban Mayor Enters Plea In Bribes Case (CHIT)

Tribune Staff Reports

Chicago Tribune, October 25, 2006

Niles Mayor Nicholas Blase pleaded not guilty Tuesday to a five-count federal indictment charging him with taking more than $420,000 in kickbacks for steering local business owners to buy insurance from a longtime friend and his son.

Blase, Niles' mayor for 45 years, has been free on bail since he was arrested on his 78th birthday in June.

The charges allege that the kickback scheme originated more than 30 years ago with Blase's close friend, Ralph Weiner, who ran an insurance agency bearing his name. After Weiner's death in 2005, his son, Steven Weiner, continued to deliver the monthly bribes to Blase, prosecutors charged.

Blase, an attorney, is accused of using more than $421,000 in bribes to pay the salaries of two employees of his law firm.

Lawyers for Steven Weiner and Paul Zdon, a former employee of the Weiner insurance agency, have said both are cooperating with the FBI and expect to plead guilty to mail-fraud charges. They are scheduled to be arraigned next month.

Niles Mayor Pleads Not Guilty (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, October 25, 2006

CHICAGO - Niles Mayor Nicholas Blase pleaded not guilty Tuesday to a federal indictment accusing him of pocketing more than $420,000 in a decades-long kickback scheme.

Blase is charged with coercing businesses in his northwest suburb to buy insurance from an agency operated by his friend. That friend, in return, would then pay Blase kickbacks, prosecutors allege.

He entered the not guilty plea to five counts of mail fraud before U.S. Magistrate Judge Michael T. Mason, the Chicago Sun-Times and Chicago Tribune reported on their Web sites.

Blase, who also is an attorney, has been mayor of Niles for 45 years. He is accused of using the kickbacks to pay the salaries of two employees of his law firm.

Two other men with ties to the insurance agency also were indicted.

The agency's president, Steven Weiner, and employee Paul Zdon are both cooperating with authorities and are expected to plead guilty, prosecutors and defense attorneys have said. Blase and Weiner's now-deceased father, Ralph, concocted the scheme more than 30 years ago, authorities allege.

Verdicts In Murder Of Times Reporter (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24 — The second of two men accused of killing a retired reporter for The New York Times in January was convicted on Tuesday of murder, robbery and other charges that could put him in prison for the rest of his life.

The defendant, Percey Jordan Jr., 42, was found guilty in the slaying of the reporter, David E. Rosenbaum, 63, who was beaten and robbed near his home in Washington on the night of Jan. 6 and died two days later. An inquiry found that the medical care Mr. Rosenbaum received had been bungled from the beginning.

Mr. Jordan faces at least 30 years in prison and a maximum of life without the possibility of parole when he is sentenced by Judge Erik P. Christian in District of Columbia Superior Court on Jan. 12.

Jurors deliberated for a day before finding Mr. Jordan guilty of first-degree murder or premeditated murder during commission of a felony; second-degree murder; robbery; conspiracy; and credit-card fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0085866

The second defendant was Mr. Jordan's cousin Michael C. Hamlin, 24, who pleaded guilty on Sept. 20 to second-degree murder, robbery and conspiracy to commit robbery and testified against Mr. Jordan. Mr. Hamlin faces up to 60 years in prison when he is sentenced, on Dec. 19.

"This isn't a happy day, really," said the victim's brother, Marcus Rosenbaum of Washington. He described the mood of the Rosenbaum family as one of relief because "justice has been served."

Mr. Hamlin testified that he stole Mr. Rosenbaum's wallet but that his cousin struck the victim over the head with a pipe. The pair divided Mr. Rosenbaum's money and used the credit cards at various stores, where surveillance cameras captured the men's images.

Mr. Rosenbaum was found lying semiconscious on a sidewalk about 9:20 p.m., having gone for a walk after dinner. Because he had been vomiting and smelled of alcohol, police officers, firefighters and ambulance workers assumed that he was drunk, according to a later inquiry by the office of the district inspector general/

The ambulance was late in reaching Mr. Rosenbaum because the driver became lost. Then, thinking that they were dealing with a drunk instead of a man with a brain trauma, the ambulance crew took Mr. Rosenbaum to Howard University Hospital instead of to a much closer hospital. One reason the Howard hospital was chosen was that it was closer to the driver's home, the inquiry found.

At Howard, Mr. Rosenbaum lay unattended to on a stretcher because doctors and nurses were slow to realize that he was gravely injured, the inquiry determined. Mr. Rosenbaum's death was attributed to blunt force trauma to his head, neck and body.

Mr. Hamlin turned himself in after seeing the surveillance-camera images of himself on television. His lawyers said he soon began to cooperate with investigators.

Mayor Anthony A. Williams and Howard University Hospital officials promised to tighten training and discipline at the agencies involved.

D.C. Man Guilty In Reporter's Slaying (WP)

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

The man accused of killing a 63-year-old journalist in a robbery this year in Northwest Washington was convicted yesterday of first-degree murder and now faces the prospect of a life sentence without the possibility of release.

Percey Jordan, a 42-year-old from Southeast Washington, had decided to take his case to trial even after his cousin, Michael Hamlin, pleaded guilty last month and admitted his role in the Jan. 6 robbery.

It was a gamble for Jordan, who knew his cousin would be testifying against him and who rejected a final plea offer from the government on the eve of his trial in D.C. Superior Court. Now Hamlin, 24, is more likely to walk out of prison one day, having pleaded guilty to second-degree murder, which has no mandatory minimum sentence.

After three days of testimony, the jury began reviewing the case Monday. Jurors deliberated about six hours before finding Jordan guilty in the death of David E. Rosenbaum, a longtime reporter and editor for the New York Times.

Struck in the head with a heavy plastic pipe, Rosenbaum suffered massive hemorrhaging and died two days later.

As the foreman read the verdict, Rosenbaum's daughter, Dorothy, wept, and her brother Dan put his arm over her shoulder.

"We obviously believe that justice has been served," Rosenbaum's brother Marcus said outside the courthouse. But he said the verdict was anything but a happy moment. "It's a lot of wasted life," he said -- his brother's, Hamlin's and Jordan's.

The crime stunned many city residents, particularly those who live in neighborhoods thought to be safe, such as the one where Rosenbaum was robbed and where such random and violent crime is rare. But the surprise and sadness gave way to outrage, as grievous mistakes were uncovered in Rosenbaum's emergency medical care.

During testimony last week, his family listened as prosecutors described Rosenbaum's final minutes "of meaningful life" -- the walk he took to try to shake the hiccups, the fleeting sensation that something was wrong and then the sudden attack shortly after 9 p.m. in the 3800 block of Gramercy Street NW.

The jurors heard the words of Rosenbaum's widow, Virginia, who not long before her death from cancer testified before a grand jury to recount how her husband went out and never came back.

DOJ_NMG_0085867

Then they heard from Hamlin, who testified for more than three hours, explaining how he and his cousin ended up attacking the man on the dark, quiet street.

And on the final day of testimony, the jury heard from a drinking buddy of Jordan's who said Jordan told him about the robbery. He decided to testify against Jordan in hopes of a reward.

Defense attorney Michael Starr attacked the testimony of both men.

Hamlin, he said, turned himself in because police were on to him. Hamlin needed to help himself, but his initial lies did not fool the detectives, Starr said. Only when Hamlin implicated Jordan and explained that his cousin had struck Rosenbaum with a pipe did the detectives believe him, Starr said. That's why Hamlin stuck with that account, Starr said, calling it a lie.

The drinking buddy was similarly opportunistic, Starr argued.

But one juror said afterward that the jury largely believed Hamlin and was convinced that Jordan played a role in the robbery.

The prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Amanda Haines, introduced a trove of security camera surveillance footage that appeared to corroborate Hamlin's account.

The tapes showed Jordan and Hamlin soon after the robbery at an Exxon station on Connecticut Avenue NW, filling up Hamlin's Cadillac and using a credit card stolen from Rosenbaum. The tapes later showed them shopping in a CVS and a Safeway not far from their home in Southeast Washington, again using credit cards from Rosenbaum and from a woman they robbed in Silver Spring the same night.

The footage led to swift charges. About an hour after a clip showing Hamlin was broadcast on local newscasts -- with Hamlin's name visible on the work uniform he was wearing -- he went to police. He was interrogated and eventually arrested. A day later, Jordan went to police and was arrested.

Such quick detective work usually would have been lauded, but in this case the response by the D.C. Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department, D.C. police and Howard University Hospital was roundly condemned.

At the scene, Rosenbaum was misdiagnosed as an intoxicated man, leading dispatchers to send a basic care ambulance from a distant part of the city rather than an advanced care unit that was much closer. Other lapses followed, detailed in a blistering report issued by the D.C. inspector general's office.

Hamlin is to be sentenced Dec. 19. Voluntary sentencing guidelines suggest a 14- to 35-year sentence. Jordan will be sentenced Jan. 12.

Pieces Of Art Collection Were Someone Else's (NYT)

By Dan Barry

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

If it was the desire of the man who called himself William M. V. Kingsland to be remembered in the salons of New York long after he died, to be the subject of the kind of scandal-whiffed conversation he once so enjoyed, to be the one having the last loud laugh, then the man who called himself William M. V. Kingsland has succeeded.

He died in early spring in his one-bedroom apartment on the Upper East Side, surrounded by the hundreds of portraits, paintings and miniatures he admired mostly in solitude, because he allowed very few past the front door. Since then, though, his self-portrait has been peeling slowly from the canvas.

This summer his longtime friends learned that his real name was not William M. V. Kingsland — with the V for Vanderbilt — but Melvyn Kohn. Then, last week, they learned that several pieces in his private art collection were likewise of clouded provenance.

That is: pilfered; stolen; hot.

The Giacometti bust? Stolen from a Midtown gallery in 1967. The John Singleton Copley portrait of the second Earl of Bessborough? Stolen from Harvard in 1971.

The Odilon Redon? The Kurt Schwitters? The two Fairfield Porters?

Stolen, stolen, stolen and stolen.

DOJ_NMG_0085868

Now the Federal Bureau of Investigation is digging into the nature of his collection, two auction houses are cleaning up the artistic mess he left behind, and the Office of the Public Administrator for Manhattan is trying to sort out the increasingly muddy Estate of William M. V. Kingsland — né Melvyn Kohn.

A central question for everyone, of course, is Mr. Kingsland's role in all this. Was he a thief, a fence, or just an innocent collector of pretty things that happened to be hot?

Mr. Kingsland died without a will, at the age of either 58 or 62. He often intimated that his blood ran blue, which would explain why he was able to lead gossip-laden walking tours of New York architecture and society. But friends could find no family to claim him, blue-blooded or otherwise.

So they arranged for his burial in April at a historic Manhattan cemetery whose soil is considered a privilege to share, perhaps assuming that this would be the last they heard of dear Will, other than in swapped stories about his slightly shabby attire, his frugal ways, his cutting wit — and his many odd jobs, from genealogical researcher to antique store employee to author of auction columns for an art magazine.

The news of his true name spurred the realization that few knew him well enough to have ever been in his small apartment at 245 East 72nd Street, where artwork covered nearly every inch of shelf and wall. In this room, American; in that room, European; everywhere, eclectic.

Because no will was found, the public administrator took control of the estate, which included the unkempt, very dusty apartment filled with artwork. "An Aladdin's cave," Colin Stair, of the Stair Galleries in Hudson, N.Y., recalled. "Chockablock with interesting treasures."

The public administrator chose Christie's to handle the sale of dozens of pieces, including the Giacometti, and the Stair Galleries to handle hundreds of lesser pieces, including many watercolor-on-ivory miniature portraits.

Last month, experts at Christie's discovered problems of provenance with four paintings: two by the 20th-century American painter Fairfield Porter, and one each by the French painter Odilon Redon and the German collagist Kurt Schwitters. All were reported stolen in the mid-1960's, officials say.

The auction house also forwarded a photograph of the Giacometti bust to the Alberto Giacometti Foundation in Switzerland. The good news: the bust was indeed an authentic and valuable Giacometti. The bad news: it was stolen nearly 40 years ago.

Christie's immediately notified an art specialist at the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Then, a couple of weeks ago, Mr. Stair conducted an auction that included hundreds of items from the Kingsland estate. Among the patrons was Alex Acevedo, the owner of the Alexander Gallery on the Upper East Side, who often saw Kingsland at auctions.

Mr. Acevedo spotted a diamond in the rough, a 1790 portrait by John Singleton Copley of the second Earl of Bessborough, and won the bid at $85,000. He said he estimated that he could make a $400,000 profit on this gem, and recalled thinking, "This is a good score."

But the more he checked into the painting's provenance, he said, the more the arrows pointed to Harvard as the owner. He called an F.B.I. agent he knew — the art specialist — and laid out his suspicions. As the conversation wound down, he said, the agent asked, By the way, what was the estate's name?

"I said, 'Kingsland,' " Mr. Acevedo said. "And he goes: 'Uh-oh.' "

The two auction houses have canceled any sales related to the Kingsland estate. The Harvard Crimson newspaper has reported that the university is working with the authorities to secure the safe return of the Copley and another portrait reported stolen from Harvard in 1968. And the public administrator, Ethel J. Griffin, is treading carefully as she sorts out this vexing Kingsland matter.

"We don't want to destroy the man's reputation if in fact he acquired these paintings from someone else," she said. Still, she added, "This is one for the books."

Ms. Griffin's office is also handling the auction of Mr. Kingsland's apartment, which is being offered in "as is" condition. This includes the hundreds of nails hammered into the bare walls, marking where the previous occupant once displayed his precious pieces of art.

FBI Wants Help Finding Stolen Power Line Maintenance Trucks (AP)

AP, October 25, 2006

YUMA, Ariz. -- Thieves in Yuma County stole three specialized power line maintenance trucks and more than $100,000 in tools used to work on major power lines over the weekend, and the FBI is seeking the public's help tracking down the thieves.

The trucks and tools were stolen from the U.S. Department of Energy's Gila Substation Maintenance Facility sometime between 5 p.m. Friday and 3 p.m. Saturday, the FBI said. The tools and equipment are used to maintain the high-voltage power grid and specialized knowledge is needed to use them.

There is no known terror threat from the theft and young people are known to hang out in the area, said FBI Special Agent Deb McCarley. However, the specialized nature of the equipment and its possible use is raising concerns.

"We don't believe there is any threat to our infrastructure," McCarley said. "However, you don't know that until you find out who did this and why."

The FBI and the Yuma County Sheriff's Office are offering a $10,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the persons responsible.

The sheriff's office found one truck burned in the desert near the confluence of the Colorado and Gila Rivers. The other two trucks were a red 2005 Chevrolet 3500 with U.S. government license plate G63-1300B and a gray 2006 Chevrolet 2500 with license plate G63-2847B.

U.S. Launches Probes Into Fraud Cases (MERCN)

By Josh Funk

The San Jose Mercury News, October 25, 2006

OMAHA, Neb. - The government has launched investigations into fraud cases in which computer hackers apparently manipulated client accounts at two of the nation's largest electronic brokerages, stealing millions of dollars.

Officials at TD Ameritrade Holding Corp. said Tuesday that the fraud cost the company about $4 million in the July-September quarter. Last week, E-Trade Financial Corp. said the company lost about $18 million in a similar scheme during its third quarter.

Both companies reimbursed customers for their losses.

Ameritrade's chief operating officer, Randy MacDonald, said the fraud that his company experienced during the quarter was part of an industrywide problem and that the company was working with the FBI and other law enforcement agencies.

Ameritrade officials said the problem largely occurred overseas when clients were using either wireless networks or public computers infected with spyware, and user IDs and passwords were stolen.

"We're spending a lot of time educating our clients about the need to keep their information secure," MacDonald said. "And we're working with software vendors to develop new techniques for preventing this from even happening at their keyboard level."

Officials at Omaha-based Ameritrade and E-Trade, which is headquartered in New York, said that while hackers manipulated individual accounts, their own computer systems remained secure.

E-Trade Chief Executive Mitchell Caplan told analysts during a conference call last week that the fraud his company saw appeared to be concentrated in eastern Europe and Thailand, according to a transcript provided by Thomson Financial's StreetEvents.

"We believe that we've made a significant number of operational changes and technology changes," Caplan said during the call. "We've seen that level of fraud in the last three weeks or so reduced to almost zero as a result of the changes we're making."

Both E-Trade and Ameritrade have insurance that may cover some of their fraud losses. They reimbursed their clients because both companies offer their clients asset protection guarantees.

The Securities and Exchange Commission, like the FBI, is investigating hacking fraud throughout the online brokerage industry.

SEC spokesman John Heine in Washington declined comment Tuesday on the Ameritrade and E-Trade cases.

DOJ_NMG_0085870

Officials of the SEC and other law enforcement agencies, along with representatives of online brokerage firms, were meeting Wednesday to discuss the issue, said John Reed Stark, head of the SEC's Office of Internet Enforcement.

"We've seen an increase in the number of intrusions," Stark said. "These innovative frauds often involve an intricate web of participants that are not only committing securities fraud but are also committing identity theft and hacking as well."

Ameritrade's chief executive, Joe Moglia, said he thinks this latest rash of fraud and identity theft is under control, but it's a problem the industry and society will always have to contend with.

"From the beginning of time, there's always been someone trying to take advantage of someone else," Moglia said.

Financial Firms Join Data-Security Program (WSJ)

By Robert A. Guth

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

A group of U.S. banks and insurance companies concerned about data security are expanding a program for assessing the security of online banking and related financial services.

The Financial Services Roundtable, an industry trade group, said that five banks have joined an effort to standardize how they judge the security of companies that provide online services. The new participants are Bear Stearns Cos., Goldman Sachs Group Inc., Regions Financial Corp., Wachovia Corp. and Morgan Stanley.

The program, called the Shared Assessment Program, is part of a broader effort by large businesses to pressure software and online services companies to improve security of their products.

The program sets common guidelines that suppliers will need to follow before a participating bank or insurance company will do business with the supplier, which include telecommunications companies and data-service hosting companies.

Some of the guidelines include how often data is backed up and details on other protections, including physical security at companies' data centers.

The effort formalizes procedures that have historically been handled differently by each financial institution, an approach that the members say is costly and isn't as effective in assuring a high level of security. The program was started in February by the Bank of America Corp., Bank of New York Co., Citigroup Inc., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., U.S. Bancorp, and Wells Fargo & Co.

Service providers participating in the program include Equifax Inc., Yodlee Inc., First Data Corp., Iron Mountain Inc., SunGard Data Systems Inc., Verisign Inc.

The financial institutions' effort is part of a broader power shift between large businesses and their IT suppliers. A rash of viruses, worms and other Internet-borne attacks in recent years raised awareness among consumers and businesses to risk of online commerce. Large buyers of IT gear -- software, computers and online services are now emboldened to lean on companies like Microsoft Corp. to bolster security.

"We're seeing vendors ready to turn over information that will help us validate whether our customers are secure," said Mike Casper, a vice president at Wachovia, which has been testing the program since April.

Florida Man Pleads Guilty To Web Scam (OREG)

By Bryan Denson

The Oregonian, October 25, 2006

A Florida man pleaded guilty Tuesday to heading a Corvallis-based Internet investment scam that victimized 1,500 investors in the United States and Canada.

Frank Hendricks, 46, pleaded guilty in a federal court in Eugene to wire fraud, conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud, and failing to file a U.S. income tax form for the year 2003, the U.S. attorney's office reported.

When sentenced in February, he faces as long as 26 years in prison and as much as $1.3 million in fines, plus mandatory restitution.

According to court papers, Hendricks and another man, identified as Scott Guenther, created a CD-ROM and electronic book-marketing business named Pacific Achievements International. Guenther is scheduled to plead guilty to some of the charges Dec. 5 in Eugene, authorities say.

DOJ_NMG_0085871

A government indictment accuses the two men of raising $13 million in 16 months by assuring potential investors that investments of $5,859 would return $9,720 within one to three weeks, with earnings of more than $1 million a month thereafter.

Hendricks and others promoting Pacific Achievements International used new investment funds to pay off earlier investors, which drew new investors to sign up. Hendricks and another promoter were accused of diverting $2 million from the company to fund their own lifestyles, most of which went to buying homes.

In early 2004, the FBI seized two residences purchased by Hendricks in Shalimar, Fla., and two residences in Gig Harbor, Wash., from a company promoter, federal prosecutors reported.

To generate income, Hendricks and another company official invested money into "high-yield" scams in Lebanon, the Bahamas, Nevada and Texas, losing $2.7 million, according to federal officials.

Hendricks earned $778,000 in 2003 but failed to file a return, costing the government $80,000 to $200,000, officials said.

U.S. Investigates Church Music Director (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

GREENWICH, Conn., Oct. 24 — Federal authorities are investigating whether the longtime music director of a prominent Episcopal church here, who was a mentor to thousands of children, was involved in child pornography, according to people involved in the investigation.

The head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's cybercrimes squad in New Haven, Tim Egan, said "there is a pending investigation" into the matter, but declined to comment further.

Susan Marks, a spokeswoman for Christ Church, a picturesque church on East Putnam Avenue, said that Robert F. Tate, the music director, had recently resigned, and that the church's membership had been notified. She referred all other questions to the church's lawyer, Eugene J. Riccio. "All I want to say is I cannot comment on this matter at this point," Mr. Riccio said.

It was unclear whether the reputed pornographic images that piqued the criminal investigation were stored on a church-owned computer or not. "It's hard to tell whose computer was whose," said a federal official familiar with the investigation.

Investigators are also trying to determine whether Mr. Tate had any improper contact with any of the minors he may have known through the church, according to someone else familiar with the investigation.

Spokesmen for the Episcopal Diocese of Connecticut did not return calls seeking comment late Tuesday.

Mr. Tate could not be reached for comment. Several phone numbers with which he was previously associated either were disconnected, or calls to them went unanswered. A woman at a home owned by Mr. Tate said that she rented and that he was not there.

A biography of Mr. Tate that until recently was on the Web said he came to Christ Church from the National Cathedral in Washington, where he was assistant organist. He got a master's degree in 1968 from the College of Church Musicians at Washington Cathedral and then studied at the Juilliard School in Manhattan, according to the biography.

Pornography In The Anglican Church? (NBC)

By Tim Sandler, Producer

NBC News, October 25, 2006

NEW YORK - Federal prosecutors and the FBI in Connecticut are investigating whether a high-ranking staff member at one of the country's most venerable Anglican churches possessed child pornography, sources tell NBC News.

The sources say that earlier this month the FBI searched a building on the grounds of Christ Church in Greenwich, Conn., after obtaining information that allegedly implicates the church's long-time music director, Robert Tate, in a child pornography case.

A grand jury is convening in the case, and NBC has learned that other top church officials have been called to testify. No charges have been filed against Tate or any church officials.

A church representative referred all questions to the church's attorney, Eugene Riccio of Bridgeport, who declined comment. Kevin J. O'Connor, the U.S. attorney for the District of Connecticut, also declined comment, as did the FBI.

Tate has been removed from the church's official Web site.

DOJ_NMG_0085872

Located in one of the country's most wealthy communities, Christ Church in Greenwich has attracted an affluent membership since its inception in the 1830s.

Former President George H.W. Bush attended services in his youth and, as president, returned to the church in 1992 for the funeral of his mother, a church member for decades who was married to the late Sen. Prescott Bush, R-Conn.

A Christ Church minister reportedly signed the baptism records of President George W. Bush, who was born in New Haven, Conn., in 1946.

Former Trooper Expected To Plead To Luring Teen (BOSH)

Boston Herald, October 25, 2006

WORCESTER, Mass. - A state trooper charged with trying to solicit sex from an undercover officer he thought was a 14-year-old boy plans to plead guilty in federal court, according to court documents, and has resigned from the force.

Brian O'Hare was charged with using the Internet to entice an individual under 18 for sexual activity. An updated court filing this week indicated O'Hare "intends to plead guilty to the charge(s) contained in the Indictment," the Telegram & Gazette of Worcester reported Tuesday.

A State Police spokesman said O'Hare had resigned, effective Monday.

O'Hare allegedly had several sexually explicit chats with an FBI agent who was posing as a 14-year-old high school boy, and the two arranged to meet at the Medford Mall, authorities said. O'Hare was arrested by FBI agents in February after he showed up.

O'Hare lived in Lancaster and was assigned to the Holden barracks. He served in the Massachusetts National Guard in Afghanistan and Iraq from August 2002 until December 2003. EDT

Crime Drops After Increase In Officers (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Prince George's County police have attributed a decline in violent crime and property offenses this year to more officers on the streets, the availability of overtime funds to keep experienced officers working and investments in new technology.

Compared with the first nine months of last year, the number of homicides in the county has declined by 28 percent (from 128 to 92), rapes by 11.7 percent (163 to 144) and carjackings by 37 percent (from 565 to 356), police said.

In preliminary statistics compiled by the Maryland State Police that cover the first half of the year, Prince George's showed a total decline in major crimes of 15.1 percent, the largest percentage decrease among the 23 Maryland counties and Baltimore.

"I believe our vision has proven to be a sound one," Prince George's Police Chief Melvin C. High said yesterday at a news conference at police headquarters. "We've maintained the course for many of our initiatives that seemed challenging at the time."

He added: "What is especially gratifying for us is that our trend downward is counter to most of the nation."

Prince George's -- the state's second-most-populous county behind Montgomery -- continues to rank near the top among Maryland jurisdictions in the number of crimes committed. Through June, Prince George's led the state in rapes, larceny theft, motor vehicle theft and total crimes, the state police data show.

Last year was particularly troubling, police said, when the county had its highest homicide total ever, 173.

"We're headed in the right direction," said County Executive Jack B. Johnson (D). "We are not where we want to be. We know we have a lot of work to do."

The decline in Prince George's reported crime started in the last quarter of 2005 and has continued, gaining strength, through three quarters this year, police said. The $28.5 million increase this year in the police budget, which is now $217 million, helped the department put more officers on the streets, High said. There are 1,393 officers in the department, up from 1,346 in the last fiscal year, according to county statistics. The county is authorized to have 1,597 officers at this point, police said.

"Anytime you have fresh resources, there's a resurgence of energy," said Maj. Daniel Dusseau, commander of the criminal investigations division. Also, the funding for overtime, a $6.5 million increase this year, helped keep more experienced officers on the streets longer, he said. "This is emergency management, it really is. You can't 9-to-5 it."

Although High didn't go into great detail, he said there have been improvements to the county's ability to electronically map crimes and focus on high-crime areas. He said police are testing technologies to detect where gunshots came from and are using license plate scanners in certain spots to track automobile movement.

Percy Alston, president of the Prince George's police union, said police have gone back to officers patrolling smaller beats, rather than the "community service areas" that were less manageable.

"We just did not have the staffing to make it work," he said. "At the beginning of this year, we went back to the strategy that is time tested, and we went back to that and we're reaping the benefits."

Some people in county law enforcement say privately that they are not convinced the crime drop is attributed to police strategy or techniques but that it could be the natural drop-off from an unusually high crime year.

Ohio Executes Cult Leader For 5 Killings (FINDLAW/AP)

By John Mccarthy, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 25, 2006

(AP) - LUCASVILLE, Ohio-Ohio executed a religious cult leader Tuesday for the murder of a family of five followers who were taken one at a time to a barn, bound and shot to death. The youngest was a girl just 7 years old.

Jeffrey Lundgren, 56, died by injection at 10:26 a.m. at the Southern Ohio Correctional Facility for the deaths of the Avery family.

"I profess my love for God, my family, for my children, for Kathy (his wife). I am because you are," Lundgren said in his final statement.

The evidence against Lundgren was compelling.

Upset by what he thought was the Avery family's lack of faith, arranged a dinner hosted by cult members. Afterward, he and his followers led the Averys one by one - the father first, young Karen last - to their deaths while the others unknowingly cleaned up after dinner. A chain saw was used to muffle the gunfire.

Lundgren argued at his trial in 1990 that he was prophet of God and therefore not worthy of the death penalty.

"It's not a figment of my imagination that I can in fact talk to God, that I can hear his voice," he had told the jurors. "I am a prophet of God. I am even more than a prophet."

He was convicted of killing Dennis Avery, 49; his wife, Cheryl, 46; and their daughters, Trina, 15, Rebecca, 13, and 7-year-old Karen.

Lundgren formed the cult with about 20 members in the northeast Ohio town of Kirtland after he was dismissed in 1987 as a lay minister of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, an offshoot of the Mormon church.

Lundgren said God commanded him, through interpretation of Scriptures, to kill the Avery family, who had moved from Missouri in 1987 to follow his teachings.

Lundgren's attorneys had tried to put off the execution, arguing that he should be allowed to join a lawsuit challenging Ohio's use of lethal injection as cruel and unusual punishment. They said his execution had more of a chance of being painful because he was diabetic and overweight at 275 pounds.

Late Monday, the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati issued an order allowing the execution to go forward. The U.S. Supreme Court refused a last-minute request to stop his execution Tuesday, and Gov. Bob Taft denied clemency.

Police Reviewing Claims Against Delegate (BSUN)

By Anica Butler

The Baltimore Sun, October 25, 2006

Anne Arundel County police are looking into whether Del. William A. "Tony" McConkey might have engaged in criminal acts during a real estate deal that he is being sued over, although a police spokesman said that the review is not "a full-blown investigation."

Police said they are reviewing claims by Teresa Milligan, 42, that the Severna Park Republican committed foreclosure-rescue fraud, in violation of a new law that has civil and criminal penalties. She filed a civil suit Monday in Anne Arundel County Circuit Court alleging that McConkey tricked her into signing over her townhouse to him.

DOJ_NMG_0085874

The office of Anne Arundel County State's Attorney Frank R. Weathersbee received a complaint about McConkey on the matter, which it forwarded to the county Police Department, according to a police spokesman.

"A detective has been assigned to conduct a preliminary inquiry to determine the facts surrounding the allegations and to determine if a criminal offense has occurred and if so, what law or laws may have been violated," Lt. David Waltemeyer said Tuesday.

After the police inquiry, Waltemeyer said, the Police Department will consult with the state's attorney's office to determine which agency would investigate.

A complaint against McConkey also has been sent to the state attorney general's office, but a spokesman Tuesday said he could not comment on whether the office is investigating.

Reached Tuesday, McConkey said that he had not been informed that police, or anyone else, were looking into the matter.

"I don't see why they would. It's a real estate matter," said McConkey. "I don't think there's any basis for this."

McConkey, 42, has denied any wrongdoing. He maintains that he acquired the home legally and is evicting Milligan and her family -- a 16-year-old daughter and an 8-month-old grandchild -- for failure to pay rent. Her suit, he said, is an attempt to stop the eviction.

The Protection of Homeowners in Foreclosure Act -- which McConkey voted for when it passed the General Assembly last year -- created criminal penalties for those found guilty of foreclosure-rescue fraud. Violating the law is a misdemeanor that carries up to a three-year prison sentence and a $10,000 fine.

In 1994, McConkey received probation before judgment on a burglary charge stemming from a dispute with tenants. In 1995, he agreed to be disbarred as a lawyer after a failed real estate deal in Prince George's County in the late 1980s.

A state delegate since 2003, McConkey is up for re-election Nov. 7. Among his opponents are Democrat Patricia Weathersbee, wife of the state's attorney. Also running in the two-member district in central Anne Arundel County are Republican James King and Democrat Paul G. Rudolph.

McConkey and Chuck Gast, chairman of the Anne Arundel County Republican State Central Committee, said they believe that the civil suit, and subsequent inquiries, are politically motivated.

"Anybody can throw out charges and allegations, and half the time they're meritless and baseless," Gast said, adding that he thought the pending case would have no effect on the election. "It's up to a judge and jury to determine the facts. ... The facts will be borne out at a trial."

A hearing on Milligan's eviction is scheduled for Nov. 2.

No court dates have been set in the civil case because McConkey has 30 days from the time he is served with the civil complaint to respond.

According to court records, McConkey faced a similar suit in July 2005. Neither the plaintiffs nor their attorneys could be reached, and the outcome of the case is unclear from court records. However, state records show that McConkey purchased the home in dispute, in the 1900 block of Tilghman Drive in Crofton, in May 2005 for $330,000 and sold it in July 2006 for $400,000.

"I won it," McConkey said of the lawsuit, without offering details. "And I'll win this one, too, but it will take time."

Creative Crooks As Shoplifters Use High-Tech Scams, Retail Losses Rise (WSJ)

By Ann Zimmerman

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

William Swanberg had a thing for Legos, but it was hardly child's play.

After he was arrested last November near Portland, Ore., police investigators determined he had stolen more than $600,000 of the Danish building toys over three years from dozens of stores in at least five Western states.

He pilfered the toys by creating counterfeit bar codes that allowed $100 Lego sets, for example, to be rung up for just $19. Then he resold them on a Web site for toy collectors.

"This case was fascinating to me," says Jeff Lesowski, a senior deputy district attorney in Washington County, Ore., who prosecuted Mr. Swanberg. "With these new methods, it can take a long time for a retailer to know he's suffered a large-scale theft, so it takes so much longer to catch up with thieves."

Just as technology has given a big boost to the retail industry, making it more efficient and productive, it has also transformed retail crime. Using sophisticated tactics such as bar-code forgery and fraudulent gift cards, criminals are stealing larger amounts, and it has gotten harder to catch them. Law-enforcement officers say many of the high-tech thieves belong to organized-crime rings that have turned retail theft into big business. And the Internet has made it easier for them to find buyers for the loot.

Retail crime rose to about $37 billion in 2005 from $31 billion in 2003, according to a study conducted by the University of Florida, increasing almost twice as fast as retail sales over that period. Store employees, who have access to merchandise and familiarity with antitheft systems, account for 48% of retail-crime losses, according to the 2005 study. But professional thieves, many of them using sophisticated new methods, also are responsible for a big part, says Joseph LaRocca, vice president of loss prevention at the National Retail Federation, a trade group.

The value of merchandise snatched in the average shoplifting incident has more than tripled to $855 in 2005, from $265 in 2003, the University of Florida survey reported. In cases of organized retail crime -- where the thieves intend to sell the stolen goods rather than keep them -- the average loss was $46,353 per case in 2005, the survey said. Over that same time period, the size of the average employee theft fell 40% to $1,053, from $1,762.

Organized theft rings have been around for years. In the late 1990s, there was a rise in cases of criminal groups paying thieves to shoplift baby formula, razor blades, teeth whiteners and other high-volume merchandise, according to retailers and law-enforcement officials. The crime rings typically sold the loot to other stores or moved it in flea markets or pawn shops. Some even set up their own convenience stores.

The sophisticated schemes cropping up today generally involve more expensive items: $300 Dyson vacuum cleaners, $400 power saws and $1,000 plasma televisions. Brad Brekke, vice president of assets protection at Target Corp., estimates that more than 50% of theft at the Target chain involves some high-tech twist -- either in how the goods are stolen or how they are unloaded.

Bar-Code Scam

Over six months in 2004, Thomas Westwood, his wife, Jennifer, and mother-in-law, Kathleen Dodson, worked the bar-code scam at Target stores. Using a computer, they scanned bar codes from relatively inexpensive Target items and printed out copies. Then they returned to the store and pasted the fakes onto expensive Dyson vacuum cleaners, DVD players and phones. Cashiers dutifully rang up the wrong prices.

All told, the trio stole more than $100,000 of merchandise, law-enforcement officials say. After a cashier in one store noticed a mispriced item, Target investigators got involved and discovered a pattern of such mispricings. Using video clips, they identified suspects, and the police moved in. Earlier this year, the trio pleaded guilty in a Missouri federal court to conspiracy to commit fraud.

Last December, a Target security guard nabbed a Colorado college student after he purchased a $150 iPod that carried a bar code for $4.99 headphones, according to Mr. Brekke. The thief had fashioned the fake label with a $25 software program called Barcode Magic, which he'd downloaded from the Internet, Mr. Brekke says.

Bar-code swindlers are hard to catch, says Mr. Brekke, a former agent with the Federal Bureau of Investigation. If an alert cashier points out that a bar code is ringing up the wrong price, the thief can either pay the difference or just say he doesn't want the item any more and walk out. "The risk level is very low," he says.

Mr. Brekke has been trying to persuade manufacturers to print prices on boxes or come up with bar codes in assorted sizes, which would be trickier to substitute. In the meantime, Target's loss investigators have begun to monitor sales reports for unusual patterns, trends and anomalies.

In the summer of 2005, they noticed spikes in sales of Legos. Expensive sets were being sold for a pittance. They studied hundreds of hours of surveillance tape, then devised an electronic system to alert in-store antitheft workers when big batches of Legos were rung up.

That's what happened last Nov. 17 at a Target in Hillsboro, Ore., but the security guard got the message too late. Mr. Swanberg had already made his fraudulent purchase and left, according to Mr. Lesowski, the prosecutor. The guard warned co-workers at nearby stores.

DOJ_NMG_0085876

Later that day, an employee at a Beaverton, Ore., Target spotted Mr. Swanberg loading his cart with about 10 $100 Star Wars Millennium Falcon Lego sets. He slapped a phony bar code for a $19 Lego set on the top box and headed for the youngest looking cashier he could find, the prosecutor says. The cashier scanned the top box and multiplied it by the number in the stack.

Several burly Target employees surrounded Mr. Swanberg's cart, which he shoved at them in an effort to get away. They tackled him and summoned the police. In his van was a detailed daily itinerary for Target, Wal-Mart and Toys "R" Us stores he planned to hit, the prosecutor says.

Another vexing new problem, retail executives say, is gift-card fraud. Many retailers now issue gift cards in place of paper gift certificates and receipts from returned merchandise. The cards, which resemble credit cards, have been a boon to the retail industry, accounting for $60 billion in sales last year, almost one-third of it during the holiday season.

But they've also been a boon to thieves. In one scam, crooks copy numbers from gift cards hanging on store racks. After the cards are purchased and activated, buyers use them to shop online by entering the card numbers.

So do the thieves. To figure out which cards have been activated, they phone an 800 number to check on balances for card numbers they've copied. When they discover activated cards, they use the card numbers to buy merchandise on a store's Web site, explains Dan Doyle, vice president of loss prevention at Beall's Inc., a Southeastern department-store chain.

Another swindle involves stealing merchandise, then returning it for store credit in the form of gift cards. In 2003, Herion Karbunara, a Massachusetts man in his mid-20s, paid women $50 to $200 a day to shoplift merchandise from stores ranging from Pottery Barn to Victoria's Secret and then return it for gift cards, according to the Massachusetts attorney general's office. Some stores required receipts for returns, so the women first would buy one of each product they intended to steal, prosecutors say. Mr. Karbunara would scan the receipts into a computer and print counterfeits, they say.

The Internet has emerged as a preferred method for crooks like Mr. Karbunara to unload gift cards. After fraudulently obtaining about 600 such cards, Mr. Karbunara offered them for sale on eBay. The Massachusetts attorney general's office says online sales netted Mr. Karbunara $200,000 over 10 months. In late 2004, he pleaded guilty to three counts of larceny and one count of forgery, and was sentenced to two years in state prison.

Retailers responding to a National Retail Federation survey last year estimated that 70% of gift cards sold in eBay were fraudulently obtained, either through scams like Mr. Karbunara's or purchased with stolen credit cards. Mr. LaRocca, the federation's loss-prevention chief, says the group raised a "big stink" with eBay, which eventually changed its policy. EBay now limits sellers to posting one gift card per week, with a value of no more than $500.

When the National Retail Federation scrutinized gift cards sold on eBay on Sept. 14, says Mr. LaRocca, it identified more than a dozen auctions involving sellers who had violated eBay's policy by listing more than one gift card a week. "Although we have been talking with eBay, the conversations have clearly not been fruitful to date," says Mr. LaRocca.

Hani Durzy, an eBay spokesman, says the company changed its policy in an effort to thwart criminals. Listings are policed by eBay investigators, he says, and its 203 million users also alert the company to potential violations. With upward of 100 million items for sale on eBay at any given time, and seven million new items added every day, staying on top of every listing is difficult, he says.

The Internet has become so popular for moving stolen goods that a term has been coined for the practice -- "efencing." Thieves or fences who sell loot out of a truck or at a flea market typically get 20 to 30 cents per dollar of retail value, according to a 2005 report on organized retail crime commissioned by the National Retail Federation. On the Internet, where their wares are exposed to many more potential buyers, they bring in, on average, 70 cents on the dollar, the report says.

Felonious Twist

Law-enforcement officials say the Web allows thieves to unload merchandise quicker than in the past, and in greater volume. More thieves are taking orders for items to steal -- a felonious twist on just-in-time inventory, these officials say.

"Thieves know this sort of organized retail crime is low-risk and high-profit," says Eric Ives, unit chief the FBI's major theft unit, which oversees investigations of organized retail crime.

After Mr. Swanberg, the Lego thief, was arrested, federal authorities raided the Reno, Nev., home he shared with his elderly mother. He had sold the goods over the Internet, says Mr. Lesowski, who prosecuted him. Investigators found computer records of sales he had made on Bricklink.com, a Web site for Lego fans and collectors. Target's Mr. Brekke figures Mr. Swanberg stole about $200,000 of the sets from its stores alone.

"Our Web site cannot do anything to prevent [the sale of stolen merchandise] from happening because we don't have control over the seller's merchandise," a representative of Bricklink.com said in an email.

Bruce and Laura Wasz, a mother-and-son team, ran an 11-person theft ring in Illinois. They paid people to hit home-improvement chains such as Home Depot Inc. and Sears Holdings Corp.'s the Great Indoors. The thieves stole the old-fashioned way, simply sneaking things out the doors. Accomplices ripped off entire truckloads of products such as chain saws.

They stored the stuff in three shuttered pawn shops and unloaded it on eBay, using numerous different account names, according to Brian Hayes, an assistant U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Illinois. "They held themselves out as honest dealers," says Mr. Hayes. Investigators later determined that in 2003 they sold more than $2 million of sump pumps, Koehler faucets, mosquito exterminators, snow blowers and other merchandise.

They got caught after the manufacturer of the stolen chain saws noticed a bunch of them for sale on the Web, priced below wholesale. Mr. Wasz was sentenced to six years, nine months in federal prison. His mother got five years, eight months.

Shoplifting is usually prosecuted on the state level. In most states, only those caught stealing more than $1,000 face felony charges that require jail time.

"Organized retail-crime rings utilize the laws to their benefit," says Britt Wood, senior vice president of industry relations at the Retail Industry Leaders Association, a trade group for large mass merchants such as Wal-Mart and Best Buy. "They don't steal a lot from one store at one time. But it adds up, so by the end of the month, they've stolen $100,000."

Retailers are pushing states to stiffen penalties. In January, Congress allotted $5 million for the FBI to establish an organized retail-crime task force.

Increasingly, retailers are setting up investigative units to piece together cases big enough to interest law enforcement. Home Depot put together a unit several years ago that regularly searches the Internet for new merchandise offered at below wholesale prices that matches products stolen from its stores. Earlier this year, the two large retail trade groups created separate databases to track retail-crime activity, in an effort to help build bigger, stronger cases for prosecutors.

Mr. Swanberg, the Lego thief, pleaded guilty in June to three counts of felony theft and was sentenced to 13 months in prison. Federal authorities say they still are investigating Mr. Swanberg for possible mail fraud.

His name still comes up from time to time on Bricklink.com's online forum. Mr. Swanberg was a highly rated vendor on the site, garnering more than 6,000 favorable comments over three years. Two days before he was arrested, one participant noted: "A unique vendor with great inventory."

CIVIL LAW:

Latest Round In Web Porn Law Fight Begins (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, October 25, 2006

It's not all that often that a month-long trial begins in federal court where everyone knows from the start which side is likely to win.

But that was the situation Monday in ACLU v. Gonzales as the final round of litigation got underway in a challenge to the Child Online Protection Act (COPA), a law which threatens criminal penalties for commercial Web site operators that allow children to access material that is "harmful to minors."

Eight years after it was passed, COPA has never gone into effect because Senior U.S. District Judge Lowell A. Reed Jr. granted a preliminary injunction that, after two trips to the U.S. Supreme Court, won the approval of a 5-4 court.

Although the majority was a slim one, the high court's holding was that the ACLU and its co-plaintiffs are "likely to succeed" in proving that COPA is unconstitutional.

But "likely" doesn't mean certainly, and the Justice Department isn't giving up the fight.

DOJ_NMG_0085878

In preparation for Monday's trial, Reed ordered lawyers on both sides to file their proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law.

Ordinarily, such briefs are filed after a nonjury trial has concluded to aid the judge in his drafting of an opinion that announces his verdict.

But ACLU v. Gonzales is no ordinary case, and Reed apparently wanted the lawyers to provide a roadmap for the trial, which is expected to boil down to a battle of the experts.

One of the central disputes in the case is whether children can be protected by "filtering" software -- a program added by parents to a computer to block access to sexually explicit Web sites.

The government, in its brief, insists that "filtering software cannot completely protect minors from exposure to sexually explicit material on the World Wide Web. The status quo solution -- filtering software without any government regulation -- fails to protect children adequately."

The better solution, the government argues, is to stop pornography at its source by requiring Web site owners to demand "age verification," such as a credit card, before allowing access to sexually explicit content.

But the plaintiffs lawyers -- a team from the ACLU and Latham & Watkins -- argue that COPA is overbroad and that many legitimate Web sites fear prosecution under the law.

Age verification won't work, the ACLU argues, because Internet users are reluctant to give their identity and Web site owners cannot afford to process credit cards just to allow access to free content.

And even if a credit card system were installed, the ACLU says, it wouldn't prevent children from gaining access since many youngsters have access to their parents' credit cards or even have their own cards.

Instead, the ACLU says, Congress should go back to the drawing board and draft laws designed to enhance the effectiveness of filtering software.

"Congress could enact a statute that permits the distribution of such material [that is harmful to minors], but instead requires Web site operators to include a rating, label, or code on the Web site that makes clear that harmful to minors material is available on the Web site. Such a rating, label or code could be placed on the initial home page of the site," the ACLU argues in its brief.

"Requiring Web sites to include a harmful-to-minors rating, label or code would make filtering products even more effective and accurate at blocking harmful to minors material," the brief says.

Another way to make filters more effective, the ACLU says, would be a federal law requiring the Justice Department to compile and maintain a list of Web sites that contain material that is harmful to minors.

Such a statute "would provide filtering product companies with the ability to accurately block absolutely all speech that the government believes is harmful to minors. It would also provide parents and other entities with information about the types of material that are on the Web in order to assist parents in determining what protections, if any, are necessary for their children depending on their individual values and circumstances," the brief says.

The ACLU contends in its brief that "filtering product companies would accept a governmentally created list of inappropriate sites; in fact, many have already testified that they would almost certainly comply with any request from a governmental entity to include specific sites on their lists."

But Justice Department lawyers insisted in their brief that "voluntary measures such as a Web site rating system, filtering products, and education, will be effective only if they are used in conjunction with the requirements of COPA, because voluntary measures alone will not prevent children from accessing material harmful to minors."

A rating system simply wouldn't work, the Justice Department says, because Web site operators "would lack an incentive to label their material in a manner that makes it more likely that filters will block access."

The operators, they say, "would have to agree to a uniform system of ratings, or agree to subject themselves to an independent rating body."

And even if such a system were attempted, the Justice Department says, it would prove ineffective because "Web sites are too numerous and change too frequently for the government, or any private business, to effectively separate harmful from nonharmful material."

DOJ_NMG_0085879

Instead, the government argues, "Only a solution directed at the source of the problem can provide the incentive necessary to adequately protect children."

In an opinion handed down on Oct. 10, Reed rejected a last-minute bid by the government to have the case dismissed.

In its motion, the government argued that none of the named plaintiffs has standing to challenge the law because they are not "commercial pornographers," and that their fear of being prosecuted under COPA is therefore "too speculative."

But the plaintiffs lawyers argued that plaintiffs such as Salon.com and the Philadelphia Gay News have good reason to fear that they will be targeted for prosecution because the law prohibits any commercial dissemination of material that is deemed to be "harmful to minors."

Reed sided with the plaintiffs, finding that "there is nothing in the statute that limits COPA to commercial pornographers."

The legal test for establishing standing on the basis of a credible threat of prosecution is "quite forgiving," Reed said, and courts "will assume a credible threat of prosecution in the absence of compelling contrary evidence."

Under COPA, a commercial Web site operator faces up to six months in prison and fines of up to $50,000 if found to have allowed minors access to harmful material.

The law defines material that is "harmful to minors" as any "communication, picture, image, graphic image file, article, recording, writing or other matter of any kind that is obscene" or that, if not obscene, meets the law's three-pronged test.

Under the first prong of the test, material violates the law if "the average person, applying contemporary community standards, would find, taking the material as a whole and with respect to minors, is designed to appeal to, or is designed to pander to, the prurient interest."

The second prong calls for proof that the material "depicts, describes, or represents, in a manner patently offensive with respect to minors, an actual or simulated sexual act or sexual contact, an actual or simulated normal or perverted sexual act, or a lewd exhibition of the genitals or post-pubescent female breast."

Finally, the material must be shown to "lack serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value for minors."

With that test in mind, Reed found that the plaintiffs have standing because they "will be able to show at trial that they have a legitimate fear that they could be prosecuted under COPA because their materials could be found to be harmful to minors."

Having reviewed each of the plaintiffs' Web sites, Reed found that many of them include material that "could be found to: have been designed to appeal to the prurient interest of a minor; depict or describe a sexual act or contact or a lewd exhibition of the genitals or post-pubescent female breast in a manner patently offensive with respect to minors; and lack serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value for minors."

Some of the plaintiffs' materials "are more graphic than others," Reed noted, and "range from erotic homosexual kissing to highly eroticized descriptions or depictions of anal and vaginal sex."

In a footnote, Reed said the term "prurient interest" is most often defined as "a shameful or morbid interest in nudity, sex, or excretion over and beyond that which would be characterized as normal."

But that definition was significantly expanded by the U.S. Supreme Court, Reed noted, in a decision that said materials may appeal to the prurient interest if they are merely "in some sense erotic."

In another footnote, Reed said, "I find that it is possible that some communities would find even minor sexual contact, like kissing, to be prurient in nature and patently offensive if performed by homosexuals."

More FOIA Funds, Staff Needed, Group Says (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, October 25, 2006

A recent Justice Department report on agencies' compliance with a presidential mandate to improve processing of requests for government documents failed to address resource constraints, an independent research institute has charged.

In a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales last week, the National Security Archive, a research institute and library located at The George Washington University, said the report did not acknowledge the scale of the challenge agencies face in reforming their Freedom of Information Act procedures. It avoided mentioning a lack of adequate funding and staffing, as well as the need for cross-agency leadership, the letter stated.

DOJ_NMG_0085880

The executive order, signed by President Bush on Dec. 14, 2005, directs agencies to ensure that their FOIA implementation is citizen-centered and results-oriented. They must also appoint chief FOIA officers.

The order states that any changes should be made using "available resources" and "existing agency staff." The FOIA chief can, however, recommend adjustments to agency personnel and funding as "may be necessary to carry out" the order's policies.

Daniel J. Metcalfe, director of the Justice Department's Office of Information and Privacy, said there was little discussion of resources in the Oct. 16 report because the agency FOIA improvement plans reviewed in it were due "only six months after the executive order was signed, in the middle of a budget cycle."

The National Security Archive also charged that, in its own review of agency FOIA improvement plans, it found that many are behind schedule and others don't comply fully with the 1996 Electronic Freedom of Information Act, which amended FOIA.

Metcalfe said the group's characterization that "many agencies" are lagging in complying with the 1996 amendments is a gross overstatement and mischaracterization. Several Government Accountability Office audits show otherwise, he said.

In March 2001, GAO reported (GAO-01-378) that all government agencies had implemented many of the law's provisions, including the governmentwide establishment of electronic reading rooms.

In response to a set of similar letters the National Security Archive sent to House and Senate committee leaders, Tabetha Mueller, a spokeswoman for the House Government Reform Subcommittee on Government Management, Finance and Accountability, said FOIA oversight hearings in February were likely.

"If you look at not complying with [the Electronic Freedom of Information Act], that is just as much a leadership problem from Congress and an oversight problem as it is the agencies' problem," Mueller said.

She said the Justice report provided a fair accounting of the steps agencies have taken to improve administration of FOIA, and gave evidence that agencies are responding to two FOIA hearings held by the subcommittee earlier this year.

But Meredith Fuchs, general counsel for the National Security Archive, said she believes the FOIA executive order was issued to keep Congress from passing legislation amending the law again.

"It's great to have cheerleading, but it is going to take money, hard work and an investment in technology and people to reform FOIA," Fuchs said. "We think that the executive order could have a wonderful impact on FOIA, but the agencies' goals actually have to be implemented."

Senate Judiciary Committee Ranking Member Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said in a statement that he shares the National Security Archive's concerns regarding compliance with the 1996 amendment.

"Legislative improvements to FOIA are meaningless without adequate resources and training to implement these improvements," Leahy said. "I am also troubled that many federal agencies lack access to the technology needed to implement the amendments. Technology can play an important role in promoting openness in our government."

Legislation moving through the House (H.R. 867) and Senate (S. 394) would impose tighter enforcement of the current 20-day deadline for responding to FOIA requests, create an online and telephone-based system for tracking FOIA requests and create a FOIA ombudsman to mediate disputes between agencies and the public over information requests.

Rick Blum, coordinator of the Sunshine in Government Initiative, a coalition of media groups, said the Justice report and the agency FOIA improvement plans showed that an executive order is not a substitute for legislation to strengthen the process of handling requests for government documents.

"The report did point out that the executive order really is unique and did go a ways to show that agencies should make some common sense changes," Blum said. "The problem is, where are they going to get the money?"

Patrice McDermott, director of OpenTheGovernment.org, a coalition of journalists and good government groups, said that without legislation tied to agencies' budgets, a substantial improvement in the administration of FOIA is out of reach.

Research Group Questions 'rosy' Report On Agencies' FOIA Progress (FEDTIMES)

By Aimee Curl

Federal Times, October 25, 2006

The National Security Archive, criticizing a recent report by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, has called on Congress to hold hearings to determine if genuine progress is being made in agency administration of the Freedom of Information Act.

DOJ_NMG_0085881

Gonzales' report, issued Oct. 16, highlighted progress agencies are making to comply with a presidential directive, issued last year, that requires agencies to name chief FOIA officers and create improvement plans to streamline the processing of FOIA requests. Gonzales wrote that the executive order "has had an immediate and widespread positive effect on the operations of the federal agencies that administer the FOIA."

In letters to both Gonzales and leaders in the Senate Judiciary and House Government Reform committees, the Washington-based research group — which collects and publishes documents obtained through FOIA requests — called the report "rosy" and said it "ignored critical challenges facing the federal FOIA system."

"While the AG report is optimistic about the agencies' newfound embrace of technology/automation, FOIA request status tracking and backlog reduction, it fails to provide an honest assessment of where agencies' FOIA programs stand today and what it will take to bring their FOIA programs into compliance with the law," the letters said.

Daniel Metcalfe, director of the Office of Information and Privacy at the Justice Department, said the report gives an "accurate appraisal of agency improvement plans."

He noted that this is the first of three reports.

"A key development before the next report is that agencies will report their implementation successes as part of their annual FOIA report," Metcalfe said. "All agencies are now implementing their plans and are going to report on their initial successes as part of this process by Feb. 1. The next attorney general's report will be based on this first phase of plan implementation."

Rep. Todd Platts, R-Pa., chairman of the House Government Reform subcommittee on government management, finance and accountability held a hearing in July to discuss progress on the executive order.

Subcommittee spokeswoman Tabetha Mueller said Platts will hold additional oversight hearings as the letter from the National Security Archive suggests.

"Oversight is very important with something like FOIA," Mueller said. "The only way to guard against agencies not meeting their goals is with vigilant oversight."

In a statement released following his receipt of the letter, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., agreed that congressional oversight is critical and also promised to continue to press for future hearings.

Dana Gets More Time For Bonus Plan (DOW)

By Tiffany Kary, Dow Jones Newswires

Dow Jones, October 25, 2006

NEW YORK — Dana Corp. on Tuesday won more time to develop a new legal strategy to obtain a package of bonuses for its chief executive and other top executives.

Judge Burton Lifland of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Manhattan, who previously rejected the proposed bonuses, approved the auto-parts suppliers request to further its legal work on a schedule that would permit a Nov. 8 final hearing on its request for a long-term incentive plan for executives.

Even so, Lifland continued to question whether the timeline was too "aggressive" and whether Dana's strategy made sense. "Frankly, I'm not fully comprehensive of the strategy of this motion," Lifland said.

The Toledo, Ohio, company has asked Lifland to reconsider his ruling striking down a program that would have paid Chief Executive Michael J. Burns $9.1 million over the next few years _ including a $6 million bonus once Dana exits Chapter 11 protection.

The Justice Department has called the request improper because it is in effect asking the court guidance on how to get the bonus plan approved.

"We are not as of yet a part of the growing consensus in this case," said Andrew Velez-Rivera, speaking in court Tuesday as a trial attorney representing the Justice Department's Office of the U.S. Trustee. That office monitors bankruptcy cases to ensure that participants comply with bankruptcy law.

Corinne Ball, an attorney for Dana, said that there has been "growing consensus" between the company and creditors on the executive-compensation plans, and that Dana needs more time to craft non-compete, non-disclosure and non-disparagement clauses for executives.

"We have reached an agreement with the official creditors committee on a long-term incentive plan for six key executives," she said.

Lifland had previously denied the executive bonus program, saying the proposal would have violated provisions of the 2005 bankruptcy law. Those provisions allow retention bonuses only if the employee has a competing offer for equal or higher pay, setting a higher standard than old laws.

Several Dana retirees have sent letters to Lifland _ some of them handwritten _ praising the judge for rejecting the proposed bonuses and pleading with him not to reconsider his decision. The letters have been included in Dana's bankruptcy-court record.

"It again appears that Mr. Michael J. Burns, CEO of Dana Corp. and its board of directors are more intrigued with trying to design an executive compensation plan to reward Mr. Burns and other executives should they be successful to emerge from Chapter 11, or that Dana Corp. be sold," Louis H. Benien, one of the retirees, wrote in one letter.

"It would seem to me that their time would be better spent on how they are going to protect the continued existence of Dana, the jobs of their people (which many of us lost), their retirees, and the best interest for their shareholders," Benien said.

Bankrupt Opposition (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

When President Bush signed the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act last year, Democrats and "consumer" groups not only cried foul but predicted doom. A year after the law was enacted, however, the evidence suggests that their fears were misplaced, not to say cynical.

A modest reform at best, the law was designed to prevent people from having their debts erased regardless of their ability to repay them. Between 1995 and 2004, personal bankruptcies rose 78%. More and more people were running up credit-card and other debt and then seeking Chapter 7 relief, which essentially allowed them to walk away from their obligations.

Under the new law, more of those individuals are required to file for Chapter 13 bankruptcy and submit to a means-tested, court-ordered repayment plan. The law makes exceptions for the poor and elderly, as well as extraordinary cases involving debt that results from medical expenses, military service or divorce.

Not that any of those carve-outs stopped such Democrats as Senator Ted Kennedy from denouncing the reform as "a bill for which the credit-card industry hopes to squeeze an extra few dollars a month out of Americans who are down on their luck." Consumers Union called the legislation a "disaster," and the National Association of Consumer Bank Attorneys said adequate bankruptcy relief would no longer be available to the average person. For the Consumers Union, in particular, this rhetoric fits its pattern of being wrong on nearly every antitrust, consumer finance or telecommunications issue of the day.

Today, the number of bankruptcy filings is down some two-thirds from what it's been in recent years. Partly this has to do with people rushing to file for Chapter 7 before the law took effect last October. But there are also indications that people are responding to the new incentives.

In the past, about 20% of bankruptcy filers have had incomes above the national median. But since the law took effect, nearly all filers are below the median. One plausible explanation is that many past filers were abusing the system. They didn't really need bankruptcy protection, and now that there's a test of their income and assets in place that might compel them to repay their debts, they've decided not to file.

That's good news for businesses and consumers alike. Abuse of the bankruptcy laws drives up the cost of credit for everyone and reduces credit availability at the margin. When people are allowed to exploit the bankruptcy code and burn their lenders, others are left to pick up the tab.

It will probably be another year or so before long-term trends can be projected, and the economy will remain an important factor. But the early returns are promising and show that Congress did the right thing by ignoring the doomsayers.

NAACP Decries Fine For Couture (RTD)

DOJ_NMG_0085883

By Jim Nolan, TIMES-DISPATCH STAFF WRITER

Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch, October 25, 2006

Ex-officer convicted of manslaughter in traffic-stop shooting

Leaders of the state and Richmond-area branches of the NAACP yesterday decried the $2,500 fine imposed against a former police officer convicted of manslaughter in the May 29, 2004, shooting death of Santanna Olavarria.

On Friday, a jury convicted Michael Couture, 33, of manslaughter. Two hours later, the jury returned with a recommended sentence of $2,500 and no jail time, which the judge imposed. Couture could have faced up to 10 years in prison.

"This sends a message that black people's lives have very little value to citizens, the criminal justice system and all other institutions in this society," the NAACP leaders said in a joint statement issued at a news conference yesterday afternoon.

The leaders also called for the Justice Department to pursue a civil-rights investigation into the shooting, in which then-officer Couture fatally shot the 21-year-old Olavarria following a traffic stop in the city's East End.

"Life has to be more valued," said Rayfield Vines Jr., head of the Henrico County chapter of the NAACP. "We are going to insist people give life more value."

In February 2005, Police Chief Rodney Monroe forwarded all of the department's police-involved shooting cases to the Justice Department for investigation, including the Olavarria shooting. To date, there have been no federal charges filed in the Olavarria case.

Couture is believed to be the first police officer in the modern history of the city's police department to have been convicted of a homicide while on duty.

After the verdict last Friday, Commonwealth's Attorney Michael N. Herring said he was satisfied with the decision but disappointed with the absence of jail time in the punishment recommended by the jury.

Last fall, Couture's first trial in the Olavarria killing on a second-degree murder charge ended in a hung jury. Herring presented the evidence to a grand jury this year, which returned an indictment of manslaughter against Couture.

King Salim Khalfani, executive director of the Virginia State Conference of the NAACP, had criticized the police training and screening process that made Couture a Richmond officer. He also had criticized Herring for not retrying the second-degree murder charges.

But yesterday, he had to acknowledge that it was a mixed-race jury, not a prosecutor, that gave an ex-officer a fine for a killing.

"It's not just a police issue," Khalfani said. "Citizens made this decision. . . .

"There's a Confederate mentality that even affects black folks, who don't have a love for self."

Two Jailers Indicted, Another Pleads Guilty In Inmate Assaults (AP)

By Holbrook Mohr

AP, October 25, 2006

JACKSON, Miss. - A former jailer at a regional prison in Louisville has pleaded guilty to assaulting an inmate and is working with federal prosecutors in a case against two former correctional supervisors accused of similar crimes, the U.S. Justice Department said Tuesday.

Former Winston-Choctaw County Regional Correctional Facility Deputy Warden Scotty L. Graham and former Captain David G. Mitchell are charged with violating the inmates' civil rights, conspiring to obstruct justice and providing false statements, the Justice Department said.

Former officer Marcus Coleman already has pleaded guilty to similar charges, the Justice Department said, and has agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors.

An indictment unsealed Tuesday in Washington accuses Graham and Mitchell of assaulting an inmate in October 2001 with a device known as a "shock stick." Mitchell is charged with an additional civil rights violation for allegedly attacking another inmate the same day.

Details of the alleged attacks were not available.

"The details will come out if there's any sort of trial proceeding," said Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson.

Mitchell and Graham face penalties of 10 years in prison on each civil rights violation and obstruction charges, and a maximum five-year sentence on the conspiracy charges.

Telephone numbers for both men were disconnected on Tuesday.

Coleman told U.S. District Judge Michael Mills in Oxford on Sept. 28 that he and "Mitchell assaulted the inmate and ... Graham encouraged them to continue the assault in a location where there would not be any witnesses," the Justice Department says.

Charles Tillery, chief operating officer of the prison, contacted on Tuesday by The Associated Press, said he was not familiar enough with the charges to comment. He said Warden Ed Hargett was not available.

Sheriff Walter Coburn, who runs the facility as part of an agreement with the Mississippi Department of Corrections, said he was elected in 2003 and the alleged assaults happened before he took office in January 2004.

"I don't mind commenting but I'm not going to do it over the phone," Coburn said. "If you send somebody down here where I can look them in the face, then I'll comment."

MDOC spokeswoman Tara Booth said corrections officials would have no comment.

The Louisville facility opened in March 1999 and houses a combination of about 374 state and county inmates, Tillery said. The facility in Louisville, some 100 miles northeast of Jackson, is one of 11 regional facilities operated by the MDOC and county governments.

It was not immediately clear whether the people assaulted were state prisoners or county inmates.

Federal Oversight Of Mental Health Plan To Be Lifted (HONADV)

By Ken Kobayashi, Advertiser Staff Writer

Honolulu Advertiser, October 25, 2006

A federal judge this morning cleared the way for the lifting on Nov. 30 of the federal oversight over the state's efforts to comply with a community mental health plan to serve Hawai'i's estimated 11,000 seriously mentally ill residents.

U. S. District Judge David Ezra essentially approved the latest federal magistrate's status report on the state efforts.

Although U. S. Magistrate Judge Kevin Chang could not say in his report in August that the state met a June 30 deadline to be in substantial compliance with the plan, he said the state made progress and he recommended the lifting of the oversight on Nov. 30.

"This case will simply terminate (on Nov. 30)," Judge Ezra said.

Attorney General Mark Bennett said even with the lifting of the federal oversight, the state will continue to seek to improve the mental health services.

"We will keep our noses to the grindstone," he said.

The state has been under federal oversight for 15 years as a result of a Justice Department lawsuit alleging violations the constitutional rights of patients at Hawai'i State Hospital.

The hospital emerged from the oversight in late 2004, but the oversight continued over the community plan aimed at providing adequate services to the mentally ill in the community.

Justice Department attorneys agreed to the lifting of the oversight on Nov. 30 after the state raised concerns about whether the federal oversight could continue beyond June 30.

The community plan is aimed at providing adequate treatment, services and housing for the mentally ill.

Studies Look For Reasons Behind Racial Disparities In Health Care (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0085885

Racial minorities are less likely to undergo major surgeries at the hospitals where those operations are done best, and black patients at Medicare HMOs fare worse than whites on several health measures regardless of plan quality, according to studies being released today.

The two studies in today's issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association, plus a third showing that black women are less likely than their white counterparts to survive breast cancer, add to the voluminous evidence that the U.S. health-care system works differently for minorities than for whites despite years of efforts to erase racial disparities.

Studies have demonstrated that blacks and other minorities are far less likely than whites to receive many types of care, such as appendectomies, heart bypass surgery, or basic tests and drugs for heart disease and diabetes. Minorities on average are more prone to illness, have more complications and recover more slowly. They also are more likely to die from their illnesses, and to die younger.

But while the persistent disparities are well-documented, the causes remain the focus of research and debate. One explanation is that minorities tend to be poorer and less educated, with less access to care. And they tend to live in places where doctors and hospitals provide lower quality care than elsewhere. Others suspect cultural or biological differences play a role, and there is a long-running debate about whether subtle racism infects the health-care system.

Major medical organizations, private foundations and government health agencies have begun a host of studies, programs and initiatives in the past decade to try to close the gap.

In one new study, researchers at the UCLA medical school studied 719,608 patients who underwent one of 10 major operations -- including knee replacement, heart bypass and lung cancer surgeries -- over a five-year period.

They found that blacks, Hispanics and Asians were less likely than whites to receive care at hospitals that perform a high volume of the surgeries and excel in them. Minority patients were more likely to have their operations at low-volume hospitals, where mortality rates tend to be higher. The same was true for uninsured and Medicaid patients, who are disproportionately minorities.

"The current study demonstrates a significant disparity in the distribution of patients at high- and low-volume hospitals with respect to race/ethnicity and insurance status," the authors wrote.

The racial disparities remained even after accounting for income, age and how close a person lived to high- and low-volume hospitals. The researchers suggest that inadequate transportation or the lack of knowledge among minorities about hospital quality could be factors. Minorities are underrepresented among surgeons, and physicians who care for black patients are less likely to be board certified in a specialty and may have a harder time getting access to the better hospitals for their patients.

"Everyone wants to improve quality, but it's difficult," said Clifford Y. Ko, a co-author and professor of surgery at UCLA. "Not everyone can go to these high-volume places. . . . I personally think that instead of identifying one out of however many hospitals that people should go to that might have good outcomes, we should try to improve care at all hospitals."

A second study, led by Amal N. Trivedi, assistant professor of community health at Brown University, found that blacks do worse than whites in controlling blood pressure, blood sugar and cholesterol levels despite quality improvements at Medicare HMOs that have succeeded in shrinking gaps in care received by minorities and whites. The study, which looked at more than 430,000 patients in 151 plans, found that the disparity existed in both high- and low-quality Medicare HMOs -- undercutting the theory that blacks fare worse because they receive their care from lower quality providers.

"Across the board, black enrollees have lower performance on these measures," Trivedi said in an interview. "And the gaps were wide. . . . Even high-quality plans do not provide effective medical treatment for all of their patients."

Health plans should examine whether black patients lack access to medication or cannot afford it, because drugs can be effective in controlling conditions such as high cholesterol, blood pressure and blood sugar, Trivedi said. It also is worth trying to figure out whether black enrollees tend to get their care from lower-quality physicians within plans, he said.

"We can't say specifically why the gaps exist in each plan," Trivedi said. "It's probably a shared responsibility of plans, providers and patients. There's probably not one factor that explains all of the disparity, but health plans do play an important role."

In the breast cancer study, published online Monday in the journal Cancer, researchers from the University of Texas M.D. Anderson Cancer Center in Houston examined 2,140 patients who took part in clinical trails at the cancer center from 1975 to 2000. They found that black women had lower survival rates than white and Hispanic women, and that black patients had more advanced cancer at the time of treatment.

Previous studies with similar results have concluded that less frequent screening, less aggressive treatment and different access to care may be factors in lower survival rates for black women. But because all women in the new study received the same treatment, researchers think that breast cancer tumors may be more aggressive and less responsive to treatment in black women.

"These findings should prompt additional research on how we can improve outcomes for African American patients by understanding and addressing tumor biology," said Wendy Woodward, an assistant professor of radiation oncology at the cancer center and lead author of the study.

Virginia Battle On Same-sex 'Marriage' Down To Wire (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

RICHMOND -- The fight over a proposed constitutional ban of same-sex "marriage" is heating up as both sides of the debate deliver their final sales pitches two weeks before the Nov. 7 election.

Yesterday, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, a Democrat, and his father-in-law, former Gov. A. Linwood Holton Jr., a Republican, encouraged Virginians to oppose the amendment, saying the proposal is excessive because the state already defines marriage as a union between a man and a woman and its "ambiguous" language could lead to unintended consequences for unmarried couples.

"In states that have passed similar language, the ability of partners who are not married to obtain the social service and other protections of family courts have been thrown into jeopardy by this language, and I think that would be a very negative consequence," Mr. Kaine said, before signing with his wife and Mr. Holton, a statement from 200 lawyers and legal scholars in opposition of the amendment.

"We're talking in this amendment about fooling around with [the Virginia Constitution] in a way that will create confusion and unfortunately litigation for two or three generations," said Mr. Holton, who has at times been at odds with Republicans for supporting Democrats. "It just runs a serious risk of messing up our constitution."

Their remarks clash with the opinions of most Republicans, including Lt. Gov. Bill Bolling, Attorney General Bob McDonnell and Sen. George Allen, who say traditional marriage must be protected from "activist judges."

"The proposed amendment preserves marriage as a union solely between one man and one woman, while not limiting or infringing upon the current legal or civil rights of unmarried Virginians," Mr. McDonnell said yesterday. "The argument regarding alleged unintended consequences is completely wrong and legally unsupportable."

Political analysts agree that the amendment could motivate conservatives to turn out for Mr. Allen, who is in a tight race against Democrat James H. Webb Jr. for the U.S. Senate. Mr. Webb opposes the amendment.

A poll conducted by The Washington Post earlier this month showed that 53 percent of Virginians support the marriage amendment, while 43 percent oppose it.

The proposed amendment in Virginia, which the General Assembly overwhelmingly passed in consecutive legislative sessions, has fueled an emotional and costly campaign, according to financial reports filed with the State Board of Elections.

The Commonwealth Coalition, a group of homosexual rights activists and religious and business organizations, has raised $761,089 since July 1 and has spent $390,316 trying to defeat the amendment.

Amendment supporter Va4marriage.org, an affiliate of the Richmond-based Family Foundation, has raised $204,667 and spent $136,915 over the same period.

Nationwide, homosexual rights activists hope the tide turns this year as voters in eight states -- including Virginia, South Carolina, Tennessee and Colorado -- decide Nov. 7 whether to approve similar constitutional bans.

Recent history shows they are going against the odds. So far, voters in 20 states have approved such amendments.

DOJ_NMG_0085887

"The proponents of the amendment always have the upper hand," Mr. Kaine said. "So we are all standing here fighting the good fight, recognizing we are fighting an uphill battle."

Anne Holton, Mr. Kaine's wife and a former family court judge, said one of the reasons these amendments have been so successful "is that folks think it is pro-marriage."

"It is false advertising to say this is a pro-marriage amendment," she said. "It does absolutely nothing to protect or strengthen marriage. ... This may be the time when people stand up and say, 'Wait a minute. What ... is this all about?' "

She said the amendment could hurt child-custody laws and undermine the domestic-violence laws for both homosexual and unmarried heterosexual couples.

Politically, the battle has fallen largely along party lines.

At a debate Monday in Richmond, Delegate Robert G. Marshall, Prince William County Republican, reportedly said that "marriage is under attack" and that passing the amendment would "stop the gay agenda."

Last week, Delegates Franklin P. Hall and Dwight Clinton Jones, Richmond Democrats, summed up the opposition of six members of the Richmond delegation.

"We are particularly concerned about removing the protections of our domestic-violence laws from unmarried victims, depriving unmarried couples of the comfort of their loved ones in time of medical crisis, or exposing Virginia businesses ... to an unpredictable risk of litigation and the inability to stay competitive in hiring the best employees in a very competitive job market," they said.

Leaders on both sides of the issue are targeting college campuses, trying to woo young voters. The Associated Press reported that there were more than 400,000 registered voters ages 18 to 25 in Virginia last year, according to the State Board of Elections.

ANTITRUST:

Carlyle-Led Steel Deal Spotlights Unheralded Side Of Private Equity (WSJ)

By Henny Sender

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

John Maneely Co., a maker of steel tubing that is owned by private-equity giant Carlyle Group, is expected to announce a merger with Atlas Tube Inc. today in a deal valued at almost $1.5 billion, including stock and debt.

The move to bulk up Maneely comes amid a boom in private-equity transactions, in which groups like Carlyle team up to buy companies they believe are undervalued -- often using elaborate financial arrangements -- with hopes of selling them later at a profit.

While the proposed Maneely transaction is relatively small, it illustrates how not all these deals are about financial maneuvering. In this case, Carlyle is buying a rival manufacturer in order to gain economies of scale. Both Maneely and family-owned Atlas manufacture tubing used in the construction industry.

The merger with Atlas, which is based in Harrow, Ontario, will make Carlyle the parent of the largest North American maker of steel tubing, with sales in excess of $2 billion, the companies say.

When Carlyle Group acquired Maneely earlier this year, it seemed counterintuitive, given that costs for energy and raw materials such as iron ore were soaring, potentially eroding profit margins and making it a high-cost business to get into. At the same time, competition was stiff from lower-cost producers such as China. While the U.S. imposes tariffs on steel, there are none on steel-based products such as tubing.

Carlyle's hope is that there will be a role for local manufacturers if they had enough scale, says Daniel Pryor, a managing director at Carlyle. He described the proposed deal as the first in a series of mergers intended to give the steel-tube maker critical mass.

"We thought if we could improve systems and processes," he says, "we could get the material costs down substantially."

Atlas is a family-owned company whose head, Barry Zekelman, inherited the business at the age of 19 following the death of his father. He built the firm from a company with sales of two million Canadian dollars ($1.77 million) 20 years ago, to a company that last year had revenue of C$1.3 billion. He decided to sell to Carlyle, he says, "because I want to make my company stronger by giving it a more powerful platform." Mr. Zekelman will stay on as head of commercial and manufacturing for the combined entity.

If Sergio Leone Made a Movie About Antitrust . . .

October 25, 2006; Page A15

Stolt-Nielsen is a name that won't ring many bells unless your peculiar interest is ocean shipping or knotty business cases that might tempt the Supreme Court's intervention.

Or perhaps you are a corporate counsel for a major international company who just happened to be wondering, out of idle curiosity, whether the amnesty deals signed by the Justice Department in price-fixing cases are worth the paper they're written on. Just a theoretical interest, of course . . .

Here's Stolt's tale of woe. The company is one of a handful of specialty chemical haulers that are dwarfed in size and clout by their customers, including Dow Chemical, DuPont, Shell and BP. It is deemed an abomination in some circles that these ship operators colluded over rates for several years, pocketing in "excess profits" a sum that by now has been vastly exceeded by the legal bills of all involved in the subsequent litigation (legal bills that are naturally passed on to consumers and taxpayers).

Now Stolt finds itself hanging on whether the Supreme Court will hear its plea challenging the Justice Department's right to revoke an amnesty deal granted to Stolt in return for its help in cracking the cartel.

For what follows it's helpful to decide how nefarious you really think the underlying offense is. Advocates of price-fixing prosecutions argue that consumers are harmed by higher prices, but by this standard consumers are harmed by any price above zero.

It seems right to mention that producers are people too and are harmed by lower prices. Whose side should we take? Do consumers have any particular "rights" here? Not that we can see. The only "rights" in jeopardy are those of producers, whose freedom of contract and property are sacrificed on the altar of a theorized higher good, known as "efficiency."

Yet the empirical record of this higher good is murky. In practice, price-fixing seems mainly a temptation to companies seeking to preserve capacity in periods of weak pricing. Take Stolt: It and its rivals colluded at a time when their customers were consolidating and Stolt was piling up debt to bring a new generation of chemical tankers into the marketplace. Indeed, these features seem to be a hallmark of many price-fixing prosecutions: cyclical commodity markets; large customers; suppliers who face high fixed costs to maintain the capacity required by those customers.

What really goes on when companies collude could stand some fresh examination, but trustbusters are not likely to question the provenance of their last breadstick. On the contrary, Justice and its foreign counterparts have become reliant on -- even made a growth business out of -- prosecuting price-fixing as the last, unambiguous antitrust sin.

The new era began in 1993 when a Justice Department amnesty program was retooled to make it more enticing for firms to rat out their fellow miscreants in return for guaranteed leniency. The approach has been nothing if not fruitful: Brought to the bar have been dozens of industries, including bulk vitamins, animal-feed additives, copper concentrate, cement, hydrogen peroxide, sorbic acid, creosote, naphthalene, polyethylene film, citric acid and sodium gluconate.

That's a lot of price fixing, suggesting that intermittent collusion has long been a feature of markets for many industrial inputs and somehow the world has prospered anyway. Yet peer into the heart of the Stolt dispute, and the problem is precisely Justice's tender doubts about the sincerity of Stolt management's remorse for its crimes.

By the time the company showed up on Justice's doorstep, after all, the details of the plot had been well-aired in an executive whistleblower's private lawsuit and, later, in a front-page Journal story. Stolt's approach to Justice, in spirit if not word, was roughly: "The cat's out of the bag. Let's cut our losses by finking on our erstwhile partners and beat them into the amnesty program."

Let it be added that cartel activities have been a shipping tradition since long before antitrust was invented, and continue today in various form under grandfathered exemptions to the antitrust laws. Of Norwegian birth, Stolt is controlled by a shipping family that has been in the business since 1891.

Cynical bargain or not, Justice granted Stolt immunity in return for Stolt coughing up the evidence to allow the successful prosecution of its fellow conspirators (two Norwegian firms, one Japanese). Only after the cases were concluded did Justice renege on grounds that Stolt's management had allowed the collusion to continue for several months between the whistleblower's internal hullabaloo and Stolt's decision to seek amnesty. Of course, Justice had known all this from day one and had chosen to sign the agreement and benefit from Stolt's help anyway.

Nine petitioners, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, have joined Stolt in urging the Supreme Court to find that Justice has no business indicting Stolt and its employees until the lower courts have definitively ruled the amnesty deal invalid. In fact, the one federal court that looked into the matter ruled that Stolt had upheld its end of the bargain and ordered Justice to do likewise.

Here's our view: At best, antitrust is a questionable form of economic regulation that places a highly speculative theory of consumer good ahead of the actual, non-controversial rights of producers to sell on terms of their own choosing. Justice has done itself no favors by calling into question the reliability of its amnesty promises. The Gordian knot here is its excessive moralizing of its own position. With its brain a little less clouded by self-righteousness, the department might notice that its campaign to impose its dubious ideal of price regulation on the world might actually be helped if it grew up a little about antitrust.

Thomson Nears Plan To Put Learning Unit On Block (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman In New York And Elena Cherney In Toronto

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

Publishing and information giant Thomson Corp. is near a plan to put its Thomson Learning division on the auction block, in a deal that could fetch somewhere north of $5 billion, said people familiar with the matter.

A deal would separate the company's second-largest unit as measured both by revenue and operating income. And it would concentrate Thomson's broad operating lines around legal, financial and scientific-information businesses. Analysts have been calling for a sale of Thomson Learning because it doesn't fit with the company's strategy of selling to professionals. The Learning division also wasn't moving as quickly to sales of electronic products as had been hoped.

The company has been a solid performer over the past year, with its shares climbing about 18% year-to-date, versus a 9% rise for an index of publishing companies maintained by data provider Baseline, itself a Thomson unit.

Moving From Historic Roots

In recent years, Thomson has adeptly exited certain businesses that subsequently declined in profitability. Starting in the late 1990s, the company began shedding newspaper assets -- a move away from its historic roots as a Canadian-based newspaper empire -- to refashion itself as an information provider, with more of its services delivered online instead of in print. The sales included The Globe and Mail as well as other smaller dailies.

A company spokesman declined to comment on the planned sale.

Last year, Thomson Learning produced $2.3 billion in revenue and operating income before taxes of $350 million. The unit's earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortization -- a measure commonly used in the publishing industry -- is higher than that figure, people familiar with the matter say. These people said that the business should be able to fetch more than 10 times its annual Ebitda, getting a potential sale price greater than $5 billion.

Thomson Learning's textbooks, testing and certification materials are used by colleges and distance-learning organizations, and include its Thomson Wadsworth, Thomson Gale and Thomson Delmar imprints. The unit also maintains a number of online learning courses and its own university, Universitas 21 Global, which issues graduate degrees through online instruction.

Thomson Learning also maintains a unit called Prometric, which designs and processes tests used inside corporations, for the public sector and counts as clients the National Association of Securities Dealers and the National Board of Medical Examiners.

More recently, Chief Executive Richard Harrington has talked about the company's shift from an information provider to a developer of software and high-end analytics. The company embarked on a cost-cutting program earlier this year to boost efficiency and said it will shed about 1,000 of its 40,000 employees world-wide.

In the second quarter, the company said earnings came to $171 million, down from $301 million because of charges related to cost-cutting in the recent quarter. The previous year's results also included a one-time gain. Quarterly revenue increased 7% to $2.1 billion from $1.97 billion last year.

Demand for Publishing Services

The Legal and Regulatory group increased its revenue by 9% to $923 million, while Thomson Financial, which provides electronic financial information, increased by 6% to $499 million.

The Learning division's revenue was $456 million, or 5% higher than in the same period a year earlier. The business growth was fueled by strong demand for some of the company's publishing services and by textbooks for arts and sciences and for business and economics students. E-learning results, however, were weak, the company said.

The company said that it anticipated stronger performance in the third and fourth quarters, which are typically stronger for the academic lines of business. The company is scheduled to report third-quarter earnings tomorrow.

EU Probes Guarantee For Loan To TVO (AP)

AP, October 25, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium --EU antitrust regulators on Tuesday opened an investigation into a French state guarantee for a euro570 million (US$716 million) bank loan to Finnish power company Teollisuuden Voima Oy that may have helped a French-German supplier win a contract to build Finland's newest nuclear plant.

The European Commission said the guarantee may have cut TVO's financial costs below normal market levels -- and could have encouraged the company to pick Areva-Siemens to build the first new European reactor in more than 10 years.

"The guarantee may also have lowered the financial costs linked to the Areva/Siemens offer for TVO and, thereby helped the consortium Areva/Siemens to get the contract for the construction of the new nuclear power plant," it said.

The EU executive said it would quiz France about the loan -- the interest rate and the guarantee premium TVO paid the French government -- to find out if it gave TVO a cheaper deal and an unfair advantage over rivals.

It said it was acting on two complaints about the guarantee the French state export credit insurance agency Coface gave to TVO to purchase equipment from France's Areva-Framatome.

Lauri Piekkari, chief financial officer of TVO, said the company had not directly received financial support.

"The suspicion is whether the French government's guarantee has been too generous," Piekkari told reporters in Helsinki. The investigation won't affect the timetable of the already twice-delayed project, he said.

In July, TVO said completion of Finland's fifth nuclear reactor will be delayed by a year and that the plant would not be in commercial operation until the second quarter of 2010.

The supplier of the 1,600-megawatt reactor, the French-German consortium Areva-Siemens, was unable to complete the project on time because of the size and demands of the construction, TVO said. Earlier, TVO had announced a delay of several months caused by faulty concrete.

DOJ_NMG_0085891

Construction of the euro3-billion (US$3.7-billion) atomic reactor at Olkiluoto began last year after the government gave it final approval. It is situated 250 kilometers (155 miles) northwest of the capital, at the site of two 750-megawatt nuclear units.

Besides the Olkiluoto units, there are two 500-megawatt reactors at Loviisa, 90 kilometers (55 miles) east of Helsinki. The four produce more than a quarter of Finland's electricity.

Hopes Brighten For Curb On Damaging Ocean Fishing (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

The Christian Science Monitor, October 25, 2006

Less than 1 percent of the world's commercial fish catch comes from trawling the ocean floor of the high seas.

But the environmental impact is large - so large that many countries ban or severely restrict the practice within their territorial waters. This week, an international effort to curb bottom-trawling on the open ocean got a significant boost. In a letter to US negotiators at the United Nations on Monday, a top State Department official set out Washington's unambiguous support for a halt to the practice "until such time as conservation and management measures are adopted."

UN negotiators are trying to craft a proposal to submit to the General Assembly for a vote in early December.

Enacting the moratorium "would be a very big deal," says Joshua Reichert, who heads the environment program at the Pew Charitable Trusts in Philadelphia.

Countries have been cracking down on the practice inside their exclusive economic zones. In March, for example, the US banned bottom-trawling in waters covering some 150,000 square miles off the US West Coast. Europeans have banned the practice in the Mediterranean at depths greater than 3,200 feet. But outside the 200-mile exclusive economic zones that nations claim, bottom-trawling continues unabated.

Powerful trawlers drag nets across the ocean bottom at depths of up to 1.5 miles. This enables them to reach once inaccessible habitats such as undersea islands known as sea mounts. The nets, with yawning maws up to 200 feet across, are weighted with large steel "doors" that weigh up to 5 tons each. The idea is to "tickle" the bottom so that fish there rise into the path of the open net. But the doors, as well as rollers or wheels along the bottom of the net's opening, rip up or crush deep-sea coral reefs, colonies of sponges, and other structure-forming bottom dwellers. For instance, in 1997 during a year's fishing along a formation in the Pacific called the South Tasman Rise, 20 trawlers ripped up an estimated 10,000 tons of coral in the process of harvesting 4,000 tons of their target species, orange roughy, according to conservation groups.

"It's like clear-cutting a forest to capture squirrels," Mr. Reichert says.

Such concerns have sparked the interest in a worldwide moratorium on the practice so UN negotiators can work out rules to regulate the practice.

The administration's stance on this critical marine-conservation issue may come as a surprise to some, given what many environmentalists call a shaky White House record on other environmental issues. But the president appears to have a deep personal concern about overfishing, Reichert says. That concern was manifest most recently in June when the president set aside the world's largest marine reserve, stretching some 1,400 miles along the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands.

When President Bush issued a policy statement on bottom-trawling on Oct. 2, some opponents of the moratorium reportedly detected some leeway for a less severe alternative. Monday's letter from Claudia McMurray, assistant secretary of State for oceans and international environmental and scientific affairs, appears to remove any wiggle room, observers say.

A moratorium would have little global economic impact, supporters say. Of nearly 84 million tons of fish hauled from the oceans in 2001, bottom-trawling on the high seas accounted for only 0.2 to 0.25 percent of the total, according to a 2004 report by the World Conservation Union, based in Geneva. Members of the European Community account for the biggest share of the high-seas take, with Spain leading the list. For countries using the approach, bottom trawling appears to be the answer to declining fisheries closer to shore. And it is far more efficient - many argue ruthlessly so - than more targeted forms of fishing on the high seas.

Angst over the effects of bottom-trawling dates back hundreds of years, says Roger McManus, senior director of Conservation International's global marine division. But only within the past 10 to 15 years has technology allowed large trawlers to locate and exploit fish that thrive around deep-sea geological features such as sea mounts, underwater canyons, or deep coral reefs.

These isolated features are widely scattered through the oceans. And their ecological health affects the biological productivity of the entire column of water above them, researchers say. These biological hot spots become mid-ocean oases for large fin fish or mammals, such as tuna or whales, that migrate over vast distances and need their version of in-flight refueling. Once a trawler's net bulldozes its way across these habitats, it can take centuries for them to recover, because the organisms there are slow-growing and slow to reproduce, notes Jeremy Collie, an oceanographer at the University of Rhode Island's Graduate School of Oceanography.

Moreover, marine science still knows little about the range of creatures that thrive around these features. Efforts such as the international Census of Marine Life are trying to close the gap, but "we're still in the exploratory phase," Dr. Collie says. "The science is pretty fragmentary."

While some researchers say that the "townies" living in these oases often are species unique to that spot, others suspect that species-exchange among these isolated habitats occurs - a critical point if the UN is to develop rules to manage these ecosystems.

EU, U.S. Meet In Finland To Discuss Climate Change, Environmental Issues (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, October 25, 2006

(AP) - HELSINKI, Finland-Officials from the United States and the European Union - split over the Kyoto protocol - met Tuesday in Finland to discuss ways of improving cooperation on environmental issues.

The EU-U.S. meeting is a follow-up to a summit held in Austria in June, when both sides pledged to work "more closely to address the serious and long-term challenge of climate change, biodiversity loss and air pollution."

Signed in 1997, the Kyoto protocol came into force in February 2005 after it was ratified by the required number of nations, including EU members. It requires signatories to cut emissions of six greenhouse gases to 5 percent below 1990 levels by 2012.

The United States rejected the Kyoto targets as placing an unnecessary burden on its economy, drawing criticism from environmental campaigners who say American pollution is responsible for one-quarter of the world's greenhouse gases.

No decisions will be taken at the Helsinki meeting, hosted by the Environment Ministry, but the aim is to explore ways of increasing trans-Atlantic cooperation on environmental questions, Finnish officials said.

The topics of discussion include reducing greenhouse gas emissions, carbon capture and storage, renewable energy sources and promoting cleaner and more efficient vehicles, the ministry said.

The two-day seminar comes during Finland's six-month rotating presidency of the 25-member European bloc that ends in December.

Oil-, Gas-Lease Sales Halted In Gulf Coast (WSJ)

By Maya Jackson Randall

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The state of Louisiana and the U.S. Department of the Interior Tuesday said they have agreed to settle a lawsuit over oil and natural-gas leasing in federal waters off Louisiana's coast, with the agency agreeing to delay future offshore lease sales pending a complete environmental analysis.

Meanwhile, Louisiana, under the pact, won't object to the department issuing leases to energy companies seeking to produce oil and natural gas under Lease Sale 200, which encompasses 20.4 million acres in the Western Gulf of Mexico.

Lease Sale 200 attracted about $341 million in bids from 62 companies looking to produce oil and gas there. Development of the leases could result in as much as 252 million barrels of oil and 1.44 trillion cubic feet of gas, the Interior Department said.

DOJ_NMG_0085893

Louisiana had sued the department in July, charging that it did not conduct a proper environmental review for its Lease Sale 200 because it didn't take into account coastal environmental damage caused by drilling as well as that brought on by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita last year.

The move was seen as part of the state's battle to receive a bigger share of the revenue generated by oil and gas produced in federal waters off its coast.

"Resolving this dispute by agreement rather than litigation benefits our nation's energy security by assuring we can move ahead on the leases issued in Lease Sale 200," Steve Allred, the Interior Department's assistant secretary for land and minerals management, said in a statement.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco called the settlement "a historic victory" for Louisiana and states' rights.

"This victory will ensure that our state has a real seat at the table, controlling our own fate as the federal government's number one offshore energy partner," Ms. Blanco said.

Louisiana fought the lease sale, she said, because it didn't want the federal government to "get away with a cookie-cutter environmental assessment" that ignored the devastation to the state's coast during the 2005 hurricane season.

"No exploration plan will even be allowed on Western Gulf Lease Sale 200, which was held in August of this year, until each plan reflects an appropriate environmental analysis and approved by the state," Ms. Blanco said Tuesday.

Although pleased with the settlement, Ms. Blanco continued to press Congress to act on policies that could help her state. U.S. lawmakers should act on a new offshore oil and gas drilling policy that would allow Louisiana to share in a greater portion of the revenues coming from oil and gas production in federal waters off the state's coast, she said, pointing out that the state has already agreed that the new drilling revenues would all go to coastal protection and restoration.

"It's time for Congress to pass a revenue-sharing bill that will allow us to get on with the business of restoring our coast and protecting the communities that support this country's offshore energy policy," Ms. Blanco said.

House and Senate drilling proponents in Congress had hoped to pass a new drilling bill in September, but those plans failed. The bill would expand energy development offshore and would have allowed Gulf States like Louisiana to share some of the revenues. U.S. lawmakers have said they will take up the issue again after the November 7 congressional elections, but it will be difficult to broker a deal on the controversial issue.

Louisiana And U.S. In Accord To Review Gulf Drilling Plans (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Oct. 24 — Strengthening Louisiana's hand in its quest for money from Gulf of Mexico oil drilling, state and federal officials announced on Tuesday that stiffer environmental reviews would be conducted before such drilling occurs.

The state hopes that the reviews will bolster its case that it needs more federal money to restore its devastated coast.

The announcement settles a suit that sought to block Washington's sale of offshore tracts for oil and gas exploration. The suit, filed by Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, was part of the longtime quest for more of the $7 billion in royalties that Washington receives from the oil companies in the gulf.

Local officials put the state's current share at less than 0.5 percent.

Experts say Hurricane Katrina was all the more devastating because so much of the coast protecting New Orleans has been eroded, about 25 square miles a year. Hurricanes Katrina and Rita swept away an additional 217 square miles, the equivalent of 30 years of erosion, over three weeks.

Officials and environmentalists here deem the new accord as a major victory for the state, because it implicitly acknowledges that drilling for oil and gas off Louisiana harms the coastline and contributes to devastating erosion.

That, in turn, strengthens a push by the Louisiana Congressional delegation to obtain more oil and gas royalties out of the gulf, money that the state has said it will use to rebuild the coast.

The Senate has passed a bill that would give Louisiana and other coastal states 37.5 percent of the royalties. The House has yet to agree.

DOJ_NMG_0085894

Under the new accord, the Interior Department will “go the extra mile,” in the words of a spokesman, in studying at the effects of oil and gas work in the gulf under the state’s eye.

The government will have to include the hurricanes’ effects on the coast, and new leases will not be issued until the environmental effects are reviewed.

“It’s huge,” said Prof. Oliver A. Houck, an environmental law specialist at the Tulane University Law School who contributed an affidavit to the suit. “It gives the state a great deal more leverage to insist on a better money solution.”

The suit was unusual in the context of a state that through successive governors has sought to appease, rather than confront, the oil and gas industry, which resists the idea that its activities have harmed the environment.

“It was like the calf accusing the cow,” Professor Houck said. “The state has never taken that position. Suddenly, everything the environmentalists have been saying, the state was saying.”

Governor Is Blunt To Bush (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan And Scott Martelle

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

After weeks of subtle jabs at fellow Republicans in Congress and the White House, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger turned more blunt Tuesday in a tart letter to President Bush. Chiding the president for ignoring his plea for more leeway to toughen California's vehicle exhaust standards, Schwarzenegger complained about "the absence of a coherent federal policy" to stop global warming.

At the same time, Schwarzenegger's Democratic challenger, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, dismissed the governor's detachment from Bush as a ruse. "Look, the Republicans are going down in this election, and Arnold Schwarzenegger is going with them, because he is part of the same team and has the same agenda," Angelides said Tuesday after a Bay Area speech to a raucous union crowd.

With the California election two weeks away, the back-and-forth captured the contrasting approaches that Schwarzenegger and Angelides are taking in the final stretch.

At tightly staged events this week in San Diego, Glendale and Oakland, Schwarzenegger has all but severed his Republican ties while playing up the value of bipartisan harmony.

He has also taken pains to widen his appeal beyond white Republican men, his most loyal supporters. At every stop, Schwarzenegger has surrounded himself with African Americans or Latinos and stuck to themes that resonate with Democrats, independents and women: the environment and education.

"They need money to refurbish this building here," Schwarzenegger said Tuesday as he toured an Oakland school to promote education bonds on the Nov. 7 ballot. "I mean, this is an old, old building, and I think that those children deserve better than that."

For his part, Angelides has raced around the state making partisan appeals to Democrats this week in an effort to maximize any boost he might get from his party's national surge in the run-up to the midterm election.

Corporate big shots are "doing better and better," but the middle class is "struggling under George Bush and Arnold Schwarzenegger," Angelides told union shop stewards at a labor conference near Oakland.

At a Pasadena picnic with 200 supporters Sunday, Angelides called Schwarzenegger a "Republican thoroughbred" pretending to be a Democrat. "In the closing days of this campaign, you won't find Arnold Schwarzenegger within 100 feet of another Republican," he said.

In what has become a rare nod to a conservative base that he once tended to assiduously, Schwarzenegger plans to appear Friday on "Hannity & Colmes," a Fox News television show to be taped on the Midway, the San Diego Aircraft Carrier Museum.

But that is an exception. For months, the governor has kept a distance from his party, a move seen as a strategic necessity in a state where just a little more than a third of registered voters are Republican. He has avoided public events with other GOP candidates and refused to endorse the party's staunchly conservative U.S. Senate nominee, former state Sen. Dick Mountjoy of Monrovia. And in an interview last week, Schwarzenegger sidestepped the question of how much he cares whether Republicans win other statewide races.

"To be honest with you, my focus right now is on really moving the state of California forward," he said, "and for me to get in there so I can finish all of what I envision for the future of California to be. And if this has a positive effect on the down-ticket, that's great."

As he campaigned Sunday in San Diego at black churches — a historic proving ground for Democrats — Schwarzenegger also dodged the question of whether he wants Republicans to keep control of Congress.

"I think that's a choice that the people have to make," he said. Pressed to state his own view, he said, "I myself will look at the list when I vote for my congressional delegation," and went on to praise members of both major parties.

At Faith Chapel Church of God in Christ, Schwarzenegger took another swipe at Bush and Republican congressional leaders during a doughnuts-and-orange-juice talk with children after a morning service with gospel music. He told them of steps he had taken to fight global warming and cut reliance on Mideast oil by promoting alternative energy, saying, "The sad story is that nationally, we don't have great leadership on that."

His letter to Bush, which was released Tuesday, made that case in surprisingly brusque terms. The state's request for a federal waiver to set vehicle emissions standards has been "ignored with no explanation," Schwarzenegger wrote, despite a personal letter from the governor to Bush in April.

A White House spokeswoman declined to comment directly on the letter, but said Bush had "an aggressive climate change strategy to reduce greenhouse gas intensity 18% by 2012."

The letter followed accusations by Democrats who lead the Legislature that Schwarzenegger took several steps in an executive order last week to undercut the state's new law capping greenhouse gas emissions.

Through it all, the governor has rarely uttered a word about his rival, letting his television ads portray Angelides as a tax-and-spend politician of a bygone era.

As for Angelides, he has begun keeping a frenetic pace of public events to draw local media coverage to try to help compensate for his more modest TV ad presence. He has campaigned this week in Hollywood, Arcadia, Baldwin Park, Pasadena, Santa Ana, Santa Barbara, Sacramento, Hayward and San Francisco.

His tone is combative, his pitch sharply partisan as he tries to commandeer what he describes as a coast-to-coast "tidal wave" of Democratic victories.

"We are going to end this Republican culture of corruption," he told a crowd of Democratic volunteers and precinct walkers Sunday in Baldwin Park.

To capitalize on a national political climate that favors Democrats, Angelides will appear at a UCLA rally Thursday with party Chairman Howard Dean. On Friday, three of the party's biggest stars are slated to join him at a USC rally: Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa. The mayor, who declined for months to endorse Angelides, has not campaigned with him since the day he announced support for Angelides in early September.

The Democratic nominee has also stepped up his appeals to Latinos, in part by linking Schwarzenegger to a racially charged letter discouraging Orange County immigrants from voting — even though the governor has denounced the mailing. At a rally Monday on the steps of Orange County's Old Courthouse in Santa Ana, Angelides called the mailing part of "a consistent pattern of behavior by the Republican Party."

"Gov. Schwarzenegger himself has contributed to this situation," Angelides said, citing the governor's support for Proposition 187, the 1994 ballot measure to cut public services for illegal immigrants, and his support for the Minutemen border patrol force. (In recent months, Schwarzenegger has renounced Proposition 187 and hedged, even Tuesday, on whether the Minutemen are needed.)

"He's made derogatory remarks about Mexican Americans' ability to assimilate," Angelides said. "George Bush and Arnold Schwarzenegger set the wrong tone."

DOJ_NMG_0085896

Angelides has also toughened his rhetoric in attacking Schwarzenegger's character. At a Santa Barbara park, where he gathered beneath oak trees with firefighters and other supporters, he denounced the governor's campaign fundraising as "a special interest pig fest" that belied his vow to clean up Sacramento.

"Gov. Schwarzenegger wants you to all believe he's changed," Angelides told the crowd. "You and I know men our age don't really ever change."

L.A. County Beaches Ranked Foulest In State (LAT)

By J. Michael Kennedy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

Heal the Bay's summer report card shows new trouble in Long Beach but some improvements elsewhere along the California coast.

Los Angeles County predictably earned the dubious honor Tuesday of having the most polluted beaches in California.

Less predictably, Long Beach jumped out as the worst offender among the worst.

But having made those pronouncements, Heal the Bay, the environmental group that routinely conducts pollution studies along the California coast, declared this one a victory of sorts. The reason: a number of the usual cellar-dwellers passed with flying colors because of recent cleanup efforts.

Mark Gold, the executive director of the Santa Monica-based Heal the Bay, pointed to such perennial polluters as Will Rogers State Beach as examples of cleanup efforts along the coast that were starting to yield results.

"It was always one of the worst offenders," Gold said of Will Rogers, which earned an A rating in the organization's annual "End of Summer Beach Report Card."

The study, which grades more than 450 California beaches, bases its findings on levels of bacterial pollution in the water. Los Angeles County received a grade of F for 29 of its 97 testing stations. San Diego County was next with three F readings, while Orange County had one. There were 37 F ratings in the entire state, compared with 278 monitoring stations that received A ratings.

Gold described Long Beach as the "biggest surprise of the summer" because its beaches normally receive good grades for water quality. But this year, only three of the 25 monitoring stations got an A or B rating. Last year, 21 of 23 stations got either A or B grades.

Gold said the source of the pollution was most likely the Los Angeles River, which dumps into the ocean at Long Beach. He said one possibility is that shifts in sediment at the mouth of the river may have redirected pollution along the coast.

The city's Marine Stadium, Mother's Beach and Colorado Lagoon have been closed for weeks because of pollutants traced to defective sewer pumps. But Gold said they were too isolated to have had such a widespread effect.

Darryl Sexton, the Long Beach city health officer, said he had not had a chance to examine the report and could not comment on it.

Gold said the next step in cleaning up the state's beaches was dependent on the passage in November of Proposition 84, which would provide $540 million to help maintain coastal waters.

"It's extremely critical," Gold said of the Clean Water and Coastal Protection Bond Act. It would provide $225 million to clean the Santa Monica, San Diego, San Francisco and Monterey bays, watersheds and rivers draining into them. The measure is opposed by several taxpayer organizations, which say it will be a cash cow for environmental groups and that paying back the $5.4-billion bond issue would drain about $350 million a year from the general fund.

Although Gold was upbeat about the report, other areas in Los Angeles County pulled down the grades for that strip of coastline. The Santa Monica and Redondo pier areas both earned Fs in the study, while Dockweiler State Beach and Manhattan Beach at the 28th Street drain earned Ds.

Also receiving poor grades, as it has in the past, was the beach at Avalon on Catalina. It has been plagued by the aging town sewer system, which is in need of repairs and updating.

DOJ_NMG_0085897

In another recent study, Heal the Bay also took a more detailed look at the Santa Monica Pier, whose waters tested positive for large amounts of bacteria. The study said the predominant source of the bacteria was most likely the pollution pond in front of the pier storm drain, which is being cleaned up.

In other parts of the state, the beaches of Santa Barbara County suffered a marked decline this year, with six of the 20 monitoring stations receiving fair to poor grades. In Orange County, 90% of the beaches received A ratings, including Doheny Beach, a perennial polluter. Monarch Beach, in Dana Point, improved from an F last year to a B this year.

Overall, most of the state received good grades from Heal the Bay. Receiving A's were San Diego, Ventura, San Luis Obispo, Monterey, Santa Cruz, San Mateo, San Francisco, Sonoma and Humboldt counties.

Heal the Bay is one of the largest nonprofit environmental groups in Los Angeles County.

New E-mail Scam Using FBI Name (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Think twice about answering e-mail from G-man.

A new Internet scam promising cash for responding to a document request claims to be from FBI Director Robert S. Mueller. The top government cop's request is followed by a second e-mail threatening that "failure to comply will result in charges being brought against the individual by the FBI."

"This e-mail is a hoax," the FBI said in an alert to consumers that was posted Tuesday on its Web site. "Do not respond."

The same e-mail address, which was not released, was used to send both messages, the FBI said.

The first, claiming to be penned by Mueller, advises recipients that they are eligible for a large sum of money that they can claim with an FBI Identification Record and a Certificate of Ownership. The e-mail includes official information, taken from the FBI Web site, that defines what the records are and how they can be obtained.

The follow-up e-mail appears to be sent from a lower-level FBI official, who demands that a fee be sent to "FBI Nigeria" which will issue the certificate.

"At this point the message becomes more threatening, stating the FBI has investigative programs which can track down those who fail to provide the requested documentation," the FBI said on its Web site.

The spammed scan is the second in as many months to appear to be from Mueller. In September, authorities were alerted to a circulating e-mail, which referenced Mueller's name and office address, that urged recipients to send money to secure prizes won in an international lottery.

E-Mail Hoax Claims To Be From FBI (ABC)

By Jason Ryan

ABC News, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24, 2006 — Just because that e-mail says it comes from the FBI, doesn't mean you should trust it.

The FBI's Internet Crime Complaint Center has warned Internet users and others to be aware of a hoax e-mail that claims to come from FBI Director Robert Mueller and other FBI officials.

According to the Internet Crime Complaint Center — or IC3 — notice, the hoax e-mail advises the recipient that he is the beneficiary of a large sum of money. It states further that in order for him to claim the money, the recipient must provide an FBI Identification Record and a Certificate of Ownership.

The e-mail contains information lifted from the FBI's Web site that descibes what an Identification Record is and how to obtain it from the FBI's Criminal Justice Information Services Division.

DOJ_NMG_0085898

The e-mail concludes with a threatening "If you fail to provide the Documents to us, we will charge you with the FBI and take our proper action against you for not proofing to us the legitimate of the fund you are about to receive. Faithfully Yours, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller, III"

FBI officials say the hoax is a typical Nigerian scam, which has become more prevalent in recent years. Many of the people who fall victim to these scams are elderly or foreign-born individuals.

Later, individuals receive a second, more threatening notice, claiming to come from Donna Uzzell, another senior FBI official, which says, "It has come to the attention of our Money Trafficking investigation department, that you have some funds valued at U.S $10.5 Million to your name. … You are under an observational /Investigation in connection with money laundering."

The warning from the FBI's Internet Crime Complaint Center, "At this point the message becomes more threatening, stating the FBI has investigative programs which can track down those who fail to provide the requested documentation. It further states failure to comply will result in charges being brought against the individual by the FBI. THIS E-MAIL IS A HOAX. DO NOT RESPOND. Be cautious when responding to requests or special offers delivered through unsolicited e-mail."

Feds Arrest Three, Seize $27M In Cocaine And Ice (ATBC)

The Atlanta Business Chronicle, October 25, 2006

Federal officials have busted three Mexican citizens living in metro Atlanta on charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine and crystal methamphetamine ('ice").

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) and the U.S. Attorney's Office jointly announced the filing of a federal criminal complaint against Leonardo Garcia-Miranda, 30, of Hapeville, Ga.; RamonLuis Soto-Maciel, 29, and Rafael Heredia-Ramos, 42, both of Jonesboro, Ga. and all citizens of Mexico, on charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine and crystal methamphetamine ('ice").

DEA also seized 145 pounds of ice and 72 kilograms of cocaine -- with a street value of $27 million -- in a house in Clayton County searched in conjunction with the arrests.

According to the Criminal Complaint filed in this case, a joint investigation began about a month ago, DEA and DeKalb County Police on Oct. 23 made a controlled purchase of about 1 kilogram of cocaine from defendant Soto-Maciel. A confidential source and defendant Miranda, who allegedly brokered the deal, were stopped shortly after leaving the site of the transaction. The cocaine was recovered and Miranda was arrested. A subsequent consent search of Miranda's home in Hapeville allegedly resulted in the discovery of approximately 4 ounces of "ice," packaging materials and a scale used to weigh drugs.

DEA agents continued their surveillance on Soto-Maciel after the transaction was completed. After visiting and exiting a house in Clayton County, Soto-Maciel was approached by DEA agents and fled, throwing down a package in the process. He was apprehended and the package recovered. The package allegedly contained "ice."

The third defendant, Ramos, was observed standing in the doorway of the residence from which Soto-Maciel had fled. Ramos was detained. Agents then got written consent to search the house from Soto-Maciel and Ramos, both of whom claimed to live there. In the house, agents allegedly recovered approximately 72 kilograms of cocaine and 145 pounds of "ice."
